If one man synne agaynst another, dayseman may make hys peace: but yf a man sinne agaynst the Lord who can be hys dayseman? Bible, Anno 1551. 1 Samuel, ch. ii.

A shameful president for the time to come: namely, that vmpiers and daies-men, should convert the thing in suit unto their own and proper vantage. Holland. Livius, fol. 137.

'Tis instinct of nature, (witness the heathen sacrifices, and lesser Gods, as mediators to the great God,) to seek out a daies-man. Job, ix. 33. Goodwin. Works, vol. v. part i. fol. 117.

There shall be no more need of a days-man for to make intercession and reconciliation, for all distances, and enmity shall be utterly abolished. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 525.

To whom Cymochles said; For what art thou,
That mak'st thyselfe his dayes-man, to prolong
The vengeance prest.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 8.

DAZE, v.
DA'ZING, DA'ZZLE,
DA'ZZLEMENT,
DA'ZZLINGLY.

Dutch, daesen, delirare, insanire, phantasmate turbari. Also Dutch, dayselen: Vertigine laborare, obstupere, mente et animo perturbari, attonitus fieri. Kilian. Junius and Skinner think from the A. S. dwaes, stultus, foolish.

To daze or dazzle, seems equivalent to

To confuse or confound, perplex or embarrass the sensations or perceptions, sc. by excess of light, of splendour or brilliancy—both literally and metaphorically.

And also dombe as a stone
Thou sittest at another boke
Til fully dased is thy loke.
Chaucer. The second Booke of Fame, fol. 278.

For in good faith thy visage is ful palc
Thin eyen dasen, sothly as me thinketh.
Id. The Manciples Prologue, v. 16980.

If any do but lift vp his nose to the smell after the truth, they swap him in the face with a fire brande to senge hys smellyng, or if he open one of his eyes once to looke towards y^e^ light of God's word, they bleare & daze his sight with their false iugglyng.
Tyndall. Workes. An Answer to Sir Thomas More's Dialogues, fol. 277.

I gessed long ago that God would send a dasing into the head of the spiritualitie, to be catched thēselues in their owne subtiltie, and I trust it is come to passe.
Id. Ib. fol. 455. Two notable Letters that he sent vnto John Frith.

DAZE. — DEACON.

And the Lorde shall smyte the with madnesse, blyndnesse and dasynge of herte.
Bible, Anno 1551. Deuteronomium, ch. xxviii.

Then takes he forth the shield, whose light so dazed
The lookers on, they fall down all amazed.
Harrington. Orlando, book x. st. 93.

As where th' Almighties lightning brond does light,
It dimmes the dazed eyen, and daunts the sences quight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 8.

Whereby I learne that grieuous is the game
Which follows fansie dazled by desire.
Gascoigne. Flowers to the same Gentlewoman.

The which, O pardon me thus to enfold
In couert veile, and wrap in shadowes light,
That feble eyes your glory may behold,
Which else could not endure those beames bright.
But wold be dazled with exceeding light.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. Of Temperance.

To gain a kingdom, who spares their next blood?
Nearness contemn'd, if sov'reignty withstood.
A diadem once dazzling the eye,
The day too dark to see affinity.
Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles. The Lady J. Gray to Lord Dudley.

There are but few, whom Fortune bathes in blesse,
But blinded are, and dazelingly they looke:
They see nought else but worldly happinesse,
At that they only fish with fortune's hooke.
Mirrour for Magistrates, fol. 56.

If less splendour wait on thine,
Yet they so benignly shine,
I would turn my dazzled sight
To behold their milder light.
Waller. To Amoret.

Swift, at his look, a shape supremely fair
Leap'd into being with a boundless blaze,
That fifty suns might daze.
Sir W. Jones. A Hymn to Nárâyena.

The leading clergy of the 4th [century] understand their interest too well, to part with the old plea of miraculous gifts, which had been found so effectual, to dazzle the senses and possess the minds of the multitude.
Middleton. Free Enquiry. Introductory Discourse.

DAZE is the name given by Miners to any hard and glittering stone.

DE'ACON, DE'ACONESS, DE'ACONRY, DE'ACONSHIP. } Lat. diaconus; Gr. διάκονος; It. and Sp. diacono; Fr. diacre; Dutch, diaker; Ger. diacon. Gr. διάκονος, qui festinat, qui sedulus est; a diligent servant or minister, from διά-κον-ειν, to serve, to minister diligently; (compounded of διὰ, and κον-εῖν, to hasten, to be diligent.)

Also it behoueth dekenes to be chaaste, not double tunged, not ghouen mych to wyn, not suynge foul wynnynge, that han the mysterie of feith in cleen conscience, but be thei preued first and mynystre so, hauing no cryme.
Wiclif. 1 Timothy, ch. i.

Likewise must the deacons be honest, not double tonged, not geuē vnto muche drynkynge, neither to fylthy lucre: but hauing the mistery of the faith in pure conscience. And let them fyrste be proued, and then let thē minyster, yf they be found faultless. Bible, Anno 1551.

And Rom. xvi. I commende vnto you Phēbe the deaconisse of the church of Cenchris.
Tyndall. Workes. An Answer to Sir Thomas More's Dialogues, fol. 250.

More plainly, if the Scriptures had intended, and held forth as making one church, and the elders of those many churches, to have been elders in common to those churches, as one church, then the deacons of all those churches, should make up a common deaconry; and be deacons in common, unto all those churches in an ordinary way, as the other elders.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. part iv.

Nor do they exercise acts of that office in a set way to other congregations, nor to neighbour congregations more than to another; much less is there a common deaconship of them all.
Id. Ib.

So Epiphanius: There is an order of deaconesses in the church, but not to meddle, or to attempt any of the holy offices.
Taylor. Sermon, part iv. fol. 13. The Divine Institution of the Office Ministerial.

The lowest order of the clergy in the apostolical and our church is, that of a deacon, which deserves a great esteem, because the meanest office in God's house is honourable, and none ought rashly to undertake it, nor suddenly to be admitted into it, because it is the foundation of, and first step toward the higher orders; and being instituted by the inspired Apostles, it is a sacred order, which gives a man power to minister about holy things. Comber. On the Office for making Deacons.

A woman of great piety, and a deaconess in the church, was intimate with the boy's mother; and had often exhorted the child to imitate the Christians, and to be religious.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

By the Writers of the New Testament, DEACON is sometimes used to denote any one who ministers in the service of God; but it is generally employed to designate the third or lowest Order of the Clergy, the origin and reason of whose institution is related in the sixth Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. The foreign or Hellenistic Jews at Jerusalem having complained that their widows were neglected by the Hebrews, or Jews of Palestine, "in the daily ministration" out of the common stock, the Apostles directed the "multitude of the disciples" to select "seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom." They were accordingly presented to the Apostles, by whom they were ordained to this office, by prayer and imposition of hands. From the original of Acts, vi. 2, 4, it appears that there were two classes of Deacons, viz. 1. Διάκονοι τῆς Τραπέζης, Deacons of the TABLE, whose province it was to take care of the alms collected in the Church, and to distribute among the poor, widows, &c.; and 2. Διάκονοι τοῦ Λόγου, Deacons of the WORD, whose business it was to preach and variously instruct the people. After the persecution of the Apostolic Church and the consequent dispersion of its members, the Deaconship of Tables appears to have ceased, together with the community of goods: and Philip, who was one of those Deacons that at first had served tables, applied himself entirely to the preaching of the word. (Acts, viii. 4, &c.) From Saint Paul's description of the qualifications of Deacons, in 1 Tim. iii. 8—13, two properties of their office may clearly be collected: viz. first, that it was an office which, in point of importance, was similar to that of Presbyter, (or Priest,) for the same marks are laid down for Timothy in the choice of Deacons, as in the choice of Presbyters; they were to be men of similar piety and good conduct in every relation of life: and, secondly, the office is described to be probationary; it was designed to be a step to something higher.

In the ages immediately succeeding that of the Apostles, the Deacons were regarded as a sacred Order, though the appellation of Priests was not generally given to them: they were commonly distinguished from Presbyters or Priests, by the names of Ministers and Levites. Certain it is that the ordination of a Deacon differed from that of a Presbyter both in its form and manner, as well as in the gifts and powers conferred thereby. The ordination of a Deacon might be performed by the Bishop alone; because, as the Council of Carthage words it, (Conc. Carth. iv. c. 4,) he was ordained, not to the Priesthood, but to the inferior services of the Church. These services are not mentioned in the form of ordination remaining in the Apostolic Constitutions; but the Bishop prayed, generally, that God would cause his face to shine upon His servant who was then chosen to the office of a Deacon, and fill him with His Holy Spirit and power, as he did Stephen the Martyr, that he, behaving himself acceptably, uniformly and unblamably in his office, might be thought worthy of a higher degree. (Const. Apost. l. viii. c. 18.)

The most common office of a Deacon, was to assist the Bishop and Presbyters at the Altar, and to take care of the holy table, together with the ornaments and utensils belonging to it. He was, further, to receive the offerings of the people, and to present them to the Presbyter, by whom they were presented to God upon the altar; after which, the Deacon publicly repeated the names of those who made the oblations. In some Churches, though not in all, the Deacons read the Gospel, both before and during the Communion service: and in the administration of the Eucharist, they were to distribute the bread and wine to the people present, and also to carry them to such as were absent; but they could not consecrate the elements. In some cases they had the power to administer Baptism.

Another office of Deacons was to direct the people in the exercise of their public devotions in the Church, by giving them notice when each part of the service began, and exciting them to join therein by certain forms of words appointed for that purpose. They were also to give notice to the Catechumens, Penitents, and Energumens, when they were to come up and offer their prayers, and when to depart; and in several prayers they repeated the words before them, in order to teach them what they were to pray for; and, if licensed by the Bishop, but not otherwise, they were allowed to preach, and were empowered to reconcile Penitents to the Church, and to rebuke any irregularities which they might observe during the celebration of divine service. They might be deputed by their Bishops to be their representatives and proxies in General Councils, in which case they sat and voted, not as Deacons, but as proxies, in the room and place of their principals; and in Provincial and Consistorial Synods, they were sometimes allowed, as well as Presbyters, to give their voice in their own names.

During the first two centuries of the Christian Church, the Deacons performed various inferior offices, which were afterwards discharged by Readers, Subdeacons, Catechists, Exorcists, &c. To them, as the Bishop's Sub-almoners, were confided the care of the poor, and the superintendence of the morals of the people; and such evils as they could, they were to redress, but those which were beyond their power, they were to report to the Bishop. In consequence of the multifarious duties which thus devolved upon Deacons, it was usual to have several in the same Church. In some Churches, they were precise in the number seven, in imitation of the first Church of Jerusalem, though this rule was not universal. Deacons were ordained by the Bishops by imposition of hands, and it was lawful for them to have wives; but no one could be ordained until he was twenty-five years of age. (Bingham's Orig. Eccles. book ii. ch. xx.; Suicer Thesaurus Eccles. voce Διάκονος.)

In the United Church of England and Ireland, (as also in the Protestant Episcopal Churches in Scotland and North America,) a Deacon receives ordination by the imposition of hands of a Bishop; in consequence of which he can preach, assist in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and, generally, may perform any sacred office except consecrating the elements and pronouncing absolution. By the Statute 44 George III. c. 43, it is enacted that no person shall be admitted until he shall have attained the age of twenty-three years complete; but this Act is declared not to affect the right of granting faculties, exercised by the Archbishops of Canterbury and Armagh, respectively, viz. to admit at earlier ages; and by 59 George III. c. 60, sec. 1, the two Archbishops of the realm, or the Bishop of London, or any Bishop authorized by any or either of them, may ordain Deacons any persons whom he or they shall deem duly qualified, especially for the purpose of officiating in his Majesty's colonies or foreign possessions. But no person so ordained can afterwards hold any living or other benefice in the United Kingdom, without the previous consent in writing under hand and seal of the Bishop, in whose Diocese such benefice, &c. shall be locally situated; nor without like consent of the Archbishop or Bishop by whose consent he was originally ordained, or of the successor of such Archbishop or Bishop, in case of his demise or translation; nor without producing a testimony of his good behaviour during his residence abroad, from the Bishop in whose Diocese he has officiated, or (if there be not any such Bishop,) from the Governor in Council of the colony wherein he may have resided, or from the Colonial Secretary of State, sec. 2.

At the time when the Liturgy of the Anglican Church was composed, it was the Deacon's office, "where provision is so made, to search for the sick, poor, and impotent people of the parish, and to intimate their estates, names, and places where they dwell, unto the Curate," (that is, to the Rector or Vicar having the cure or care of souls,) "that by his exhortations they may be relieved with the alms of the parishioners or others." (Rubrick in the form of Ordidation.) This was the more ancient office of a Deacon, and this rule was made in England before the establishment of the Poor's Laws; in pursuance of which, that care has now devolved upon the Churchwardens and Overseers of the poor, which last office was specially created for that purpose. For a full statement of the qualifications and duties of Deacons in the United Church, see Burns's Eccl. Law, vol. iii. tit. Ordination.

The office of Deaconess also was known in the ancient Christian Church. This was a female Minister employed in those duties which could not with propriety be exercised by the Deacons themselves. This Order existed in the Apostolic age; for St. Paul makes mention of Phœbe, a servant or Deaconess (Διάκονον) of the Church at Cenchrea, which was a haven of Corinth, (Rom. xvi. 1.) They were ordained by imposition of hands, and were commonly chosen out of the widows of the Church, who had been married once only; it was further required, that they should be at DEACON. DEAD. least forty years old, which age was subsequently extended to fifty or sixty years. Sometimes, however, this office was discharged by virgins. The duties of a Deaconess consisted in the instruction of female Catechumens, and assisting at their baptism; in visiting sick persons of their own sex; and in conveying messages from the Bishops to women that were in health, whom the Deacons could not with propriety visit, for fear of the scandalous imputations which the Heathens might cast upon them. In times of persecution, they were employed in ministering to the Martyrs in prison, because they could obtain a more easy access, and with less suspicion of danger than the Ministers of the Church could do. In the Greek Church, they had the charge of the Church doors; though, probably, it was only in those Churches where a distinction was made between the men's gate and the women's gate. Lastly, it was the business of the Deaconesses to assign to all women their places, and regulate their behaviour in Church; to preside over the rest of the widows; and to introduce any woman having a suit to prefer, to a Presbyter or Bishop.

This order of Ecclesiastical officers ceased to exist in the Latin Church in the Xth or XIth century, and in the Greek or Oriental Church, about the end of the XIIth century. (Bingham's Orig. Eccl. book ii. c. 22.)

DEAD, or De'aden, v. Dead, n. Dead, adj. De'adish, De'adly, adj. De'adly, adv. De'adlihood, De'adliness, De'adness. Ga-dauthnan, mori. Afdauthjan, morti tradere. "A. S. adead-an, fatiscere, to fail or decay, to dye: it. vastare, subruere, mortificare, to lay waste, to destroy, to mortify." Somner. Ger. todten; Dutch, dood-en, mori, necare, to die or cause to die, to kill. Sw. doe, mori, to die: doeda, necare, to cause to die, to kill.

To fail or decay, or dissolve, or cause to fail or decay, or dissolve;—to lose or destroy, sub. motion or sensation; any natural power or quality; to be or make, or cause to be, motionless, senseless, useless; without life, animation, breath, spirit; to have or cause to have any of the peculiar or distinguishing qualities or appearances of any thing dead, of any thing without action or sensation, light or life; the stillness, dullness, darkness, gloominess, sameness.

He drow ys knif, & slow þe kyng, þat no man yt yseyȝ.
He was sone forþ ywent, er any mon were war.
And þo me hadde al y sought, þe kyng lay ded þar.
R. Gloucester, p. 105.

Þe date a þousand right a hundreth & fiftỳ,
Þat Steuen to dede was dight, now comes þe Secunde Henrỳ.
R. Brunne, p. 127.

Lest we felle dedlych sunne [sin] vor vr ỳdelnỳsse.
Id. p. 195.

Ac ouercome vas he noȝt, þeỳ ys wounden [though his wounds] dedlych were. Id. p. 223.

Of Englỳsse al vor noȝt þat valeỳe was neỳ
As heỳe ỳfuld mỳd dedemen, as þe doune an heỳ.
Id. p. 362.

And he wonded þe kỳng dedely fulle sore.
Id. p. 33.

That ys to seỳe sothliche. ȝe sholde raþer deỳe.
Than enỳ dedliche sỳnne do.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 121.

And of the risynge agen of ded men have ye not red, that it is seide of the Lord, that seith to you, I am God of Abraham, and God of Isaac, and God of Jacob, he is not God of dede men but of lyvynge men. Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xxii.

As touchinge the resurrectiō of the deade: haue ye not redde what is sayde vnto you of God, which saythe: I am Abraham's God, and Isaac's God, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the deade: but of the lyuynge.
Bible, Anno 1551. Matthew, ch. xxii.

For thei seiynge that himsilf werin wise thei werin maad foolis & thei chaungiden the glorie of God uncorruptible into the liknesse of an ymage of a deedli man and of briddis and of four footid beestis and of serpentis. Wiclif. Romayns, ch. i.

Ne certes she was fatte nothing
But semed wery for fasting
Of colour pale and dedde was she.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose.

When she had swounded, with dedly chere,
That it was reuthe for to seen and here.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 915.

And thus there were many dede,
Her heades stondinge on the gate.
Gower. Conf. Am. book viii. fol. 176.

Wherof the seruant as he hadde,
Whan he was deade, his sonne hath ladde
To Bethuel, where he Robecke
Hath wedded with the white necke.
Id. Ib. book viii. fol. 174.

Thus hate I deadely thilke vice.
Id. Ib. book iii. fol. 59.

And the Duke of Gloucester aduertised of hys desyre, caused him in the dead of the night after al other folk auoyded, to be brought to him in his secret chamber.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 69. History of King Richard III.

And he seide, nay fadir Abraham but if ony of deed men go to hem: thei schulen do penaunce. And he seide to him, if thei heren not Moyses and profetis: neither if ony of deed men rise agen thei schulen byleeue to him. Wiclif. Luke, ch. xvi.

And he sayde: naye father Abraham, but if one came vnto them, from the dede they woulde repente. He sayde vnto hym: If they heare not Moses and the prophetes, neyther wil they beleue though one rose from death agayne.
Bible, Anno 1551. Luke, ch. xvi.

Lest that suche short forgeuenes, as wel of al the payne as of the displeasure of God, and of the deadlynesse, or as men might say, of the damnabilitie belōging to the mortall offence, myght make men waxe the worse, & sette much the lesse by sinne.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 438. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

The proof hath been, that both beer and wine, (as well within water as above,) have not been palled or deaded at all.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. iv. sec. 385.

A sad course I liue now; heauen's sterne decree
With many an ill, hath numb'd and deaded me.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book xviii. fol. 282.

Now this deceives men, when they look back to the vanities, which they have forsaken; how deadned are they to those sinful ways, which before they much delighted in?
Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 732.

AMA. Cruel, thou hast struck me deader with thy voice
Than if the angry heavens with their quick flames
Had shot me through.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Faithful Shepherdess, act i. sc. 1.

Thei pierce the turfiie ground, and under it meet with a black and deadish water, and in it small fishes do swim.
Fuller. Worthies. Lancashire.

As for my relapses, I confess them with sorrow and shame, I know their danger, and (had I not to do with an infinite mercy) their deadlinesse.
Hall, vol. iii. fol. 635. Satan's Fiery Darts Quenched. Decad. 2.

How comes it then, that in so near decay
We deadly sleep in deep security,
When every hour is ready to betray
Our lives to that still watching enemy?
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, can. 7.

They said that by the deadness of trade they did want employment, in such a measure, as did make their lives very uncomfortable.

Clarendon. History of Rebellion, &c. vol. i. part ii. p. 412.

Oh, my dear angel! in that friend I've lost
All my soul's peace; for every thought of him
Strikes my sense hard, and deads it in my brain.

Otway. Venice Preserved, act iv. sc. 2.

This motion of the parts of the sounding bell may be further argued by this; that if the finger, or some other soft body, be laid upon it, the sound will be checked or deaded, and much more if a broad string, though of a soft substance, be tied about it.

Boyle. On Languid and Unheeded Motion.

And, by his mother, stood an infant Love
With wings unfledg'd; his eyes were banded o'er;
His hands a bow, his back a quiver bore,
Supply'd with arrows bright and keen, a deadly store.

Dryden. Palamon and Arcite.

When he seemed to show his weakness in seeking fruit upon that fig-tree that had none; he manifested his power, by cursing it to deadness with a word. South. Sermon 1. vol. vii.

Vary both your style and your elocution, as in conversation you always do, suitably to your matter. For monotony both absolutely prevents emotion, and soon deadens attention.

Secker. Eight Charges, char. 8.

In the general opinion and estimation of mankind, the raising of the dead hath passed for an act of the most extraordinary power. The Pagans in general thought it incredible, and some of them said it was an utter impossibility, and one of those things which God himself could not do.

Jortin. Discourses concerning the Christian Religion, disc. 1.

Gods! I behold a prodigy. My spear
Lies at my foot, and he, at whom I cast
The weapon with such deadly force, is gone.

Cowper. Homer. Iliad.

And are you sure, that old age will come with all these circumstances inviting to repentance? It may be, and is very likely to be, to life, what the winter is to the year, a time of chillness and numbness, and of deadness of the faculties for repentance.

Pearce. Sermon 16. vol. iii.

DEAD, in Composition.

I cannot brook that face, which (dead-alive)
Shows a quick body, but a bury'd will.

Daniel. Musophilus.

And for your dead-bait for a pike. For that you may be taught by one day's going a fishing with me, or any other body that fishes for me. Walton. Angler, part i. ch. viii.

——————— While they slaughter'd these,
That were engag'd in all th' aduantages,
The close-mouth'd, and most dead-calm hauen could giue;
I (that without lay) made some meanes to liue.

Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book x. fol. 148.

But why doth Balbus his dead-doing quill
Parch in his rusty scabbard all the while;
His golden fleece o'ergrowne with mouldy hoare,
As though he had his witty works forswore.

Hall. Satire 1. book vi.

Woe worth the man that comes in the way of so dead-doing a tool, and when wielded with the arm of such a Scanderbeg as our author.

Marvell. Works. The Rehearsal Transposed, vol. ii. p. 154.

It is a wonderful work to see how Christ gives to poor weak souls, ignorant and dead-hearted afore conversion; how he gives, I say a glorious liberty and freedom this way, to ask what concerns their own salvation.

Goodwin. Works. Of Christ the Mediator, vol. iii. fol. 404.

See then and confess how just cause we have to condemn the dead-heartedness wherewith we are subject to be possessed: and how many worthy Christians there are in the world, who bear a part with us in this just blame.

Hall. Christ Mystical, sec. 10. vol. iii. fol. 598.

QUEEN. Ah cut my lace asunder,
That my pent heart may have some scope to beat,
Or else I swoone with this dead-killing newes.

Shakspeare. Richard III. fol. 193.

O blessed letters! that combine in one
All ages past, and make one live with all.
By you we do confer with who are gone
And the dead-living unto council call.

Daniel. Musophilus.

WAR. How now, my noble lord? What all a-foot.
YOR. The deadly-handed Clifford slew my steed.

Shakspeare. Henry VI. Second Part, fol. 145.

He with my name that kindly did him greet,
Slowly cast up his deadly-moving eye
That long time had been fixed on his feet,
To look no higher than his misery.

Drayton. The Legend of Thomas Cromwell.

No member e'er with softer sympathy
The wounds of its fraternal part could feel,
Than she that deadly-spreading malady
Which now had tainted Albion's commonweal.

Beaumont. Psyche, can. 22. st. 239.

What signifies my deadly-standing eye,
My silence, and my cloudy melancholie.

Shakspeare. Titus Andronicus, fol. 37.

And that these drifts th' effects of this peace are;
Which gives more deadly-wounding blows than war.

Daniel. The History of Civil War, book vii.

With as good a plea might the dead-palsy boast to a man, 'tis I that free you from stitches and pains, and the troublesome feeling of cold and heat, of wounds and strokes; if I were gone, all these would molest you.

Milton. Reason of Church Government, vol. i.

And here it is necessary to be remembered, that there are two ways of snapping for pike, viz. with the live and with the dead-snap. Walton. Angler, part i. ch. viii.

Now, lest such frightful shows of Fortune's fall,
And bloody tyrant's rage, should chance apall
The dead-struck audience, midst the silent rout,
Comes leaping in a self-misformed lout,
And laughs, and grins, and frames his mimic face,
And justles straight into the prince's place.

Hall. Satire 3. book i.

But, if he would be worth a poet's pen,
He must be more a fool, and write again:
For all the former fustian stuff he wrote,
Was dead-born doggrel or is quite forgot.

Dryden. Prologue to the Pilgrim.

For after slaughter of foes, and routing of armies by such a dead-doing hand, no body thinks it strange to find them all alive again safe and sound upon their feet, and in a posture of defending themselves. Locke. On Toleration.

He [Lord Grey] staid in the messenger's hands all night, whom he furnished so liberally with wine that he was dead-drunk.

Burnet. Own Times. Anno 1683.

Or buys corrupted cassia from the Jews?
All these, the wiser Bestius will reply,
Are empty pomp, and dead-men's luxury.

Dryden. Persius. Satire 6.

I have lately seen so many smitten with dead-palsies, apoplexies, and giddiness, that I take my own malady for a proof of a special deliverance.

Boyle. Letters from several Persons, vol. vi. p. 121.

No, sure, the grisly king of terrour
Has been to blame, and in an errour,
To issue his dead-warrant forth
To seize a knight of so much worth,
Just in the nick of all his glory.

Butler. Hudibras. Elegy.

Here take thy rest within this hallow'd ground,
Till the last trump emit the dead-awakening sound.

Boyse. The Vision of Patience.

DEAD. — DEAF.

Never literary attempt was more unfortunate than my Treatise of Human Nature. It fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction as even to excite a murmur among the zealots. Hume. Life. Written by Himself.

Every artist must have remarked, how often that lightness of hand, which was in his dead colour, or first painting, escaped in the finishing, when he had determined the parts with more precision. Sir Joshua Reynolds. Discourse 14.

The stranger [Kneller] was to draw the picture as he could; and perform'd it with such facility and expedition, that his piece was in a manner finished, when Lely's was only dead-coloured. Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iii. p. 203.

DEAF, or DE'AFEN, v. DEAF, adj. DE'AFELY, DE'AFNESS, DEAF-BORN, DEAF-MURMURING. A. S. deaf-ian, adeaf-ian, surdescere; Dan. doof; Ger. taub; Swe. dofw-a, sensu privare, to deprive of sense or sensation. And Wachter and Junius agree that that is deaf, which has lost any of its natural strength. Deaf corn, is barren corn. A deaf nut, Grose says, is a nut whose kernel is decayed. And deafely;—lonely, solitary, far from neighbours. As now restricted, to deafen, is

To deprive of the sense of hearing; to stun the sense of hearing.

" þat ẏs vor noẓt," þe oþer seẏde, " vor þe folke's herte ys,
" So ẏharded, þat hii beþ blẏnde & deue ẏwẏs,
" þat hii nolleþ non god þẏng ẏhure ne ẏse."
R. Gloucester, p. 352.

For God is def now a daẏes. and deẏneþ nouht ous to huẏre.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 186.

Blind men seen, crokide goen, mesels ben maad clene, defe men hereu. Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xi.

And said, frend, though that I still lie
I nam not deefe, now peace and cry no more
For I haue herd thy words, and thy lore.
Chaucer. Troilus, book i. fol. 155.

Heare, O ye deafe men, and sharpen your sightes to se (O ye blynde.) But who is blynder, than my seruaunte? Or so deafe, as my messaungers, whome I sente vnto them?
Bible, Anno 1551. Isaye, ch. xlii.

Monardus writeth that a little of the powder of that horne put into the ear cureth deafenesse.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Sir Walter Ralegh, vol. iii. fol. 650.

This eager river seems outrageously to roar,
And counterfeiting Nile, to deaf the neighbouring shore.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 13.

——— I will stay here,
It is enough, my hearing shall be punish'd,
With what shall happen, 'gainst the which there is
No deafing, but to hear.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Two Noble Kinsmen, act v. sc. 1.

Now had the stilnesse of the quiet night
Drown'd all the world in silence and in sleepe,
When suddenly we heard a dreadfull sound,
Which deaf the earth, and tremble made the ground.
Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book viii. st. 16.

What shall be the harmony of hell, where the ears shall be deafned with the cries and complaints of the damned.
Taylor. Contemplations, book ii. ch. vii.

——— The hollow Abyss
Heard farr and wide, and all the host of hell
With deafning shout return'd them loud acclaim.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book ii. l. 520.

He answered that it was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of deafness that had held him fourteen years: which being found true, the witness was rejected.
State Trials. The Trial of the Earl of Strafford.

A blind or deaf man has infinitely more reason to deny the being, or the possibility of the being, of light or sounds; than any atheist can have to deny or doubt of, the existence of God.
Clarke. On the Attributes.

While, from below, old Ocean groans profound,
The walls, the rocks, the shores repel the sound,
Ring with the deafening shock, and thunder all around.
Rowe. To the Earl of Godolphin.

The crowd would more delight the laughing sage,
Than all the farce and follies of the stage;
To think that asses should in judgement sit,
In solid deafness, on the works of wit.
Francis. Horace. Epistle 1. book ii.

——— With a shout
All sprung towards the ships: up flew the dust
And overhung them; deafning were the cries,
To clear the grooves and slide the barks to sea.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book ii.

The deafness seems the unconquerable part of the malady: for none deaf and dumb from their birth have been brought to hear.
Horsley. Sermon 11. vol. i.

And, when the heav'nly Ephphatha was spoke,
The deaf-born heard, the dumb-born silence broke.
Harte. Religious Melancholy.

When lo! a sound, amid the wave-worn rocks,
Deaf-murmuring rose, and plaintive roll'd along
From cliff to cavern.
Mallet. Amyntor and Theodora.

DEAL, n. DEAL, v. DE'ALER, DE'ALING, n. DEAL-BOARDS. Goth. dail-jan; A. S. dæl-an, dividere, partiri, distribuere, to divide, to distribute, to impart, to deale. Somner. Dutch, deyl-en; Ger. theil-en,

To deal cards, is to share or distribute them among the company; to deal in business, is to share or partake or participate in business or the concerns of business; and thus,

To trade or traffic, or treat with, to have any transactions with.

A deal-board;—a board dealt or divided from a larger mass or trunk.

þer aftur euene a two he delede hys kyndom,
And ẓef hys twei doẓtren half, & half hym self nom.
R. Gloucester, p. 31.

From Douere in to Chestre tilleþ Watlinge-strete,
From souþ est in to norþ west, and þat ys some del grete.
Id. p. 8.

þo þe kẏngys' counseyl wuste þys, hyt was som dele adrad.
Id. p. 169.

To while þat þise men bold with þer folk gan daile,
Sir Robert de Brus þe old to Dauid gan trauaile.
R. Brunne, p. 116.

Parfaẏ. quoth Pacience. propeliche to telle
In English hit is ful harde. ac som del ich shal telle þe.
Piers Ploukman. Vision.

Let nat þẏ lyft half. oure Lord techeþ
Ywite what þow delest. with þy rẏht sẏde.
Id. Ib. p. 41.

And whan he hadde take the fyve looues and twey fisches: he biheelde into heuene, and blesside and brak, and delide to hise discipilis: that thei schulden sette forth bifore the cumpanyes.
Wiclif. Luke, ch. ix.

And of her good to him deles
And yeueth him part of her ioweles.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 141.

That selie Dido hath now such desire
With Eneas her newe gest to deale
That she lost her hewe and eke her heale.
Id. Of Dido, Queene of Carthage, fol. 203.

His garment was euery deale
Ipourtraied and iwrought with floures
By diuers medeling of coloures.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 128.

A good wif was ther of beside Bathe,
But she was som del defe, and that was scathe.
Chaucer. Prologue, v. 448.

And eke when I maie here saine
Tidynges of my ladies hele,
All though I maie not with hir dele:
Yet am I wonder glad of that.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 23.

Be so that he the halue dele
Hem graunt. Id. Ib. book v. fol. 95.

Henry Donn said, do the people expect I should say any thing? I was acquainted I confess with their practices, but I never did intend to be a dealer in them.
State Trials. Proceedings against Mary Queen of Scots.

Therefore shal the Lorde rewarde me after my righteous dealynge, and accordynge vnto the cleannesse of my handes in his eye syghte. Bible, Anno 1551. Psalme 18.

If I could once recover my prince's favour, then would I soon shake off all dealing with the Scottish queen.
State Trials. Trial of Robert Hickford.

To thee, O greatest goddesse, onely great,
An humble suppliant loe! I lowly fly.
Seeking for right, which I of thee entreat;
Who right to all dost deale indifferently.
Spenser. Of Mutabilitie, can. 7. st. 14.

He three jewels, as thou knowest well,
A ring, a brooch, and a cloth, thee bequeath,
Whose vertues he thee told every deal,
Or that he past hence and yalde up the breath.
Browne. The Shepheard's Pipe. Eclogue 1.

Opinion's stamp does virtue currant make;
But such small money (though the people's gold
With which they trade) great dealers skorne to take,
And we are greater than one world can hold.
Davenant. Gondibert, book i. can. 3.

To be officious getteth friends,
Plaine dealing hated is,
Yeat better plainly to reproue,
Than fainedly to kisse.
Warner. Albion's England, book xi. ch. lxi.

Having with great importunity (as a thing upon which the service depended) gotten from the commissioners of Devon above a thousand deal-boards to make huts for the soldiers, he employed them all in the building a great riding house at Buckland for their own pleasure.
Clarendon. History of Rebellion, &c. vol. ii. part ii. p. 675.

Abraham, potent prince, the friend of God,
Of human ills must bear the destin'd load;
Must deal just portions of a servile life
To a proud hand-maid and a peevish wife.
Prior. Solomon. Power, book iii.

Though the Earl of Clarendon did often prevail with the king to alter the resolutions taken there, he was forced to let a great deal go that he did not like.
Burnet. Own Times. Anno 1661.

Arthur More, who had risen up from being a footman without any education, to be a great dealer in trade, and was the person of that board in whom the lord-treasurer confided most, moved that they might first read it every one apart, and then debate it.
Id. Ib. Anno 1713.

The generality of these have been very malignant and much disaffected to a parliamentary or thorough reformation, and from whom they cannot but expect very severe dealings.
Cobbett. Parliamentary History. 23 Charles I. 1647.

I have several times seen viscous exsudations disclose themselves like drops of turpentine upon deal-boards, which had been made use of about building.
Boyle. The History of Fluidity, part i. sec. 27.

But this is not all: the example shows a great deal more.
Bolingbroke. The Spirit of Patriotism.

Lord of his own paternal field,
He liberal dealt his store;
And call'd the stranger to his feast,
The beggar to his door. Logan. A Tale.

It [charity] must preside with a superiority over all the desires of our hearts, that neither wantonness nor lust, nor anger and revenge, nor covetousness and ambition, may carry us aside from the ways of righteousness and equity in our dealings one with another. Sherlock. Discourse 88. DEAL. — DEAN.

Every body has not the wit of the ingenious Mr. Warburton, and I confess myself not to be his match in that species of wit which he deals out so lavishly in his notes upon all occasions.
Edwards. Canons of Criticism. Preface.

DEALBATION, Lat. albus; Gr. ἀλφὸς, white; which Scheidius supposes to have the same origin with ἄλφιτον, farina hordeacea, barley-meal; and to have signified originally commolita, bruised or ground; and thence applied to colour, quod farina commolita album colorem præbet, because meal bruised or ground, or rather corn ground to meal presents a white colour.

I have been here time enough in conscience to pass all the degrees and effects of fire, as distillation, sublimation, mortification, calcination, solution, discension, dealbation, rubification, and fixation. Howell. Letter 42. book ii.

PHIL. To see her negligence! she hath made this cheek
By much too pale, and hath forgot to whiten
The natural redness of my nose; she knows not
What 'tis wants dealbation.
Randolph. The Muse's Looking-glass, act iv. sc. 1.

DEAMBULA'TION, DEA'MBULATORY, adj. DEA'MBULATORY, n. De, and ambul-are. For ἀναπολῶ is used ἀμπολῶ, whence ambul-o. Πολ-εῖν, is the same as στρέφ-ειν, i. e. vertere, to turn, to turn about. Vossius adds, It is spoken of men going about this way, and that; as herdsmen do when following their rambling cattle.

Let them beware lest iustice, equite, and iudgment be neglected, as they were in this kyngis ydle deambulacion.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. iv.

To vchinge suche exercises, as may be vsed within the house, or in the shadowe (as is the olde maner of speakynge) as deambulations or moderate walkynges.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i. ch. xv.

The deambulatory actors used to have their quietus est, and to forego their employments for want of continuance more or less.
Bishop Morton. Episcopacy Asserted, p. 142.

The sides of every street were covered with fresh alures [allies] of marble or cloisters, crowned with rich and lofty pinnacles, and fronted with tabernacular or open work, vaulted like the dormitory of a monastery, and called deambulatories, for the accommodation of the citizens in all weathers.
Warton. History of England, part ii. p. 93.

DEAN, DE'ANERY, DE'ANESS, DE'ANSHIP. Sp. dean; Fr. doyen; It. decano; Ger. eyn dechant; Dutch, deken; Sax. decen; Lat. decanus; Gr. δεκάνος; from δέκα, decem, ten; because a Deane is an Ecclesiastical Magistrate, and hath power over ten Canons at the least. Minsheu.

Sir Alisander was hie dene of Glascow.
R. Brunne, p. 337.

On the 2d of June 1572, about eight in the morning, the duke was brought to a scaffold erected on Tower-hill, attended by Alexander Nowel, dean of St. Pauls.
State Trials. Trial of the Duke of Norfolk.

Out of the first sort, that is to sale, of such as are called to the ministerie (without respect whether they be married or not) are bishops, deanes, archdeacons, and such as haue the higher places in the hierarchie of the church elected.
Holinshed. England, book ii. ch. i.

But as the number of Christians increased, so first monasteries, than finallie parish churches were builded in euerie iurisdiction: from whence I take our deanerie churches to haue their originall, now called mother churches, and their incumbents archpriests.
Id. Ib

DEAN.
—
DEAR.

Here wont the dean, when he's to seek,
To sponge a breakfast once a week;
To cry the bread was stale, and mutter
Complaints against the royal butter.
Swift. A Pastoral Dialogue.

A good pension was settled on the dean, until the said pension was redeemed, according to Denny's phrase, with the dignity of the deanery of Lincoln, afterwards conferred on him.
Strype. Life of Parker.

Then we'll buy English silks for our wives and our daughters,
In spite of his deanship and journeyman Waters.
Swift. An excellent New Song.

I call not to that heart which is a stranger to the throbs and yearnings of curiosity, so excited, to justify the abbess of Quedlingberg, the prioress, the deaness, and sub-chauntress for sending at noon-day for the trumpeter's wife.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy. Tale of Slaukenburgius.

In the English Church the DEAN is the next Ecclesiastical Officer to the Bishop, and in Cathedral establishments he is the President of the Chapter. The Deaneries in England are of two kinds, those existing before the Reformation, and those translated by Henry VIII. from Priories and Convents. The new Deaneries to old Bishoprics are Canterbury, Carlisle, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Winchester, and Worcester; the new Deaneries to new Bishoprics are Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, and Peterborough. To all of these new Deaneries the King appoints at once by Letters Patent, without election or confirmation. In appointing to old Deaneries the form is similar to that by which a Bishopric is given. The King issues a Congé d'élire, and at the same time recommends a particular candidate. The Chapter elects, the King approves, and the Bishop confirms him.

In the Welsh Cathedrals the Bishop of St. David's and Llandaff are quasi Decani; and St. Asaph and Bangor have the patronage of their respective Deaneries. In Ireland the King appoints by Letters Patent.

The title of Dean is also used in some Collegiate and other Institutions without implying any Diocesan jurisdiction, as in Battle, Bocking, Brecon, St. Buriens, Manchester, (commonly called Warden,) Middleham, Ripon, Southwell, Westminster, Windsor, and Wolverhampton. Rural Deans formerly exercised jursdiction over ten Parishes as the Bishop's deputies; the office still exists, but the duties for the most part are performed by the Archdeacon and Chancellor of each Diocese.

Du Cange (ad voc Decanus) cites a passage from Hist. Eccl. S. Aniani Aurelian. 92, 111, by which it appears that some Deans enter upon their functions in a manner somewhat more secular than our notions of Ecclesiastical severity require: In quibusdam Ecclesiis Decani dignitatis suæ possessionem ineunt, superpellicio induti, gladio cincti, perâ instructi, calcaribus aureis pedes revincti, cum accipitre in pugno.

DEAR, v.
DEAR, n.
DEAR, adj.
DE'ARLING,
DE'ARLESS,
DE'ARNESS,
DE'ARTH.

The old English verb to Dere, A. S. der-ian, is, nocere, lædere, to hurt, to do mischief. Dearth is the third person singular, and means some or any season or weather, or other cause, which dereth or maketh dear, hurteth or doeth mischief. See Tooke, ii. 409.

Dearth is applied, consequentially, to the scarcity or want, or barrenness, that is the consequence of the hurt or mischief done. And thus, Dear is Precious, costly, highly or greatly prized or valued, rated or esteemed.

Þo ys moder yslaw was, me blamede hym þerfore.
And seyde, þat heo bogte hym dere, er he were yhore.
R. Gloucester, p. 68.

In this tyme was great deorthe
xii. d. an half peny loof was worthe.
Id. p. 589.

And said, now may ȝe lightly bere
Þise stones to schip, withouten dere.
R. Brunne, (from Wace.) Preface, p. 195.

And said þo stones þei salle haf here,
Þei ralle bie þam first fulle dere. Id. Ib. p. 193.

Thus ich awakede and wrot what ich hadde dremed
And dyghte me derly and dude me to churche
To huyre hollich þe masse.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 366.

Of deþ ne of derþe. drad was he nevere. Id. Ib. p. 280.

And ye shul bothe anon unto me swere,
That never mo ye shul my contree dere
Ne maken werre upon me night ne day.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1824.

And fell in speche of Telephus the king,
And of Achilles for his queinte spere,
For he coude with it bothe hele and dere.
Id. The Squieres Tale, v. 10554.

For when I wote hir good estate,
As for that tyme I dare well swere,
None other sorowe mai me dere.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 23.

Upon a day as he was mery,
As though ther might him no thinge derie.
Id. Ib. book vi. fol. 136.

And thre yere in this wise his lif he ladde,
And bare him so in pees and eke in warre,
There n'as no man that Theseus hath derre, [dearer.]
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale.

For that is dere-bought honour.
Id. The third Booke of Fame, fol. 232.

I may now too derely aby my negligence.
Id. The Remedie for Loue, fol. 323.

And, as Seint Gregory sayth, that precious clothing is culpable for the derthe of it, and for his softnesse, and for his strangenesse and disguising, and for the superfluitee, or for the inordinate scantinesse of it. Id. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 314.

For yet ben there things dwelled to thee ward, that no man doubteth that they ne ben more dereworth to thee, than thyne owne life. Id. The second Booke of Boecius, fol. 217.

And ther was maad a cloude overschadowinge hem, and a voice cam of the cloude, and seyde This is my derworth son: here ye him. Wiclif. Mark, ch. ix.

Lowe nowe my sonne what it is,
A man to caste his eie amis.
Whiche Acteon hath dere abought.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 10.

And thus by sleight, and by conyne
Aros the derth, and the famine.
Id. Ib. book v. fol. 107.

So thik it was with leves grene,
Might no rayn cum thar-bytwene,
And that grenes lastes ay,
For no winter dere yt may.
Ritson. Romances. Ywaine and Gawin, v. 358.

When thou in hand has the stane,
Der sal thai do the nane,
For the stane es of swilk myght;
Of the sal men have no syght. Id. Ib. v. 744.

Then cease we to bee sonnes of God, were we neuer so deare derelynges to him before, and shall neuer be hys sonnes agayne, till we mend againe, and leaue the fleshe agayne, and fall agayne, to the spyryte.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 700. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

EAR.

It grieued Nature muche to see the dede,
Me seems I see hir how she wept, to see hir dearling blede
Gascoigne. Flowers. In praise of Bridges, now Lady Sandes.

I know nothing to the contrary, but that it may be allowed for a good merchantable commodity considering there the small charge for the labour & feeding of men, the infinite store of wood, the want of wood & deerenesse thereof in England, and the necessity of ballasting of ships.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. M. Thomas Heriot, vol. iii. p. 269.

And when the vii. yeres of plenteousness that was in the lande of Egypte, were ended, than came the seuen yeres of derth accordynge as Joseph had sayd.
Bible, Anno 1551. Genesis, ch. xii.

Golden quoifes, and stomachers,
For my lads to giue their deers.
Shakspeare. Winter's Tale, fol. 193.

That I did loue thee Cæsar, O 'tis true:
If then thy spirit looke vpon vs now,
Shall it not greeue thee deerer then thy death
To see thy Antony making his peace,
Shaking the bloody fingers of thy foes?
Id. Julius Cæsar, fol. 220.

O blessed sheepe, O shepheard great,
that bought his flocke so deare:
And them did saue with bloudie sweat,
from wolues that would them teare.
Spenser. Shepheard's Calendar. July.

It is seldome seen that God allowes even to the greatest dearlings of the world a perfect contentment; something they must have to complaine of, that shall give an unsavory verdure to their sweetest morsels; and make their very felicity miserable.
Hall. Cont. Esther suing to Ahasuerus, vol. i. fol. 1345.

1st GENT. His sute is only, sir, to be excus'd.
DUKE. He shall not be excus'd, I love him dearlier:
Say we intreat him; goe, he must not leave us.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Passionate Madman, act ii. sc. 1.

Surely it is no proper address to God, for perseverance in the state of grace, to expect this toleration of a friendship and dearness with our vitious nature.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 6. sec. 2.

I have heard it credibly reported, he was told by a wizard, that could he but come to see the king's face again, he should be reinvested in his former dearness.
State Trials. Trial of the Murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury.

——— The cormorant that lives in expectation
Of a long wish'd-for dearth, and smiling grinds
The faces of the poor, you may make spoil of,
Even theft to such is justice.
Massinger. The Guardian, act ii. sc. 4.

The courtesie for which the Romans was to thank him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately been supplied with corn, in a time of extreme dearth; when the miseries of war had made all their own provinces unable to relieve them.
Ralegh. History of the World, book v. ch. iv. sec. 8.

'Tis hard to judge if Clymene were mov'd
More by his prayer, whom she so dearly loved,
Or more with fury fir'd to find her name
Traduc'd, and made the sport of common fame.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book i.

But the peace between the two kings, whatever mutual dearnesses there had appeared, was but short.
Strype. Memorials, book i. ch. ii. Anno 1521.

For I find the dearth at this time was very great. Wheat was at four marks the quarter; malt, at two pound four shillings; pease, at two pound five shillings.
Burnet. History of the Reformation. Anno 1557.

Without being liable to any charge of want of zeal for the public service, he might have passed the rest of his days in the command to which he had been appointed in Greenwich Hospital, there to enjoy the fame he had dearly earned in two circumnavigations of the world.
Cook. Third Voyage. Introduction.

To this cause he attributes a certain supposed dearness of the necessaries of life, which must compel our manufacturers to emigrate to cheaper countries, particularly France, and with them the manufacture.
Burke. Observations on a late State of the Nation.

DEAR. — DEARN.

We had long enjoyed healthy and plentiful seasons, without acknowledging him for the giver of them; and we have since been visited with sickness in all our borders; and such dearth, as few, if any of us, ever knew before.
Secker. Nine Sermons on Rebellion, serm. 2.

DEAR, in Composition.

Pow'rs of my soul be proud!
And speak loud
To all the dear-bought nations this redeeming name.
Crashaw. The name above every name, the name of Jesus.

Maud thus established, all now esteemed her as Fortune's dear darling, and beheld her as the onely rising sunne.
Speed. Stephen, book ix. ch. iv. sec. 32.

He who is high-born never mounts yon battlements
Of sparkling stars, unless he be in spirit,
As humble as the child of one that sweats
To eat the bread of dear-earned honest thrift.
Ford. The Sun's Darling, act i. sc. 1.

A rage whose heat hath this condition;
That nothing can allay, nothing but bloud,
The bloud and deerest-valued bloud of France.
Shakspeare. King John, fol. 11.

Vp he [Vlysses's dog] himselfe rose, fawn'd, and wag'd his sterne;
Coucht close his eares, and lay so; nor discerne
Could euermore his deere-lou'd lord againe.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book xvii. fol. 265.

Yea this writing of God is yet more evident, for we sinned in the dearly-beloved of our father, Joseph, and now we are distressed about our brother Benjamin, the child whom our father loveth · as we have done so God hath requited us.
Mede. Works. Discourse 30.

CHOR. O dearly-bought revenge, yet glorious!
Living or dying thou hast fulfill'd
The work for which thou wast foretold
To Israel. Milton. Samson Agonistes.

Yet art thou not inglorious in thy fate;
For so Apollo, with unweeting hand,
Whilome did slay his dearly-loved mate.
Id. Ode on the Death of a fair Infant, l. 24.

Is not a kiss the dearly-sacred seal
Which cements happy friends' concording hearts?
Must this betrayed be!
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 2. st. 222.

——— That some cross wind again
Robs him of that dear-purchased delight [his home]
He finds a greater storm in 's breast arise
Pouring his sorrow through his mocked eyes.
Id. Ib. can. 3. st. 2.

Shall a father have this power to vindicate his own wilful honour and authority to the utter breach of a most dearly-united marriage, and shall not a man in his own power have the permission to free his soul, his life, and all his comfort of life from the disaster of a no-marriage.
Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

——— Till time and pains
Purchase a dear-bought clue to lead his youth
Through serpentine obliquities of life,
And the dark labyrinth of human hearts.
Young. The Complaint. Night 8.

Here let those reign, whom pensions can incite
To vote a patriot black, a courtier white,
Explain their country's dear-bought rights away,
And plead for pirates in the face of day.
Johnson. London.

Would you suffer the sworn enemy of his family, his life, and his honour, possibly the shame and scandal, and blot of human society, to debauch from his care and protection the dearest pledge, that he has on earth, the sole comfort of his declining years, almost in infantile imbecility; and with it to carry into the hands of the enemy, and the disgrace of Nature the dear-earned substance of a careful and laborious life?
Burke. On the Repealing of the Marriage Act.

DEARN, see DERNE.

DEATH.

DEATH,
DE'ATHFUL,
DE'ATHFULNESS,
DE'ATHLESS, DE'ATHLIKE,
DE'ATHWARD.

I. e. that which deadeth. The third person singular of A. S. dead-ian, to dead or deaden, to kill. See DEAD.

Death is much used in Composition.

As he wolde schete an hert, al ageyne his wille
To deþe he schet ys owne fader, þat he lay þer stille.
R. Gloucester, p. 11.

Dede him toke & he died, als it salle do vs.
R. Brunne, p. 5.

A suÿnhird smote he to dede vnder a thorn busk.
Id. p. 9.

——— And seide I to þe Jewes
That seeþ hym synneles. cesse nat ich hote
To strÿke with stoon oþr with staf. this strompett to deþe.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 231.

Thanne he seide to hem, my soule is sorowful to the deeth, abyde ye heere, and wake ye with me.
Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xxvi.

And whan a beest is ded, he hath no paine;
But man after his deth mote wepe and pleine,
Though in this world he have care and wo,
Withouten doute it maye stonden so.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1322.

But such fortune cam to honde,
That deth, which no king maie withstond,
But euery life it mote obey,
This worthy quene toke away.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 175.

With swerde in honde on him he felle,
And smote hym with a deathes wounde,
That he vnhorsed fell to grounde.
Id. Ib. book iii. fol. 62.

Spreade abrode the swete sauoure of Christ, of it selfe indeede (as I say) to all menne pleasaunte and holsome, but yet to som throughe theyr owne faulte deadlye poyson: holsom to suche, as throughe fayth in the gospell obteyne saluacion, vnholsome and deathlye to such as refuse it. Udall. 2 Corinthians, ch. ii.

For plaie ingendrs tremblinge stryfe,
and stryfe outraginge ire:
Outraging ire, fell spyteful lyfe,
it, deathlyke battle dyre.
Drant. Horace. Epistle to Mæcenas.

At last this odious offspring whom thou seest
Thine own begotten, breaking violent way
Tore through my entrails, that with fear and pain
Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew
Transform'd: but he my inbred enemie
Forth issu'd, brandishing his fatal dart
Made to destroy: I fled, and cry'd out Death;
Hell trembl'd at the hideous name, and sigh'd
From all her caves, and back resounded Death.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book ii. l. 781.

I wretch astonisht was, and thought the deathful doom,
Of heaven, of earth, of hell, of time and place was come.
Sidney. Arcadia, book iii.

And now the deathlesse Gods, and deathfull earth
He sung. beginning at their eithers birth,
To full extent of all their emperie.
Chapman. Homer. A Hymne to Hermes.

What hinders, while we are living and among the living, but that we may study to adorn our looks, so as may be most remote from a deathfulness, and most agreeable by their lovliness to those with whom we live?
Bishop Taylor. Artificial Handsomeness, p. 70.

I sing the progress of a deathless soul,
Whom fate, which God made, but doth not control,
Plac'd in most shapes.
Donne. The Progress of the Soul. First Song.

Happy! to whom this glorious death arrives,
More to be valued than a thousand lives!
On such a theatre as this to die,
For such a cause, and such a witness by.
Waller. Instructions to a Painter.

——— To Philoctetes care
He leaves his deathful instruments of war,
To him commits those arrows, which again,
Must see the bulwarks of the Trojan reign.
Gay. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book ix.

He rais'd the low, and fortify'd,
The weak against the strongest side:
Ill has he read, that never hit
On him in Muses' deathless writ.
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 2.

A sullen, dire, unhospitable cell,
Where deathful spirits and magicians dwell.
Sir William Jones. The Seven Fountains.

So shines our prince. A sky-born crowd
Of virtues round him blaze.
Ne'er shall oblivion's murky cloud
Obscure his deathless praise.
Id. From the Chinese.

DEATH, in Composition.

So when sche had lyffyd þerre mony eyrus, sche was warned by God þat her dethe-day was nyȝte.
R. Brunne. Preface, p. 199.

Bataile þei smÿte strong ynow, and mony slowe to gronde
So þat Fulgence þere hadde deþeis-wond.
R. Gloucester, p. 76.

——— To tellen the sothe,
He draweth to the dethward.
Piers Ploughman. Crede, D. 1.

A certain master of arte which died in Oxford confessed vpon his death-bed, that he had wept lying in his bed an hundreth nyghtes within one yeares space, because he could not beleue it, [that the sacrament is the naturall body.]
Frith. Workes, fol. 150. M. More playeth the Sophister.

Finally there he was taken, and slayne without mercy, and one Thomas Denyce gave him his dethe-stroke.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, ch. 115

Remember that ye bee called to lyfe, but if ye liue carnally, then runne ye headlonge to deathe-warde, but contrary if by the power of the spirite ye suppresse all fleshely desyres, after suche mortifiynge of them, ye shall liue.
Udall. Romaines, ch. viii.

There was a custom among the Jewes that at the feast of Easter, one of them shoulde be loosed whyche laye in pryson for any deathe-worthy offense. Id. Marke, ch. xv.

Faire nymph, surcease this death-alluring languish,
So rare a beautie was not borne for anguish.
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, song 1. book i.

But by our trumpet's death-awakening fright,
Be summon'd from their dust.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 9. st. 211.

'Tis not a time to pity passionate griefs,
When a whole kingdom in a manner lyes
Upon its death-bed bleeding.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Laws of Candy, act i. sc. 1.

Thus doth a death-bed repentance, a death-bed charity, a parting with his sins and wealth, when he can hold them no longer, look as big in the calendars of saints, stand as solemnly and demurely in our diptycks, as judgment and mercy, and faith that have borne the heat and burthen of the day.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. fol. 553.

Cousin, day birds are silenc't, and those fowl,
Yet only sing, which hate warm Phœbus' light:
Th' unlucky parrot, and death-boding owl,
Which ush'ring into heav'n their mistress Night,
Hallow their mates, triumphing o'er the quick spent light.
P. Fletcher. To my beloved Cousin, W. B. Esq.

AMYE. It will, it must, Armostes, thy bold nephew,
Death-braving Ithocles, brings to our gates
Triumphs and peace upon his conquering sword.
Ford. The Broken Heart, act i. sc. 2.

——— Ye all can witness well
(Whom these late death-conferring fates have fail'd to send to hell.) Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book ii. fol. 22.

DEAT

And from each other looke thou lead them thus,
Till o'er their browes, death-counterfeiting sleepe
With leaden legs, and battie-wings doth creepe.
Shakspeare. Midsummer Night's Dreame, fol. 156.

Chast excellence, devout severity,
Courageous temperance, death-daring zeal,
All flourish in his blessed history.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 3. st. 59.

——— Say thou but I,
And that beare vowell I shall poyson more
Then the death-darting eye of cockatrice.
Shakspeare. Romeo and Juliet, fol. 66.

Er' since through man's unwarey heart the strange
Bullet burst ope its death-deriving way.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 9. st. 30.

Whose loyal cruelty might have been fit
To bear a death-designing embassy.
Id. Ib. can. 8. st. 228.

With sprightful zeal this kept their bosome warm,
This made them eagle-like their strength renew,
With death-despising courage this did arm
Their gentlest spirits. Id. Ib. can. 12. st. 221.

Let the priest in surplice white,
That defunctive music can,
Be a death-divining swan,
Lest the requiem lack his right.
Shakspeare. The Passionate Pilgrim, son. 20.

These death-eide basillisques therefore
In euerie sense doe file.
Warner. Albion's England, book ix. ch. li.

Name not these living death-heads unto me
For these not ancient but antique be:
I hate extremes: yet I had rather stay
With tombs than cradles, to wear out the day.
Donne. Elegy 9.

Why dost thou let thy brave soul lie supprest
In death-like slumbers; while thy dangers crave
A waking eye and hand.
Crashaw. Steps to the Temple.

The fearful passage of their death-mark'd love,
And the continuance of their parents' rage,
Which, but their children's end, nought could remove,
Is now the two hours traffick of our stage.
Shakspeare. Prologue to Romeo and Juliet.

——— And in the mature time,
With this vngracious paper strike the sight
Of the death-practis'd duke.
Id. King Lear, fol. 304.

Death was so civil to him as to allow him leave to rise up on his knees, and to crie, "Lord have mercy upon me." Thus a long death-prayer after short piety is not so good, as a short prayer after a long pious conversation.
Fuller. Worthies. Lincolne-shire.

And now as a man forsaken of all hopes, hee begges of his armour-bearer that death's-blow, which else he must (to the doubling of his indignation) receive from a Philistim.
Hall. Cont. The Death of Saul, vol. i. fol. 1083.

And pardon me that I have dwelt so long
On his apostolick consorts; the glory
Of whose death-scorning valor do's no wrong,
Nor interrupts their master's royal story.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 10. st. 173.

Faine would I know (might it our artist please)
Why can his tell-troth Ephemerides
Teach him the weather's state so long beforne,
And not foretell him, nor his fatall horne,
Nor his death's-day, nor no such sad event,
Which he might wisely labour to prevent.
Hall. Satire 7. book iii.

So after they had heard, not onely of Scipio's sickness, but also how he was at death's-door, and did believe it: they presently levyed an army, and went and made war with the Suessitans, which were confederates of the Romans.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 900. Scipio Africanus.

These death-seal'd lips, here they dare give the lie
To the proud hopes of poor Mortality.
Crashaw. Upon Mr. Staninough's Death.

And ever and anon a doleful knell
Comes from the fatall owl, that in sad mood
With drery sound doth pierce through the death-shadowed wood.
More. On the Soul, part i. book ii. st. 21.

These cold and flegmatick considerations are more fit for their declining years, and the winter of their lives; and they resolve they will then think of dying when they are choak'd up with coughs and catarrhs, and can scarce see a death's-head, but through a pair of spectacles. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 29.

What news (sweet Pool) look'st thou my lines should tell,
But like the tolling of the doleful bell
Bidding the death's-man to prepare the grave?
Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles. Queen Margaret to the Duke of Suffolk.

This Earle of Arundel hauing done sundry noble deedes during the warres in France, receiued his death's-wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy.
Speed. Henrie VI. book ix. ch. xvi. sec. 22.

——— What shall I say?
He is so plaguy proud, that the death-tokens of it,
Cry no recouery.
Shakspeare. Troilus and Cressida, fol. 88.

MAR. Alas, the sting of conscience
To death-ward for our faults.
Beaumont and Fletcher. Love's Pilgrimage, act iv. sc. 2.

Men's faults do seldom to themselves appear;
Their own transgressions partially they smother:
This guilt would seem death-worthy in thy brother.
Shakspeare. Rape of Lucrece.

——— If a physician,
So oft I would restore death-wounded men,
That where I liv'd Galen should not be nam'd,
And he that joyn'd again the scatter'd limbs
Of torn Hippolytus should be forgotten.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Custom of the Country, act ii. sc. 2.

His death-charg'd pistols he did fit well.
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 2.

Blest be the bark! that wafts us to the shore,
Where death-divided friends shall part no more:
To join thee there, there with thy dust repose,
Is all the hope thy hapless mother knows.
Thomson. Epitaph on Miss Stanley.

Ingenious to their ruin, every age
Improves the arts and instruments of rage:
Death-hastening ills Nature enough has sent,
And yet men still a thousand more invent.
Waller. Instructions to a Painter.

I have shewn in the Phil. Trans. that the Pediculus fatidicus, Mortisaga, Pulsatorius, or death-watch there described, feedeth upon dust; but that this dust they eat, is powdered bread, fruits, or such like dust, not powdered earth; as is manifest from their great diligence and curiosity in hunting among the dust.
Derham. Physico-Theology, book ii. ch. vi. Notes.

Dumb o'er my pillow hung my watch unwound;
No ticking death-worm told a fancied doom,
No hidden cricket chirrup'd in the room.
Hughes. The Morning Apparition.

——— Hence, finally, by night
The village-matron, round the blazing hearth,
Suspends the infant audience with her tales,
Breathing astonishment! of witching rhymes,
And evil spirits; of the death-bed call
Of him who robb'd the widow, and devoured
The orphan's portion.
Akenside. Pleasures of Imagination, book i.

All, therefore, that a minister of the Gospel can say, is this, that God hath no where promised in the covenant of grace, forgiveness to any repentance, but what is followed by a holy life; and if men are saved, after a course of wickedness, on a death-bed repentance, they are not saved according to any known conditions of the Gospel. Gilpin. Sermon 35.

Alone, appall'd thus had she pass'd
The visionary vale—
When lo! the death-bell smote her ear,
Sad sounding in the gale.
Mallet. Edwin and Emma.

Or, sitting in thy cavern low,
Dost hear the bleak winds loudly blow,
Or the hoarse death-boding owl,
Or village mastiff's wakeful howl.
Dr. Warton. Ode to Solitude.

Immortal bards! whose death-contemning lays
Shall shine distinguish'd with eternal praise.
Langhorne. Studley Park.

For should we now release thee, and dismiss,
Thou wilt revisit yet again the fleet
A spy or open foe; but smitten once
By this death-dealing arm, thou shalt return
To render mischief to the Greeks no more.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book x.

——— Solemn counsels, images of awe,
Truths, which eternity lets fall on man
With double weight, through these revolving spheres,
This death-deep silence, and incumbent shade.
Young. The Complaint. Night 5.

And now the sad solemnity is o'er,
And death-denouncing bells are heard no more.
Fawkes. To his Majesty on his Accession.

Dread sov'reign of the storms! what word is this?
Wouldst thou deliver from the stroke of fate
A mortal man death-destined from of old?
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book xx.

Through Phocis' death-devoted ground
She [Erynnis] flew, and gave the nations round
To the wide waste of war.
Hamilton. Pindar. Olympia. Ode 2.

He pensive oft reviews the mighty dead,
That erst have trod this desolated ground:
Reflects how here unhappy Sal'sbury bled,
When faction aimed the death-dispensing wound.
Langhorne. Written among the Ruins of Pontefract Castle.

——— The dastard changes hue,
And shifts from place to place, nor can he calm
The fears that shake his trembling limbs, but sits
Low-crouching on his hams, while in his breast
Quick palpitates his death-foreboding heart,
And his teeth chatter.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book xiii.

——— From the toils of some distressful dream
To break away, with palpitating heart,
Weak limbs, and temples bathed in death-like dew,
Makes many a painful effort.
Akenside. Pleasures of Imagination, book iii.

Those philosophers in short, prepared a death-song, if I may say so, which the Grecian patriots and heroes might make use of upon the proper occasions.
Smith. Moral Sentiments, part vii. sec. 2.

Before they can obtain their ends,
To sign death-warrants for their friends.
Churchill. The Ghost, book iv.

But, alas! the poor gentleman will never go from hence, said the landlady to me, for I heard the death-watch all night long; and, when he dies, the youth, his son, will certainly die with him; for he is broken-hearted already.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. vii.

——— Should I from the suitor's hands
Receive a death-wound privately at home,
And leave my substance to be shar'd by them,
I rather wish those treasures thine than theirs.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book xvii.

"His doom was seal'd—he knew it well,
Warn'd by the voice of stern Taheer,
Deep in whose darkly boding ear
The death-shot peal'd of murder near,
As filed the troop to where they fell!"
Lord Byron. The Giaour.

DEAURATE, Lat. deauratus; Sp. dorado; It. dorato. "Fr. dore; gilt over; also, of gold; also, fair, beautiful, brightly shining." Cotgrave.

And while the twilight and the rows rede
Of Phebus light were deaurat alite
A penne I tooke.
Chaucer. The Blacke Knight, fol. 273.

DEBACCHATIONS, Lat. debacchari, to revel like a Bacchanal. "Fr. debaccher, to rave, rage, rail, take on like a drunken man." Cotgrave.

What confidence can such have of the suffrage of the saints, who defile their holiday with most foolish vanities, most impure pollutions, most wicked debacchations, and sacrilegious execrations. Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. fol. 538. act vi. sc. 12.

DEBAR, de, and bar. See BAR. Goth. and A. S. bairg-an, beorg-an, birg-an, byrg-an, to bar, to defend, to guard.

To guard against, to prevent.

But man alone, alas the hard stound
Ful cruelly, by kinds ordinaunce
Constrained is and by statute bound
And debarred from all such pleasaunce.
Chaucer. The Floure of Curtesie, fol. 249.

Your honour writeth of the debarring of your merchants at the seaport from their accustomed libertie of interchangeable trafficke and bartar.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Emperor's last Priuilege, vol. i. fol. 505.

His song was all a lamentable lay,
Of great vnkindness, and of vsage hard,
Of Cynthia the lady of the sea,
Which from her presence, faultlesse him debar'd.
Spenser. Colin Clouts come home againe.

Nature itselfe taught men to joyne alwayes well-favourednesse with profitablenesse. As in man, that joynte or piece which is by any chaunce deprived of his comlinesse, the same is also debarred of his use and profitablenesse. Ascham. The Schole Master.

Whether God (who can turn the afflictions of his friends into advantages,) oppose the felicities of his enemies, and debar their injustice to his adherents, since this last seems the lesser prerogative?
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 4. part ii. sec. 2.

Hereby the Apostle not only debarred women from prophesying, but from any public function in the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.
Strype. Life of Aylmer, ch. xiii.

When we see men acting thus against the precepts of reason, and the instincts of nature, we cannot hesitate to determine, that by some means or other they were debarred from choice.
Johnson. On the State of Affairs in 1756.

DEBARE, found only in Drant, and meaning simply Bare, q. v.

As wooddes are made debayre of leaues
by turning of the yeare,
The oldest fall: so antique age of words away do weare.
Drant. Horace. The Arte of Poetrye, A. 2.

DEBA'SE, DEBA'SEMENT, DEBA'SER. } Gr. βάσις, that upon which we tread or go, (from βαίν-ειν, to go.) To put or bring low, to deject or cast down, to lower, to degrade.

King Edward the Third in the sixteenth year of his reign proclaimed, that no man should sell wool-fels or leather, under such a price, so that these staple commodities might not be debased, and this at no place but at Northampton and Anwick.
State Trials. The great Case of Impositions.

SAM. So let her go, God sent her to debase me,
And aggravate my folly, who committed
To such a viper his most sacred trust
Of secresie, my safety and my life.
Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 999.

——— Record, thou spirit of truth,
With what debasement I have thrown myself
To under-officers, only to learn
The truth, the party, time, means, the place,
By whom, and when, and where thou wert disgraced.
Marston. The Malcontent, act i. sc. 7.

BASE. — BATE.

What more debases man than to consecrate the flower of his esteem and affections to unworthy objects, and many times to things, wherein were no signs of life, much less any ray of divinity. Bates. On the Existence of God, ch. i.

Is it for moral imperfections or blemishes; for vicious habits or actual misdemeanours? these indeed are the only debasements and disparagements of a man; yet do they not expunge the characters of divinity impressed on his nature.
Barrow. Sermon 27. vol. i.

Even reason itself, (which, if we have any original faculties, is surely one of them,) is subject to the same law of habit, as the means of improvement or of debasement.
Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, part iii. ch. ii.

Receivers of bribes, extorters of money by threats, debasers of metals, &c. Sir W. Jones. Laws of Menu, ch. ix.

DEBA'TE, v. DEBA'TE, n. DEBA'TEABLE, DEBA'TEFULL, DEBA'TEFULLY, DEBA'TEMENT, DEBA'TER, DEBA'TING. Fr. débattre; Sp. debatir. De, and bate, which Skinner thinks is the A. S. beat-an, to beat, to strike. See BATE; and also Batten, in Wachter, and Batre, in Menage. More generally To fight, quarrel, strive, struggle, contend;—to dispute, argue, discuss, examine.

And on þe day of þe Trinitie nexte suyng was a gret debaat (in the cite of Yorke saith Caxton) by Henaudys & Englysshmen, & in þat murþer þer were sleye in þe erldom of Nychol iiii. skore. R. Gloucester, p. 690.

Nother bost ne debat. beo among em alle.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 379.

And over that his cote-armoure
As white as is the lily floure,
In which he would debate.
Chaucer. The Rime of Sir Thopas, v. 267.

And but I tel her, I am but dede
And if I tel her, to say right soth
I am a dradde she wol be wroth
Alas, what shal I than do,
In this debate I was so wo
Me thought min hert brast atwaine.
The Dream of Chaucer, fol. 244.

But sodeynly the wynde and rayne
Began vpon the sea debate.
Gower. Conf. Am. book viii. fol. 183.

The queene is come: and whan she herde
Of this mater, how that it ferde,
She sigh debate, she sighe disease
But if she wolde hir doughter please.
Id. Ib. book viii. fol. 179.

When Lucifer was hest in heuen,
And ought moste haue stonde in euen,
Towardes God he toke debate.
Id. Ib. book v. fol. 93.

And it fell that ilke tyme so,
That Rome had warres stronge
Ageyne Carthage, and stoode longe
The two cities vpon debate.
Id. Ib. book v. fol. 95.

Priuy backbiteris, detractouris, hateful to God, debatouris, proude and highe ouer measure. Wiclif. Romaynes, ch. i.

Nowe commeth Tindall and seeth that they shalbe put to flyght and fayne to runne awaie, and therefore willily prouideth a startyng hole, steppynge from playne and euident Scripture, theyr olde speciall playne euidente woordes vnto darke debatable termes of general pithe and substaunce.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 461. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

But yet if ye be so debatefull, and contencious, so desirous of transitorye thynges, whose contempte ye take vpon you.
Udall. 1 Corinthians, ch. vi.

Sir Charles Daver charged him, [Henry Cuffe] when there was a debating of the several enterprizes, which they should undertake, that he did ever bind firmly and resolutely for attempting the court. State Trials. Trial of Sir Christopher Blunt.

Whereby the vulgar may become so wise,
That (with a self-presumption overgrown)
They may the deepest mysteries debate,
Control their betters, censure acts of state.
Daniel. History of Civil War, book vi.

DEBATE. — DE-BAUCH.

For brethren to debate and rip up their falling out in the ear of a common enemy, thereby making him the judge, or at least the well-pleas'd auditor of their disagreement, is neither wise nor comely. Milton. Answer to Eikon Basilikè.

So gan he to discourse the whole debate,
Which that strange knight for him sustained had,
And those two Sarazins confounded late,
Whose carcases on ground were horribly prostrate.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 8.

And shortlie after, Sir James Liermouth was appointed to go as ambassador to England, to make complaint vpon certaine inuasions made by the borderers of England into Scotland, and also for the rising of the debatable ground betwixt the two realmes. Holinshed. Scotland, vol. v. p. 547.

Whereas the petitioners were called up by several and respective writs, under great penalties to attend in Parliament; and have a clear and indubitable right to vote in bills, and other matters whatsoever debatable in parliament by the ancient customs, laws, and statutes of this realm.
Clarendon. History of the Civil War, vol. i. part ii. book iv.

Debatefull strife, and cruel enmitie
The famous name of knighthood fouly shend.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 6.

Vpon the receipt of this most honourable inuitation and offer, there was much debatement in the chappell, where shey sate vpon the earl's behalfe, whether he should accept thereof or no.
Spede. Henry III. book ix. ch. ix. sec. 89.

Out idle words, servants to shallow fools!
Unprofitable sounds, weak arbitrators!
Busy yourelves in skil-contending schools;
Debate where leisure serves with dull debaters.
Shakspeare. The Rape of Lucrece.

They scoffe at all mature delayes, and meditated debateings of matters by consultation, and deliberation; as a thing too much tasting of an oratory veine; and full of tediousnesse; and nothing conduceing to the summe and issues of businesse.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book viii. ch. ii.

For what can synods have at all,
With bear that's analogical?
Or what relation has debating
Of church affairs with bear-bating?
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can 1.

In midst of all the dome, Misfortune sate,
And gloomy Discontent, and fell Debate.
Dryden. Palamon and Arcite.

Then if it be a matter debatable, the court will assign you counsel, but it must be upon a matter fit to be argued.
State Trials. 33 Charles II. 1681.

As I am only giving an opinion on this point, and not at all debating it in an adverse line, I hope I may be excused in another observation. Burke. On the cause of the present Discontents.

At London you may see men sauntering in the Court of Requests, while the most important debate is carrying on in the two houses; and many do not think themselves sufficiently compensated for the losing of their dinners, by all the eloquence of our most celebrated speakers. Hume. Essay 13.

I am grown too old to think of figuring as a parliamentary debater. Anecdotes of the Life of Bishop Watson, vol. ii. p. 162.

DEBA'UCH, v. DEBA'UCH, n. DEBA'UCHEDLY, DEBA'UCHEDNESS, DEBAUCHE'E, DEBA'UCHER, DEBA'UCHERY, DEBA'UCHMENT, DEBA'UCHNESS, DEBA'UCHTNESS. Variously written in our elder writers; Debois, debosh, debauch. Cotgrave, in v. Debaucher, refers to baucher, which he explains;—to rank, order, array, lay evenly. Minsheu thinks the English debosh, and Skinner, the Fr. desbaucher, also, to be compounded of de or des, and baucher; and to signify,—to

DE-BAUCH. put out of rank or order; to turn from the right way. Bauche, Skinner thinks, is the Lat. abacus. Series lapidum vel laterum juxta positorum mensiformis.

"Fr. desbaucher; to debosh, mar, corrupt, spoyle, viciate, seduce, mislead, make lewd, bring to disorder, draw from goodness." Cotgrave.

The Lat. debacchari, to revel like a Bacchanal; Fr. debaccher, seems to present a more simple etymology.

But stage-playes, if we take them in their very best conception, had their rise, their pedigree, and being from idolatrous infidels, and the deboisest Pagans, who were the Deuil's factors in this seruice. Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act i. sc. 2.

Consider, dear brethren, whether it be iust, that out of that mouth of Christians where the body of Christ doth enter in, a deboist song should be brought forth, as the very poyson of the Devill. Id. Ib. act v. sc. 9.

WITTY. ——————— Oh fie cozen,
These are ill courses, you are a scholar too?
CRED. I was drawn into 't most unfortunately,
By filthy deboist company.
Beaumont and Fletcher. Wit at several Weapons, act iv. sc. 1.

In a word, those who make a kind of conscience of drinking, amorous dancing, healthing, dicing, idlenesse, stage playes, and of every sinne at other times, deeme it a part of their piety to make no bones of these, of any deboistnesse or prophanenesse now. Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act viii. sc. 3.

To live civilly and piously in the middest of wicked men, and not to joyne with them in the same excesse of sinne and riot of dissolutenesse and deboistnesse that they run into—with sundry other particulars which I prætermit: are now infallible arguments and symptomes of a rank Puritan.
Id. Ib. part i. act viii. sc. 7.

My purse shall bear me out; a lazy life
Is scurvy and debosh'd.
Ford. The Lady's Trial, act v. sc. 2.

But haughty she did this just match despise
Her pride debauch'd her judgment and her eyes.
Cowley. The Davideis, book iii.

They are generally men, who by speaking against the French, inveighing against the debauches of court, talking of the ill management of the revenue, and such popular flourishes, have cheated the countrys into electing them.
Marvell. Works, vol. i. p. 539. Of the Growth of Popery, &c.

To live severely with the melancholy, merrily with the pleasant, gravely with the aged, wantonly with the young, desperately with the bold, and debauchedly with the luxurious.
Cowley. Essay 1. Of Liberty.

Although it be true, (of great men especially,) that they are the last that know the euills of their owne house, yet either it could not be when all Israel rung of the lewdnesse of Elie's sonnes, that hee onely should not know it, or if hee knew it not, his ignorance cannot be excused; for a reasonable restraint might haue preuented this extremity of debauchednesse.
Hall. Cont. Eli and his Sonnes, vol. i. fol. 1003.

Upon a sudden after the doctor died, which now immediately happened, to the amazement of all that formerly knew them, [they] turned open debauchees. Hammond. Life, fol. 23.

Then thou strong debaucher, and seducer of youth, witness this easie and honest young man.
Ben Jonson. Bartholomew Fayre, act v. sc. 6.

The face of the court was much chang'd in the change of the king; for King Charles was temperate, chaste, and serious; so that the fooles and bawds, mimicks and catamites of the former court grew out of fashion; and the nobility and courtiers, who did not quite abandon their debaucheries, had yet that reverence to the king, to retire into corners to practice them.
Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson.

Whereas a king must be ador'd like a demigod, with a dissolute and hauty court about him, of vast expence and luxury, masks and revels, to the debauching of our prime gentry, both male and female; not in their pastimes only, but in earnest, by the loose employments of court-service, which will be then thought honourable.
Milton. The Ready and Easy way to establish a Free Commonwealth.

He that repents instantly, breaks his habit when it is in ovo, in the shell, and prevents God's anger, and his own debauchment and disimprovement. Taylor. On Repentance, ch. vi. sec. 2.

But thou in time th' increasing ill control,
Nor first debauch the body by the soul;
Secure the sacred quiet of thy mind
And keep the sanctions Nature has design'd.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book x.

The truth of characters, the beauty of order, and the simple imitation of nature, were in a manner wholly unknown to 'em; or thro' petulancy, or debauch of humour, were, it seems, neglected and set aside. Shaftesbury. Advice to an Author, part ii. sec. 2.

Could we but prevail with the greatest debauchees amongst us, to change their lives, we should find it no very hard matter to change their judgments. South. Sermons, vol. i. p. 266.

On the contrary, there is too much cause to fear, that they are not at all sincerely and really desirous to be satisfied in the true state of things, but only seek, under the pretence and cover of infidelity, to excuse their vices and debaucheries; which they are so strongly inslaved to, that they cannot prevail with themselves upon any account to forsake them.
Clarke. On Natural and Revealed Religion.

Not so Silenus from his night's debauch,
Fatigu'd and sick, he looks upon his watch
With rheumy eyes and forehead aching sore.
Wilkie. A Dialogue.

But after a few years, a sad reverse usually appeared. The boy became a spendthrift and a debauchee; alienated his father's affections by incurring debt, and ruined his constitution by every species of excess. V. Knox. Liberal Education, sec. 36.

These philosophers, above all other men, have rendered the human mind the flatterer, the deceiver, and the debaucher of itself, blanda adulatrix, et quasi lena sui.
Bolingbroke. On Human Knowledge.

To be admitted into the company of those, who disgrace the family title which they inherit, thousands plunge into debauchery without passion, into drunkenness without convivial enjoyment, into gaming without the means or inclination for play.
V. Knox. Essays, No. 2.

DEBE'L, DEBE'LLATE, DEBE'LLATING, DEBELLA'TION. Lat. debellare. "Fr. debeller, to subdue, vanquish, overcome." Cotgrave. De, and bellum, war.

The debellacion of Salem and Bizance made by Syr Thomas More, A. D. 1533, after he had gyuen ouer the office of Lorde Chauncellour of Englande.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 929.

No better Spanish Cacus sped,
For all his wondrous strength,
Whom Hercules from out his realme
Debelled at the length.
Warner. Albion's England, book ii. ch. viii.

——————— Him long of old
Thou didst debel, and down from heav'n cast
With all his army.
Milton. Paradise Regained, book iv. l. 605.

They desire (King Edward growne aged) not to seeme by sitting still upon so many thornes of disgrace, & losse, to haue been ouer-warred, and though in two or three battels inferiour, yet not to haue beene clearely debellated.
Speed. Edward III. book ix. ch. xii. sec. 138.

[The example of Hercules] doth notably set forth the consent of all nations and ages, in the approbation of the extirpating and debellating of giants, monsters, and foreign tyrents, not only as lawful, but as meritorious, even of divine honour: and this although the deliverer came from one end of the world unto the other. Bacon. Works, vol. ii. p. 293. Of an Holy War.

DEBELLISH, only found in G. Fletcher; opposed to Embellish, q. v.

Are these the eyes that made all others blind?
Ah! why are they themselves now blemished!
Is this the face, in which all beauty shind?
What blast hath thus his flowers debellished.
G. Fletcher. Christ's Triumph over Death.

DEBE'NTURE, DEBE'NTURE-LAND. } Lat. debentur; from debere, to be due. And so written by Bacon, in the old edition of his Speech to King James, touching Purveyors.

JACK. Wyll, this knave is drunke, let us dresse him,
Let us riffell him so, that he have not one pennie to bless him,
And steale his debenters too.
Edwards. Damon and Pithias.

Nay, farther, they are grown to that extremity, as is affirmed, though it be scarce credible, save that in such persons all things are credible, that they will take double poundage, once when the debenture is made, and again the second time when the money is paid. Bacon. Speech touching Purveyors.

"Then vengeance seize this head of mine,
If I have heard or can divine—
Yet, prithee, where are Cæsar's bands
Allotted their debenture-lands?"
Francis. Horace. Satire 7. book ii.

DEBENTURE, a public written acknowledgment of money due for value received, or services performed, in the nature of a Bond or Bill. Such instruments were issued in this Country by the Commonwealth, 1649, for securing to the soldiers or their assigns the sums due to them for pay, upon the accounts being audited; and they have since been issued to the Army, by virtue of various Acts of Parliament: they are likewise issued to the servants of the King's household, for salaries, board wages, &c.

In 1700, Debentures which had been issued for arrears due to the Officers of the Army, and for Transport-service, and for clothing the Army, were directed to be taken as sterling money, in purchases of the forfeited estates in Ireland of persons convicted of Treason; this provision being insufficient, £5. per cent. interest was allowed on the Debentures, until the principal part of them was subscribed into the original capital of the South Sea Company.

In 1711, Debentures were again issued by the Commissioners for Trade and Plantations to the Proprietors and Inhabitants of the Islands of St. Christopher and Nevis, who had suffered by the invasion of the French in 1705; these Debentures carried £6. per cent. interest, but it was not paid regularly; a part of them was paid off, and the remainder subscribed into £3. per cent. Stock.

Debentures have since been occasionally issued for temporary purposes, particularly after the conclusion of the American war. The Board of Ordnance also issued Debentures to persons contracting for stores, or other articles in that department. In 1784 and 1785, the Ordnance Debentures then outstanding, were provided for by funding them in £5. per cent. Stock.

Debenture, in Commerce, is a Certificate delivered at the Custom-house when the Exporter of any goods or merchandises has complied with the regulations prescribed by Acts of Parliament; in pursuance of which, he is entitled to a bounty or drawback on their exportation.

DE'BILE, DEBI'LITATE, DEBILITA'TION, DEBI'LITATING, DEBI'LITY. } Lat. debilis, quasi dehabilis; Fr. debile; weak, feeble, faint, infirm. DEBILE. DEBIT.

Imoderate watch drieth to moch the body, and doth debilitate the powers animall.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Castel of Helth, book ii.

For so it was, that for his feblenesse or debylyte of age, he, by councell of physycyons, was sowyd in a shete wasshyd with aqua vite, to the end to cause his olde body to catche naturall hete.
Fabyan, Anno 1389.

For that I have not wash'd
My nose that bled, or foyl'd some debile wretch,
Which without note here's many else have done,
You shoot me forth in acclamations hyperbolicall.
Shakspeare. Coriolanus, fol. 7.

Mine expectation, presently, without forsaking me forged and sought out for another hope, that might sustain me, although it were debile and weak.
Shelton. Don Quixote, vol. ii. ch. xiii.

Seeing then hee hath violated all articles of the peace, it was lawfull for mee, according to my agreement, to recover what was mine owne, and to debilitate his power by all means.
Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty of Papists, part iii. p. 28.

Which he also acknowledges in these words: That if the crown upon his head be so heavy as to oppress the whole body, the weakness of inferior members cannot return any thing of strength, honour, or safety to the head; but that a necessary debilitation must follow. Milton. An Answer to Eikon Basilikè

——————— Nor imagine I,
A worse thing to enforce debilitie,
Then is the sea: though nature neere so strong
Knits one together.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book viii. fol. 113.

As accordingly it will happen, till the spring of the air be so far debilitated by its expansion, that its pressure, together with the weight of the mercury that remains suspended, will but counterbalance, not overcome, the pressure of the outward air upon the restagnant mercury.
Boyle. On the Spring and Weight of Air, part i. ch. ii.

It seems more probable, that without any such strengthening of the pressure of the outward air, the taking quite away or the debilitating of the resistance from within, may suffice to produce the effects under consideration. Id. Ib. exp. 3.

But after full three hours ineffectual labour, the jeers broke, and the men being quite jaded, we were obliged, by mere debility, to desist, and quietly to expect our fate, which we then conceived to be unavoidable.
Anson. Voyage round the World, book iii. ch. iv.

Sometimes the body in full strength we find,
Whilst various ails debilitate the mind.
Jenyns. On the Immortality of the Soul, book i.

By the constitution of nature, which may properly be considered as indicating the will of God, all excess in sensual indulgences tends to the depravation of the mind, and to the debilitation of the body, and may, on that account, be esteemed repugnant to the will of God.
Anecdotes of the Life of Bishop Watson.

In our bodies, while a man is in apparent health, the effect of some inward debility, which has been growing upon him, may, for a time, be concealed. Blair. Lecture 27.

DEBIT, n. i. e. Deputy, q. v.

There was then no kyng in Edom, the kynge was but a debite.
Bible, Anno 1551. 3 Kings, ch. xxii.

When the debyte had redde the letter, he asked of what countre he was. Id. Acts, ch. xxiii.

And yet he wyll be taken and estemed for the vicar and debyte of Christ. Udall. Revelacion, ch. xvii.

DECADE. — DECAMERON.

Livie in the seuenth of his first decade, speaketh of an huge person which made a challenge as he stood at the end of the Anior bridge, against any Romane that would come out and fight with him, whose stature was not much inferiour to that of Golias. Holinshed. Britaine, book i. ch. v.

The first five hundred, who had shewn the greatest marks of cowardice, he divided into fifty parts, and put one in each decad to death, to whose lot it might happen to fall; thus reviving an ancient custom of military punishment which had been long disused. Langhorne. Plutarch. Lives. Marcus Crassus.

So small their number, that if wars were ceas'd,
And Greece triumphant held a general feast,
All rank'd by tens, whole decads when they dine,
Must want a Trojan slave to pour the wine.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, book ii.

DE'CADENCE, DECA'DENCY. } De, and cadere, to fall, from κάτω, i. e. deorsum. Vossius. Falling into disuse, into ruin, decay, q. v.

But it is now thought even by the English themselves that the race of their poets is extinct: every day produces some pathetic exclamation upon the decadence of taste and genius.
Goldsmith. Citizen of the World, let. 39.

That morning we arrived at Burgos, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Castille, but long since abandoned by its princes to obscurity and decadency. Swinburne. Spain. Letter 44.

DECADIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Icosandria, order Monogynia. Generic character: calyx three-leaved, inferior; corolla, petals ten, ovate, slightly serrated; drupe ovate, rough; nut ovate, three-celled.

One species, D. aluminosa, a tree, native of Cochin-China. Loureiro, Fl. Coch.

DE'CALOGUE, DE'CALOGIST. } Fr. decalogue; It. and Sp. decalogo; Lat. decalogus; Gr. δεκάλογος; from δέκα, ten, and λόγ-ος, sermo; because it contains the ten Discourses or Commandments of God. Minsheu.

Whatsoeuer one findeth of another man's, he should restore it agayne to him that lost it and many other such like precepts, whereby we learne to liue well and Godly, and especially, that decaloge which is contayned in the ii. tables of stone.
Barnes. An Epitome of his Works, fol. 368.

Among the ten Commandments in the decalogue, that which enjoins obedience from children to parents, hath only a benediction (of longevity) added to it.
Howell. Letter 24. book i. sec. 6.

In which notes he made an early discovery of his civil, historical, ecclesiastical, ritual, and Oriental learning, together with the Saxon, French, Italian, Spanish, and all Eastern languages; through which he miraculously travelled, without any guide, except Mr. Dod, the decalogist.
Account of J. Gregory. Preface to his Posthuma, 1650.

The grossest kind of slander is that which in the decalogue is called bearing false testimony against our neighbour; that is, flatly charging him with facts the which he never committed, and is no-wise guilty of. Barrow. Sermon 17. vol. i.

But this is the spirit of the priesthood, in whose scale that scrap of a parable "Compel them to come in" which they apply as they please, outweighs the whole decalogue.
Bolingbroke. A Letter to Sir William Windham.

The Hebrews describe the two Tables of Moses in a phrase parallel to the Greek DECALOGUS: they call them עשרת הדברים, the Ten Words. They have also a tradition, that the letters in them being written by the finger of God penetrated quite through the stone, so that wherever the final ם and the ס occurred, the space included by the bounding lines remained miraculously self-suspended, without any adhesion. Postellus, de Fœnicum Characteribus.

DECAMERON, Fr. and Sp. decameron; It. decamerone; Gr. δεκάμερον; from δέκα, ten, and μέρος, part; because divided into Ten Parts.

CLE. When were you there?
DAN. Last night; and such a decameron of sport fallen out, Boccace never thought of the like.
Ben Jonson. The Silent Woman, act i. sc. 3.

DECAMP, opposed to camp, or Encamp, q. v. A. S. campian; Fr. camper, to pitch a camp.

To take down or remove a camp; and, generally, to quit or leave any place, to move off.

Letters from Lisbon advise, that the army of the king of Portugal was at Elvas on the 22d of the last month, and was to decamp on the 24th, in order to march upon the enemy, who lay at Badajos. Tatler, No. 11.

After such a stain upon the convent, it was not to be supposed it could subsist any longer; the fathers were ordered to decamp, and the house was once again converted into a tavern.
Goldsmith. Essay 5.

If a murderer touch a church wall (and many walls are church walls in this city) [Naples] before he is seized by the officers, Holy Church will not suffer him to be hanged, and if one man stabs another in the sight of ten witnesses, they all decamp, and leave the coast clear to the assassin.
Priestley. On History, lect. 47.

DECANAL, pertaining to a Dean, (Lat. decanus,) or deanery. See DEAN.

The chief mourner in a chair at the head; the two attendants at the feet; the pall-bearers and executors in the seats on the decanal side; the other noblemen and gentlemen on the cantorial side. Malone. Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds.

DECA'NT, DECA'NTER. } Serenius says, "Ex, de, and Suio. Goth. kanna, cantharus," as if poured out of a can; but to cant, (see CANTON,) among Mechanics, is to raise on the edge or corner.

To decant, is to pour, draw off or drain from a vessel, by tilting, lifting or raising one end of it: by general usage, from one bottle to another of a different description—called a Decanter.

Let it stand there some three weeks or a month, till by fermentation it have both purged itself upwards, and by sediment downwards. Then decant from it the clear juyce.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 454.

But these azure-coloured liquors should be freed from the subsiding matter, which the salts of tartar or urine precipitate out of them, rather by being decanted, than by filtration.
Boyle. Experimental History of Colours, exp. 22.

To taste the tasted, and at each return
Less tasteful? O'er our palates to decant
Another vintage.
Young. The Complaint. Night 3.

DECAPITATE, DECAPITA'TION. } "Fr. decapiter; to decapitate, to behead." Cotgrave. Lat. caput; Gr. κεφαλή, which Vossius thinks is from the obsolete κέπω, whence σκέπω, to cover.

Hedge-row ashes may the oftener be decapitated, and show their heads again sooner than other trees so used.
Evelyn, i. 7. sec. 2.

It is better to lose life by decapitation, than to desert a prince, and criminally seek to gain his dominion.
Sir W. Jones. Suhridbheda, or the Breach of Friendship.

DECAPODA, in Zoology, the first order of the Crustacea, according to Latreille.

Character of the order: branchia shut under the side of the shell; eyes two, supported on a movable pedicel; antennæ four, usually setaceous, the stem of the intermediate pair parted into two or three filaments or jointed bristles; the external organs of hearing situated at the base of the other antennæ; mouth composed of a lip, two palpigerous mandibules, a tongue two pair of multifid jaws; three pair of jawlike feet, accompanied on the outer side by a palpiform appendage, the two last pair armed with the gills; the upper part of the body entirely covered, except at the hinder extremity, with a hard shell; the post-abdomen in the form of the tail; true feet, ten pair, of which the two front pair are usually furnished with pincers; the sexual organs double, those of the male situated at the radical joint of the two last pair of legs, those of the female opening at the same joint of the third pair; the eggs are carried by the pediform two-cut appendages, disposed by pairs under the post-abdomen or tail, which latter part often varies in shape according to the sexes of the individual.

CA-DA.

The situation of the gills and the number of legs, are the essential characters of the order.

This order is formed of the genus Cancer of Linnæus, excepting some species with naked gills, and of the classes Kleistagnatha and Exocthnatha of Fabricius, adding the genera Limulus, Squilla, and Gammarus; and it is the Malacostraca podopthalma of Dr. Leach. They are the animals which the Ancients particularly designed under the name of Crustacea, or Crustata.

Their bodies are usually more or less covered with a kind of shield or shell formed of a single piece, and guarded below with a kind of breast-plate, (or plastron,) divided transversely into segments, each carrying a pair of true or jawlike legs. The hinder part of the body, which Latreille calls the post-abdomen, or Urogaster, but which is usually though erroneously called the tail, is only an extension of the end of the alimentary canal, which is defended by seven rings, which are hard above, and soft and membranaceous below, and carry on their lower part the false legs.

The shell or tegumen is formed, according to Hatchett, of gelatine and sulphate of lime; its inner surface is lined with a fine membrane, pervaded with vessels full of liquor of a scarlet colour, which when the shell is exposed to the action of heat, communicates more or less of its colour to the shell by pervading its pores.

The Decapodous Crustacea are usually carnivorous.

These Crustacea are generally marine and litoreal, but some of them are fluviatile or lacustrial; inhabiting lakes situated at the tops of mountains. Some genera are parasitical; that is to say, they are constantly found in peculiar places, as the Pea Crab, that divides its habitation with the animals of the bivalve shells, and the Soldier Crab, which lives in the dead and empty spiral univalve.

These animals live in all latitudes, but they are most abundant in the Tropics; and most of the fossil species found in Europe are analogous to the Tropical species, although some few are exactly similar to those which now live in our seas.

To preserve these animals for forming Zoological specimens, elevate the upper shell of the thorax, and take out as much flesh as possible from the body, legs, and tail; soak them in fresh water, to dissolve the salt which their shell may contain, and then wash them in lime water, and dry them in the attitude required. If they are to be immediately placed in a cabinet, their legs and antennæ should be set out in their natural position; but if they are to be packed up and transmitted to another place, the legs, &c. should be kept as close to the body as possible, as then there is less chance of their being accidentally broken off. By placing them in a damp box they may be reset at any future period.

DECA-PODA.

Latreille divided this order into two sections, according to their general form:

1. Brachyura, or Crabs. Tail short, applied to the chest; destitute of terminal fins, or finlike expansions; gills solitary; the external aperture of the female organs of generation between the third pair of legs.

2. Macroura, or Lobsters. Tail as long or longer than the thorax, incurved and furnished with two little fins, on the sides of the end of the tail; gills united at their base; vulva on the first joint of the third pair of feet.

Some sort of Crabs, but more particularly the Fluviatile Crab of the South of Europe, had formerly a great reputation for its medical qualities; but they are now seldom employed.

DECAY.

DECARDINALIZE, to remove from the rank, to deprive of the rank of Cardinal, q. v.

The matter was taken up by the king himself, and the cardinal clapt up in a bastile, where the king saith he shall abide to ripen; for he is but young, and they speak of a bull that is to come from Rome to decardinalize him.

Howell. Letter 19. book i. sec. 2.

DECARNATION, the putting off, stripping off, or, as the author says, devesture of carnality, (q. v.) or fleshliness, fleshly-lusts.

For God's incarnation inableth man for his own decarnation, as I may say and devesture of carnality.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 2. sec. 1.

DECASTICH, Gr. δέκα, ten, and στίχος, which, Vossius says, ordinem ac versum notat. A Poem of ten lines or verses.

I suddenly fell upon the ensuing decastick, which if your lordship please, may have room among the rest.

Howell. Letter 31. book i. sec. 6.

DECA'Y, v.
DECA'Y, s.
DECA'YEDNESS,
DECA'YER,
DECA'YING.

Fr. decheoir; Sp. decaer; It. decadere; Lat. decad-ere; de, and cadere, to fall. See DECADENCE. "Fr. decheoir; to fall away from, also to minish, lessen, decay waste, fall to want." Cotgrave.

The wall and all the citie within
Stante in ruine, and in decaies,
The felde is where was the palais.

Gower. Conf. Am. Prologue, fol. 6.

And now though on the sunne I drive,
Whose fervent flame all thinges decaies,
His beames in brightnesse may not strive,
With light of your sweete golden rayes.

Surrey. The Constant Lover lamenteth.

I sweare to thee by the immortall Goddes, that in three yeres I repayred all that was decaied in Rome, and in thirtie yere I could not refourme one quarter therof to good liuyng.

Golden Boke, s. 2.

Wyked people brynge a cytye in decaye, but wise men sette it vp agayne.

Bible, Anno 1551. Proverbs, ch. xxix.

I fall and see mine own decay
As one, that beares flame in his brest;
Forgets in paine to put away
The thing that bredith mine unrest.

Surrey. The Lover describes his restlesse state.

O who would e'er have thought, that time could have decay'd
Those trees whose bodies seem'd by their so massy weight
To press the solid earth, and with their wond'rous height
To clime into the clouds.

Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 23.

DECAY. — DECEASE.

His falling temples you have rear'd
The withered garlands tane away
His altars kept from the decay,
That envie wish'd, and nature fear'd.
Ben Jonson. Under-woods. An Elegie.

Many other members of both houses, some upon their lowness and decayedness of their fortunes, others to get name and reputation to be in the number of reformers, (amongst whom they doubted not all places of honour, or offices of profit, would be bestow'd,) most upon the confidence, that all would be ended without a blow, by the king's want of power to gather strength, desir'd and obtain'd command of horse or foot.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part ii. p. 703.

Poverty in wedlock, is a great decayer of love and contentation; and riches can find many waies to divert an inconvenience; but the mind of man is all. Feltham. Resolve 65.

Let others of the world's decaying tell,
I envy not those of the golden age,
That did their careless thoughts for nought engage,
But cloy'd with all delights, liu'd long and well.
Stirling. Aurora. Sonnet 98.

I give the sign, and struggle to be free:
Swift row my mates, and shoot along the sea;
New chains they add, and rapid urge the way,
Till, dying off, the distant sounds decay.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xii.

Hope waits upon the flowery prime;
And summer, though it be less gay,
Yet is not look'd on as a time
Of declination, or decay;
For, with a full hand, that does bring
All that was promis'd by the spring.
Waller. To Lady Lucy Sidney.

Old age is likewise a great decayer of your idol.
Spectator, No. 73.

Methinks e'en now I view some free design,
Where breathing Nature lives in every line:
Chaste and subdued the modest lights decay,
Steal into shades and mildly melt away.
Collins. An Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer.

Throughout the whole vegetable, sensible, and rational world, whatever makes progress towards maturity, as soon as it has passed that point, begins to verge towards decay.
Blair. Sermon 12. vol. i.

DECE'ASE, v. } Lat. deced-ere, decessum, to go
DECE'ASE, n. } away; (de, and cedere, to go.) It. decedere; Fr. deceder, to depart, sc. from life. Fr. decez, a departure from life.

To go away, to depart from; sub. life; and thus, to die.

& if þat Henry die, or Steuen mak his deses,
Henry heyr we seie salle haf þe lond in pes.
R. Brunne, p. 126.

But he must proue vs, that hys forswearyng of our Sauiour, yet shoulde not haue letted him from saluacion, although he hadde furthwith vpō that dede deceased without repentaunce, or any remembraunce after that sinne.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 603. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall's Answer.

Moreouer, now thy freend deceassyd lieth with corps on ground,
Alas vaware thou art, and al thy fleete he doth confound.
Phaer. Æneados, book vi. p. 139.

For they vse to marrie their sister by the father's side onely, and also the wife of their father after his decease.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Tartars, vol. i. fol. 55.

O all ye blest ghosts of deceased loves,
That now lie sainted in the Eclesian groves,
Mediate for mercy for me.
F. Beaumont. Upon Mr. Charles Beaumont, an Elegy.

And I, the whilst you mourne for his decease,
Will with my mourning plaints your plaint increase.
Spenser. The Ruins of Time, st. 34.

DECE — DECE

And here may I be allowed to mention one matter, though of no great account, yet shewing a privilege of the Archbishops of Canterbury with relation to the Bishops of his province deceasing; which was, that upon the death of every such Bishop, his best ring, save one, and all his seals became due to the Archbishop.
Strype. Life of Grindall.

I have not yet been in a place called Westminster-abbey, but soon intend to visit it. There, I am told, I shall see justice done to deceased merit; none, I am told, are permitted to be buried there, but such as have adorned as well as improved mankind.
Goldsmith. Citizen of the World, let. 12.

The Romans had [the custom] to deify and adore their emperors, most of them after their decease, and some of them during their lives, even though they were the vilest of mankind.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

DECE'IVE, DECE'IVABLE, DECE'IVABLENESS, DECE'IVER, DECE'IVING, DECE'IVANCE, DECE'IT, DECE'ITFUL, DECE'ITFULLY, DECE'ITFULNESS.

Fr. decevoir; Lat. decipere, deceptum, to take away from; (de, and capere, to take.) "Decipere is so called, because fraudulent men are accustomed craftily to take (capere) from a sum or heap, and this is properly decipere.

To take away from; sc. by fraud or guile: to defraud, to beguile, to delude, to mislead, to lead into error. See DECEPTIBLE.

þan said Kyng Philip tille alle þo of France,
Of gile þis is a trip of Richard deceiuance.
R. Brunne, p. 156.

þe folk out of France to Normundie were comen,
To R. deceiuance his londes haf þei nomen.
Id. p. 195.

Whan þis þing was grant, Henry dred disceite,
He wild, þat his cōnant [covenant] were holden stable & streite.
Id. p. 139.

Were þe bisshop blessid.
Hus sele sholde noȝt be sent. in deceet of þe puple.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 4.

And he biheeld the disseyt of hem: and seide to hem, what tempten ye me? Schewe ye to me a peny.
Wiclif. Luk, ch. xx.

Deceite, weping, spinning, God hath yeven
To women kindly, while that they may liven.
Chaucer. The Wif of Bathes Prologue, v. 5983.

——— Joab by deceipt slough
Abner, for drede he shulde bee
With King Dauid suche as was he.
Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 45.

As for men, they are but vayne, men are dysceatful; vpō the weyghtes they are altogether lyghter than vanyte it selfe.
Bible, Anno 1551. Psalme 62.

Why hast thou then not onely publyshed and declared vs as traytoures but also craftely and deceitfully imagined, purposed and conspired the vtter destruccion and confusion of our persones.
Hall. Henry IV. The third Yere.

Who so hoordeth vp ryches with the dyseatfulnes of his tōg, he is a foole, and lyke vnto them yᵗ seke their owne death.
Bible, Anno 1551. Prouerbes, ch. xxi.

þat fyrst man deceiuede. thourgh frut and false bỳ-heste.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 310.

And Jhesus answerde and biganne to seye to hem loke ye that no man desceyue you. For many schulen come in my name seiyng, that I am & thei schulen desceyue manye.
Wiclif. Mark, ch. xiii.

For manye disseyuers wenten out into the world which knowlechen not that Jesu Crist han come in fleische: this is a disceyuer and Anticrist Id. 2 Jon, ch. i.

For all this worlde gouerne we
And can the folke so well deceiue
That none our gile can perceiue.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 149.

Shee cruell Fortune casteth adoun kinges, that whylome weren ydrad, and shee deceiuable enhaunceth vp the humble cheere of him that is discomfited: ne shee neither hereth ne recketh of wretched wepings.
Id. The second Boke of Boecius, fol. 216.

And for they, yf thou seemest fayre, thy nature ne maketh nat that, but the desceiuaunce of feblenesse of the eyen that looken.
Id. The third Boke of Boecius, fol. 225.

The book saith, that som men (han taught hir deceivour, for they han to muche dreded) to be deceived.
Id. The Tale of Melibeus, vol. ii. p. 99.

Right as a mirrour openly
Sheweth all thing that stondeth therby
As well the colour, as the figure
Withouten any couerture
Right so the cristall stone shining
Withouten any disceiuing.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 123.

For thy my sonne, as I the meue,
It sette the well to take hede,
That thou eschewe of thy manhede
Hypocrisie, and his semblant,
That thou ne nought be deceiuant.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 15.

Thus was the lawe deceiuable,
So ferforth that the trouth fonde
Rescous none.
Id. Ib. book ii. fol. 37.

This Achelous was a geaunt,
A subtill man, a deceiuaunt,
Whiche through magike and sorcerie
Couthe all the worlde of trecherie.
Id. Ib. book iv. fol. 75.

Evē hym whose commyng is by the worckynge of Satan, w^t^ all lyuinge power, sygnes and wonders: and in all deceuaubleness of vnrighteousnes amonge thē that perysh, because they receaued not the loue of the truthe, that they might haue bene saued.
Bible, Anno 1551. Thessalonians, ch. ii.

He is the moste crafty deceyuer and perellous hypocrite sewed and blown to gither of all lyes, falshed, and gyle.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. viii.

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,
As to descry the crafty cunning traine,
By which Deceit doth mask in vizour faire,
And cast her colours dyed deepe in graine,
To seem like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting guestures to her purpose frame,
The guiltless man with guile to entertain.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 7.

Such when as Archimago them did view,
He weened well to worke some vncouth wile;
Eftsoones vntwisting his deceitfull clew,
He gan to weaue a web of wicked guile.
Id. Ib. book ii. can. 1.

So do we find in this man's practice, who first inveigled the merchants, drawing them to Diep to be inthralled; then dealt deceitfully with the king to colour his offences, his design being against Rochel and the religion.
State Trials. Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham.

There is no greater argument of the deceitfulness of our hearts than this, that no man can know it all; it cosens us in the very number of its cosenage. Taylor. Sermon 7. part ii.

To this adde that precept of Aristotle, that wine be forbore in all consumptions; for that the spirits of the wine do prey upon the roscide juyce of the body, and inter-common with the spirits of the body, and so deceive and rob them of their nourishment.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. I. sec. 55.

——————— O ever failing trust
In mortal strength! and oh what not in man
Deceivable and vain!
Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 350.

And certainly this Devil of light is now gone abroad into the world with all that power and deceivableness he can, and we cannot but with sad and bleeding hearts observe his too general prevalency and success. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 290.

Hence with thy brew'd enchantments, foul deceiver:
Hast thou betray'd my credulous innocence,
With visor'd falshood and base forgery?
And would'st thou seek again to trap me here
With liquorish baits fit to ensnare a brute?
Milton. Comus, l. 696.

The deceiving of the senses, may be set down as one of the delights of the senses.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book iv. ch. ii.

But the hyprocrisie which I mean, is, first, that which is opposite to (and incompatible with) sincerity; first the deceiving of men, with a pretence of piety putting off the most unchristian sins, having no more of Christianity than will serve to mischief others, i. e. only the pretence of it to disguise the poison of a bitter heart.
Hammond. Works. Of Conscience, vol. i. fol. 218.

My Muses, here your sacred raptures end,
The verse was what I ow'd my suff'ring friend.
This while I sung, my sorrows I deceiv'd,
And bending osiers into baskets weav'd.
Dryden. Virgil. Pastoral 10.

But what account shall a man give of himself for living perpetually in disguise; for deceiving all about him, and using the speech, which God gave him for better purposes, to impose on the weakness and folly of mankind. Sherlock. Discourse 36.

That, says he, any man induced by some specious reason should be of opinion, that it is the part of a learned physician rather to accommodate his medicines as occasions suggest, than to insist upon some certain prescripts, is a deceivable assertion, and which attributes too little to experience, too much to judgment.
Boyle. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy. Appendix to Section 1. part ii.

A modest blush he wears, not form'd by art,
Free from deceipt his face, and full as free his heart.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 11.

But suffer us, whose younger minds ne'er felt
Fortune's deceits, to court her as she's fair:
Were she a common mistress, kind to all,
Her worth would cease, and half the world grow idle.
Otway. The Orphan, act ii. sc. 1.

They take themselves for injur'd when we dare
Make them think better of us than we are;
And if we hide our frailties from their sights,
Call us deceitful jilts and hypocrites.
Rochester. Letter from Artemisia to Chloe.

There was few or none of the philosophers, who did not signify his dislike or contempt of the vulgar opinions and practices concerning religion: what Cicero saith of one part, the wiser part did judge of all: "the whole business was deceitfully forged either for gain, or out of superstition, or from mistake."
Barrow. Sermon 14. vol. ii.

But sin, by that deceitfulness which the Apostle speaks of in the text, hides its deformed appearances from the eyes of foolish men; and sets before them nothing but pleasures and profits, joy and vanity, present security, and very distant, very uncertain, very remote fears. South. Sermon 11. vol. ix.

Surely, if these things prove true, [namely, whereof he was accused,] let me be registered to my perpetual infamy, not only for a most notorious deceiver, but such an hypocrite as never trod upon the earth before. Strype. Life of Whitgift, Anno 1596.

In what Christian country is charity the ruling principle with every man in the common intercourse of civil life, insomuch that the arts of circumvention and deceit are never practised by the DECEIVE. — DECEMVIRI.

Christian against his brother, nor the appetites of the individual suffered to break loose against the public weal, or against his neighbour's peace. Horsley. Sermon 40.

——— But when I think
What rocks in secret lie—what tempests rise
On love's deceitful voyage; my timid soul
Recoils affrighted, and with horrour shuns
Th' inviting calm.
Smollet. The Regicide, act iii. sc. 6.

But we cannot even suppose them fallacious, without violating our nature: nor, if we acknowledge a God, without impiety; for in this supposition it is implied, that we suppose the Deity a deceiver. Beattie. On Truth, part i. ch. ii. sec. 1.

Let such sort of writers go on, at their dearest peril, and sport themselves in their own deceivings; let them, at their peril, make a jest at the Bible, and treat the sacred articles of Christianity with scoff and merriment.
Watts. Improvement of the Mind, part i. ch. xviii.

DECEMBER, the tenth month of the year of Romulus, which began in March. Romulus assigned to it thirty days, Numa twenty-nine, and Julius Cæsar thirty-one. Commodus in one of his insane freaks changed the name, according to Dio, into Exuperatorius, (ὑπεραίρων,) the title of all others in which he most delighted, ὡς ἐν πᾶσιν ἁπλῶς πάντας ἀνθρώπους καθ' ὑπερβολὴν νικῶν. Ælius Lampridius, in his life of this Imperial monster, gives Amazonius as the substituted name, in honour of his mistress Martia, whom he used to dress, in common with himself, in Amazonian costume. The Catalogue of the months, the names of which were changed by him, stands as below in Dio; and the commentators have differed as to the one which ought to be placed first in order. Some have conjectured, with probability, that we should commence with Lucius, and read the others continuously as the titles of the Emperors.

Ἀμαζόνιος ..... Amazonius.
Ἀνίκητος ..... Invictus.
Εὐτυχὴς ..... Felix.
Εὐσεβὴς ..... Pius.
Λούκιος ..... Lucius.
Αὐρήλιος ..... Aurelius.
Κόμμοδος ..... Commodus.
Αὐγοῦστος ..... Augustus.
Ἡράκλειος ..... Herculeus.
Ῥωμαῖος ..... Romanus.
Ὑπεραίρων ..... Exuperatorius

DECE'MVIRI, DECE'MVIRAL, DECE'MVIRATE, DECE'MVIRSHIP. Decem, ten, and viri, men. Ten men appointed (see the Quotations from Holland's Livy) to draw up a new Code of laws for the Roman Government.

By this time were the embassadours returned with the Athenian lawes. And therefore the tribunes were so much the more earnest and urgent, that once at length they would set on, to describe and put down some lawes. And agreed it was, that there should be created decemvirs, above all appeale: and for the yeare being, there should no other officers and magistrates be in place.
Holland. Livius, fol. 109.

But before they went out of the cittie, the decemvirall lawes, (which now are knowne by the name of the twelve Tables) they set up openly to be seene, engraven in brasse.
Id. Ib. fol. 127.

This man [Fabius] having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in warre; the decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had so greatly changed, that he chose rather to bee like Appius than himself.
Id. Ib. fol. 115.

They [the twelve Tables] amuse the mind by the remembrance of old words and the portrait of ancient manners; they inculcate the soundest principles of government and morals; and I am not afraid to affirm, that the brief composition of the decemvirs surpasses in genuine value the libraries of Grecian philosophy.
Cicero, in Gibbon. The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. xliv.

This I promise, that, if such a decemvirate should ever attempt to restore our constitutional liberty by constitutional means, I would exert in their cause, such talents as I have, and even if I were oppressed with sickness, and torn with pain, would start from my couch, and exclaim with Trebonius, "If you mean to act worthily, O Romans! I am well."
Sir William Jones. Works. Letter to Lord Althorp.

Besides the Chief Magistrates so well known in Roman History as DECEMVIRI, we read of many minor officers who bore the same name: as Decemviri litibus judicandis, who determined causes committed to them by the Prætor; Decemviri Epulonum, who superintended public religious banquets; Decemviri Coloniæ deducendæ; Decemviri sacris faciundis; Decemviri agris inter veteranos milites dividendis, and perhaps of some others whose functions are sufficiently explained by their designations.

DE'CENCE, DE'CENCY, DE'CENT, DE'CENTLY, DE'CENTNESS, DE'CENT-MEASURED. Fr. decence; It. decenza; Sp. decencia; Lat. decentia, from the verb decere. "Decere, quasi aptum esse consentaneumque tempori, et personæ, quod tum in factis sæpissime, tum in dictis valet, in vultu denique et gestu, et incessu; contraque item dedicere." Cic. Orat. Ernest. i. 611. Vossius thinks from the Gr. δέει, contr. δεῖ, c inserto.

Fitness, becomingness, appropriateness, suitableness, sc. to time, place, and circumstances.

Of sortes, and ages thou must note
the manner and the guyse.
A decensie for stirring youth,
for elder folke likewise.
Drant. Horace. The Arte of Poetry, fol. 10.

And therefore Daniel lykeneth bothe Mahumete & the Pope vnto that horne which hath manis eyes, that is, to suyre discrete semely shewe of vtwarde deuotion (as they saye) of laudable rites and God's holy service.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. vii.

Shall they be carried forth without any decentnesse, as we be wont to carry forth dead horses or dead swine.
Hunting of Purgatorye, (1561.) fol. 37.

That life, that Venus of all things, which we Conceive or show, proportion'd decency,
Is not found scatt'red in thee here or there,
But like the soul is wholly every where.
Cartwright. To the Memory of Ben Jonson.

And all pastimes generally, which be joyned with labour used in open place, and on the day light, containing either some fitte exercise for warre, or some pleasant pastime for peace, be not onlie comlie and decent, but also verie necessarie for a courtlie jentleman. Ascham. Works. The Schole Master.

Of which there is not one, I dare anow
(And now I should not lye) but will deserue
For vertue, and true beautie of the soule,
For honestie, and decent carriage,
A right good husband.
Shakspeare. Henry VIII. fol. 226.

He spoke; the Heavens seem'd decently to bow,
With all their bright inhabitants; and now
The jocund spheres began again to play,
Again each spirit sung Halleluia.
Cowley. The Davideis, book i.

The motions straight, and round, and swift and slow,
And short, and long, were mix'd and woven so,—
Did in such artful figures smoothly fall,—
As made this decent-measur'd dance of all. Id. Ib.

As beauty of body, with an agreeable carriage, pleases the eye, and that pleasure consists in that we observe all the parts with a certain elegance are proportioned to each other; so does decency

DECEP-TIBLE.

rence of behaviour which appears in our lives obtain the approbation of all with whom we converse, from the order, constancy, and moderation of our words and actions. Spectator, No. 196.

Superfluous wealth, and pomp, I not desire;
But what content, and decency require.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 3.

Give no countenance to busie-bodies, and those who love to talk of other men's faults: or if you cannot decently reprove them because of their quality, then divert their discourse some other way: or if you cannot do that, by seeming not to mind it, you may sufficiently signifie that you do not like it.
Tillotson. Sermon 48.

It is for the most part in our skill in manners, and in the observances of time and place, and of decency in general, which is only to be learned in those schools to which Horace recommends us, that what is called Taste, by way of distinction, consists.
Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful. Introduction.

The Eunomians seem to have been of opinion that it was not necessary for persons to be plunged all over in water, and that it was not decent for them to be stripped at the performance of this religious rite. Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

Then thus Antinoüs, Eupithes' son:
Icarius' daughter! deign but to receive
Such gifts as we shall bring, for gifts demand
That grace, nor can be decently refus'd.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book xviii.

DECE'NNIAL, DECE'NNER, DECE'NNARY. } Lat. decennis, decennium; from decem, ten, and anni, years. Continuing for ten years.

You know also, that the whole land was divided into hundreds, and those again into decennaries; in which decennaries all men, even children of twelve years of age, are bound to take the oath of allegiance.
Hobbes. Works, fol. 694. A Dialogue between a Philosopher and a Student of the Common Law.

In case of the default of appearance in a decenner, his nine pledges had one and thirty days to bring the delinquent forth to justice. If this failed, then the chief of those decenners, by the vote of that and the neighbour decennaries, was to purge himself both of the guilt of the fact, and of being parties to the flight of the delinquent.
Fielding. On the Causes of the Increase of Robbers, sec. 5.

In all these laws, the principal aim visible was, to prevent idle persons wandering from place to place, which, as we have before seen, was one great point of the decennary constitution.
Id. Ib.

DECE'PTIBLE, DECEPTIBI'LITY, DECE'PTION, DECE'PTIOUS, DECE'PTIVE. } See DECEIVE, ante.

Minge not your lone with false deception.
Chaucer. The Complaint of Creseide, fol. 197.

Syr, sayd the constable, he shewed me soo fayre semblaunt that I durst not refuse it. Constable, sayd the Duke of Borgoyne, in fayre semblauntes are grete decepcyons: I reputed you more subtil than I take you now.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. ch. lxxxvi.

But as for popular errours, they are more neerly founded upon an erroneous inclination of the people, as being the most deceptable part of mankind, and ready with open arms to receive the encroachments of errour. Sir Thomas Brown, book i. ch. iii.

Now though our coming judgments do in part undeceive us, and rectifie the grosser errors which our unweary sensitive hath engaged us in, yet others are so fleaht in us, that they maintain their interest upon the deceptibility of our decayed natures, and are cherisht there as the legitimate issues of our reasonable faculties.
Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatising.

Sith yet there is a credence in my heart
An esperance so obstinately strong,
That doth invert that test of eyes and ears;
As if those organs had deceptious functions.
Shakespeare. Troilus and Cressida, fol. 101.

But thus, as the shadow still attends the body, so there is no one thing, relating either to the actions or enjoyments of man, in which he is not liable to deception. DECEP-TIBLE.
South. Sermons, vol. vi. p. 5.

Folly exclaims, and well she may,
Because I take her mask away;
If once I bring her to the sun,
The painted harlot is undone.
But prize, my child, Oh! prize my rules,
And leave deception to her fools.
Cotton. Vision 6. Friendship.

I consent to put into the scale of regal prerogative, all the deceptive verbal criticism from words no longer clearly understood, all the volumes of precedents of irregular and condemned practices.
Hargrave. On the Case of Impositions. Collection of Tracts.

It is to be feared, that the sciences are above the comprehension of children, and that this mode of education, to the exclusion of the classical, is ultimately deceptive.
V. Knox. Remarks on Grammar Schools.

DE'CERN, DE'CERNERS, DE'CERNING, DE'CERNMENT. } Fr. decerner; It. discernare; Lat. decernere; de, and cern-ere; from the Gr. κρίν-ειν, to separate, to distinguish, to decide. Because he who judges, separates or distinguishes truth from falsehood; hence κρίν-ειν, in a secondary or consequential sense, is used for judicare; and this latter signification, Vossius adds, we have in the compound, decern-ere, that is judic-are, to judge. See DISCERN.

Fr. decerner; to decree, determine, sentence, order, judge.

So that this church is knowen well ynough, & therefore may bee well vsed as a sure iudge, for to deserne betwene the true doctrine and the false, & the true preacher & false concerning the right fayth & the decerning of the true woord of God written or vnderwritten, frō the counterfet woorde of man, & in decerning of y^e^ vnderstanding of the Scripture of God, as farfurth as of necessite perteineth vnto saluacion.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 528. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall's Answer.

We the premisses well considering by good and diligent deliberation, by the power, name, and authoritie to vs (as aboue is said) committed, pronounce, decerne, and declare the same King Richard, before this to haue beene, and to be vnprofitable, vnable, vnsufficient, and vnworthie to the rule and gouernance of the foresaid realms and lordships, and of all rights and other the appertenances to the same belonging.
Holinshed. Richard II. Anno 1399.

Nevertheless, sir, saving your gracious pleasure, it were very necessary both for the danger of the sentence, Quæ semper timenda est, and slander of the world, that by the said most reverend cardinals, your grace should have a commission to some men in these parties to decern (i. e. decree) the same one exception, and process now made by the French, were of no strength.
Strype. Memorial. Henry VIII. Anno 1515.

And till those slight and vulgar decerners, have learn't that first principle of true wisdom, To judge nothing till they thoroughly understand it, and have weighed it in the balance of impartial reason; 'tis to no purpose to spend ones breath upon them.
Glanville. Preface to Lux Orientalis.

Or furthermore that he had by a yet more refined elective discretion or decernment, cull'd forth a thousand actions out of all the heaps, the million of millions of his whole life, as hoping to have found some one at least of this last choice selected thousand, which he might have stood upon
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. part i. fol. 488.

DECE'RPT, DECE'RPTION. } Lat. decerp-ere, cerptum, to pluck away; de, and carpere, to pluck or pull.

Plucked, pulled, torn, rent away.

O what mystery was the people then in? O howe this moste noble isle of the worlde was decerpt and rent to pieces.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i. ch. ii.

DECERPT — DECIDE.

And Tully saith, mannes soule, being decerpt or taken of the portion of diuinite called MENS, may be compared with none other thynge (if a man moughte lefully speke it) but with God himselfe. Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book iii. ch. xxiii.

Or, if our souls are but particles and decerptions of our parents, then I must be guilty of all the sins that ever were committed by my progenitors ever since Adam; and by this time, my soul would have been so deprav'd and debauch'd, that it would be now brutish, yea diabolical.

Glanville. Preexistence of Souls, ch. iii.

DECE'SSION, } Lat. deced-ere, decessum, to go
DECE'SSOR. } away from. (See DECEASE.)

A going, departure or separation.

Decessor vulgo Predecessor. Du Cange.

The Apostles were actually dispers'd by persecution, and this to be sure they look'd for, and therefore (so implying the necessity of a bishop to govern in their absence or decession any ways) they ordained St. James the first Bishop of Jerusalem.

J. Taylor. Of Episcopacy Asserted, fol. 65.

This opinion of theirs was a branch of the elder heresie of Montanus, which had abused Tertullian, who fiercely declaims against the decree of Pope Zephyrinus, because against the custom of his decessors he admitted adulterers to repentance, while at the same time he refused idolators and murderers.

Id. Of Repentance, ch. ix. sec. 3.

DECHARM. To charm (q. v.) is to act upon by charms (carmina) or incantations; and to Decharm, Fr. descharmer;

To free or deliver from the action or agency of charms or incantations; "to frustrate a charm, dissolve a spell. Cotgrave."

Notwithstanding the help of physick, he was suddenly cured by decharming the witchcraft. Harvey.

DECI'DE, v.
DECI'DABLE,
DECI'DEDLY,
DECI'DEMENT,
DECI'DER,
DECI'DING,
DECI'DINGLY, DECI'SE,
DECI'SION,
DECI'SIVE,
DECI'SIVELY,
DECI'SIVENESS.

Fr. decider; It. decidere; Sp. decider; Lat. decidere; compounded of de, and cædere, to cut off, i. e. scindere, controversiam abscindere, to cut off, to sever; to cut short, terminate, put an end to a dispute. And thus

To determine, to adjudge; to bring to a determination, to an end; to a conclusion.

Upon iii. points stant Christ's peace oppressed,
First holy church in her selfe diuided,
Which ought of reason first to be redress'd,
But yet so high a cause is not desided.

Chaucer. A Balade to King Henry IV. fol. 332.

And yet the cause is nought decided.

Gower. Conf. Am. Prologvs, fol. 3.

And nowe haue he heard Sainct Austine, whom yf Tyndall wyl beleiue, all your questiō is decided.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 692. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall's Answer.

For herin is the estate therof from Cristes ascēsion to the ende of the worlde vndre pleasaunt figures and elegant tropes decyded. Bale. Image. Preface, A. 3. part i.

So if before suche decision a man had agaynst his own conscience, sworn to mayntayn and defend the other side, he hadde not fayled to offende God very sore.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1440. Letter to Ladye Alington.

No man more profoundly discusseth or more fynely deciseth the vse of ceremonies. Udall. Preface to Matthew.

All folkes would resorte to her, as a iudge hable and also sufficiente to decise any matier of controursie or ambiguitie that happened among them.

Id. To Quene Catherine, vol. i. fol. 399.

P. Martyr, beside the expressing of his storie, and opening all hard doubtes thereof, hathe Godlie and learnedlie as a man of great experience and deepe judgment, decided many notable common places, belonginge speciallie to the good order of civil government, and therefore verie fit for the knowledge of all good princes Ascham. Toxophilus, p. 186. DECIDE

In confidence whereof I once again
Defie thee to the trial of mortal fight,
By combat to decide whose God is God,
Thine or whom I with Israel's sons adore.

Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 1186.

So when we say, that all controversies of religion are decidable by the Scripture, it is manifest to all but cavillers, that we do, and must, except from this generality, those which are touching the Scripture itself.

Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. Ch. part i. ch. ii.

ZANCH. Fie Signior, there be times, and terms of honor
To argue these things in, descidements able
To speak ye noble gentlemen, ways punctual
And to the life of credit,—ye are too rugged.

Beaumont and Fletcher. Love's Pilgrimage, act ii. sc. 1.

——— If thou be'st
As thou art spoken, great and virtuous,
The true decider of all injuries
Say, fight again.

Id. Two Noble Kinsmen, act iii. sc. 7.

And therefore sayth M. Caluine: the modestie of the people herein dothe appeare, that after they had committed the decidyng of the controuersies to the Apostles, and other doctours, they were also contente to subscribe to their decree.

Whitgift. Defence, fol. 157.

But Herodotus who wrote his [Homer's] life hath cleared this point; delivering, that passing from Samos unto Athens, he went sick ashore upon the Island Jos, where he died, and was solemnly interred upon the sea side; and so decidingly concludeth, &c. Sir Thomas Brown, book vii. ch. xiii.

And especially from rocks and stones along the sea continually, washed and dashed with waves, there be decisions pass of some parcels and smal fragments, the which do cleave unto other bodies. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 827.

Amongst thy shafts of soveraign light
Choose out that sure decisive dart
Which has the key of this close heart,
Knows all the corners of't, and can control
The self shut cabinet of an unsearcht soul.

Crashaw. To the Countess of Denbigh.

This success was astonishing, being obtained by men of little experience in affairs of this nature, and upon that account despised by their enemies; yet it proved the deciding battle, the king's party after this time never making any considerable opposition. Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. i. p. 135.

We wait impatiently for the coming in of the next Dyer's, who, you must know, is our authentick intelligence, our Aristotle in politicks. And 'tis indeed but fit there should be some dernier resort, the absolute decider of all controversies.

Spectator, No. 42.

There is no space for repentance in the interval between death and judgment, but the soul immediately after its departure, receives a decisive irrevocable doom, that is in part executed, and shall be publicly and entirely executed at the last day.

Bates. Works. Sermon 4. vol. ii.

——— Desisting therefore, now,
From farther conflict, we will wage again
This strife hereafter, till deciding heav'n
Appoint clear vict'ry to thyself or me.

Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book vii.

I have therefore been decidedly of opinion, with our declaration at Whitehall, in the beginning of this war, that the vicinage of Europe had not only a right, but an indispensable duty, and an exigent interest, to denunciate this work before it had produced the danger we have so sorely felt, and which we shall long feel. Burke. On a Regicide Peace.

He seemed willing to have his reader infer, that, even though they had been masters of their subject, yet these other defects would have rendered them very unqualified deciders.

Warburton. Julian. Introduction.

The town's decision they no more admit,
Themselves alone the arbiters of wit,
And scorn the jurisdiction of that court,
To which they owe their being and support.
Churchill. The Apology

When this decisive night, at length, appears,
The night of every author's hopes and fears,
What shifts to bribe applause poor poets try.
Mallet. Prologue to Thomson's Agamemnon.

The guidance of instinct, indeed, as it is more decisively determinate, seems to bring up an offspring with less deviation from the purposes of nature than the superior faculty of reason.
V. Knox. Essay 141.

DECIDENCE ; de, and cadere, to fall down. A falling down.

For men observing the decidence of their hornes, do fall upon the like conceit of this part, that it annually rotteth away, and successively reneweth again.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. ix.

Which some anatomists therefore call deciduous parts, such as the placenta uterina, urachus, and the different membranes that involve the fœtus. Boyle. Christian Virtuoso, part ii.

Their summits are split into sharp cones, pillars, pipes, and other odd shapes, blanched and bare ; but the interstices are filled up with forests of evergreen and deciduous trees and plants.
Swinburne. Spain. Letter 8.

DE'CIMATE, DECIMA'TION, DE'CIMATOR, DE'CIMAL. Fr. decimer ; Lat. decimus, the tenth ; from decem, ten. To tythe ; to take or select a tenth.

Sometimes the criminals were decimated by lot, as appears in Polybius, Tacitus, Plutarch, Appian, Dio, Julius Capitolinus, who also mentions a centesimation.
Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book iii. ch. ii.

Elfred was sent for by the king then at London ; but in his way met at Guilford by Earl Godwin, who with all seeming friendship entertain'd him, was in the night surpriz'd and made prisoner, most of his company put to various sorts of cruel death, decimated twice over.
Milton. History of England, book vi.

Inprimis, the first means or course intended to increase your Majesty's revenues or profits withal, is of greatest consequence, and I call it a decimation, being so termed in Italy, where in some part it is in use, importing the tenth of all subjects' estates, to be paid as a yearly rent to their prince.
State Trials. Proceedings against the Earl of Bedford, &c.

——————— March, noble lord,
Into our city with thy banners spred,
By decimation and a tythed death ;
If thy reuenges hunger for that food
Which nature loathes, take thou the destin'd tenth.
Shakspeare. Timon of Athens, fol. 98.

Con. You forge these things prettily : but I have heard you are as poor as a decimated cavalier, and had not one foot of land in all the world. Dryden. The Wild Gallant, act ii. sc. 2.

And then in the last place, they are to tell their children also of the base and brutish cruelties practised by the blood-hounds in the plunders, sequestrations, decimations, and murders of their poor fellow-subjects. South. Sermons, vol. v. p. 20.

But God, who weighs an evil action by the malignity of its principle, and the unjustness of its design, and not by those exterior circumstances, which only clothe its appearance, but not at all constitute its nature, has as much vengeance in store for an oppressing justice (if that be not a contradiction in the terms,) as he has for the pillaging soldier, or the insolent decimator.
Id. Ib. vol. x. p. 169.

This division was not made, as is generally imagined, by King Alfred, though he might have introduced better regulations concerning it ; it prevailed on the continent, wherever the northern nations had obtained a settlement ; and it is a species of order extremely obvious to all, who use the decimal notation.
Burke. Abridgement of English History, book ii. ch. vii.

It is true that in human governments, the punishment of a few is sometimes accepted as a satisfaction for the offence of many ; as in military punishments, when a regiment is decimated.
Horsley. Sermon 9. vol. i.

DECI'PHER, v. DECI'PHER, n. DECI'PHERER, DECI'PHERING, DECI'PHERESS. Fr. dechiffrer ; Sp. decifrar ; It. deciferare ; de, and cypher, (q. v.) which Menage says is from the Hebrew. Cipher is to write in fictitious characters ; characters unknown to, and concealed from others. Decipher, To make known or explain such fictitious characters ; and, generally, to explain, to interpret ; to delineate or describe.

He then should well decypher himselfe, and well declare therby yᵗ he would gladly catche holde of some small handell to kepe hys money fast, rather then help his frendes in their necessitie.
Sir Thomas More. Workes. Supplication of Souls, fol. 330.

This letter was deciphered, and found hidden in the duke's house under the mats of an entry, in the way as the duke went to his bed chamber : the cypher itself was found in the tiles of the house. State Trials. Trial of the Duke of Norfolk.

As for the taking of the pacquet, I know nothing of it ; the letter I never saw in cypher ; Baker brought me a decypher, telling me, That forty was for me, and thirty for the Queen of Scotts.
Id. Ib.

For the better deciphering of the Riuer of Plate, & commodities thereof, was called before vs, Richard Carter, which doeth well there.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. M. Edward Fenton, vol. iii. fol. 763.

He made me privy to it, and willed me to acquaint myself with that cipher, for the deciphering of the like hereafter.
State Trials. Trial of Robert Hickford.

Aristotle himself, in that glimmering he had of divine learning, deciphers such a one, and sets him out by those very characters : he must be one qui pietatem non curat, a man that matters not at all for piety ; he must either deny the Deity, or else think he can escape the reach of the celestial powers, such a one qui putat se latere Deo, he is able to skulk on the one side, and absent himself from the hand of God at his pleasure.
Id. Proceedings against the Bishop of Lincoln.

For, to have made themselves their own decipherers, and each one to have told upon their entrance, what they were, and whether they would, had been a most pitious hearing, and utterly unworthy any quality of a poem.
Ben Jonson. The Masque of Queenes.

For if good and faithfull cyphers were invented and practised, many of them would delude and forestall all the cunning of the decypherer, which yet are very apt and easy to be read or written.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi. ch. i.

And not ill companie onlie, but the ill opinion also of the most part doth much harme ; and namelie of those which shold be wise in the trewe decyphering, of the good disposition of nature, of comlinesse in courtlie manners, and all right doings of men.
Ascham. The Schole Master.

The knowledge of cyphering, hath drawne on with it a knowledge relative unto it, which is the knowledge of decyphering, or of discreting cyphers, thongh a man were utterly ignorant of the alphabet of the cypher, and the capitulations of secrecy past between the parties.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi. ch. i.

It [assurance] is writ in a private character, not to be read nor understood but by the conscience, to which the spirit of God has vouchsafed to decypher it. South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 67.

I cannot but observe here, after this swift and contracted method of writing according to letters, that an universal character for entire words would be of universal use ; and this I apprehend is to be taken from the tables of decypherers, by making use of the numbers that express the proportions of auxiliary verbs, of pronouns, particles, &c. instead of the words, whose proportions they denominate. Sharpe. Origin, &c. of Languages. Notes.

And thou, O Astrology, Goddess divine,
Celestial decypheress, gently incline,
Thine ears and thine aid, to a lover of science,
That bids to all learning, but thine, a defiance.
Byrom. The Astrologer.

DECK. DECLAIM.

DECK, v. DECK, n. DE'CKING. } A. S. thec-an; Ger. and Dutch, decken, operire, vestire, to cover, to clothe. The deck of a ship so called, because it covers and conceals the rest of the ship.

To cover, to array; and thus, to dress, to adorn, to embellish.

For he shall put vpon me the garment of health & couer me with the mantle of ryghteousness. He shall decke me like a brydegrome, and as a bryde that hath hir apparel vpon her.
Bible, Anno 1551. Esaye, ch. lxi.

We wretches loe, that last day of our life,
With bowes of fest the town, and temples deck.
Surrey. Æneis, book ii.

He decked and vitailed dyuers shippes of warre and sent them to the north seas to defende his subiects.
Hall. Henry VIII. The twenty-fifth Yere.

They goe gorgiously arayed of our Lordes goods, vnto whome they geeue none honour, and of these goods commeth the harlottes decking that thou seest daily, the game players disguising, and kynges apparell.
Barnes. Workes, fol. 251. What the Church is, &c.

For they couered the former parte, and the mooste parte of their deckes w^t^ copper, to the ende that the graspes shulde not fasten in them, but rather shulde slippe and slyde aboue the copper. Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 191.

Then in another place the fruits that be
In gallant clusters decking each good tree
Invite your hand to crop them from the stem,
And liking one, taste every sort of them.
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, book ii. song 3.

——— These the legs,
That, when our ships were grappled, carried me
With such swift motion from deck to deck,
As they that saw it, with amazement cried,
He does not run, but flies.
Massinger. The Unnatural Combat, act i. sc. 1.

That the whole world was but one great animal, and might be resembled to a vast ship, wherein there are many inferiour subordinate governours, under one supreme, the oldest and wisest; as also expert mariners of several sorts, some to attend upon the deck, and others to climb the masts and order the sails.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 270.

I and my father, have purposed a further ornament unto thee, in the more plentiful effusion of our Spirit upon thee: which shall be to thy former deckings, instead of pure gold curiously wrought with specks of silver.
Hall. Solomon's Song of Songs, ch. i. Works, vol. i. fol. 288.

Foul is the steed without a flowing mane,
And birds, without their feathers, and their train.
Wool decks the sheep.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book xiii.

The crew instantly left off pumping, and being enraged at the hardships they had suffered, and the numbers they had lost, (there being at that time no less than thirty dead bodies lying on the deck,) they all with one voice cried, On shore, On shore.
Anson. Voyage round the World, book i. ch. ii.

Strike, louder strike th' ennobling strings
To those, whose merchants' sons were kings;
To him, who, deck'd with pearly pride,
In Adria weds his green-hair'd bride.
Collins. Ode to Liberty.

The mode of fishing, for which this tonnage bounty in the white-herring fishery has been given (by busses or decked vessels from twenty or eighty tons burden,) seems not so well adapted to the situation of Scotland as to that of Holland.
Smith. Wealth of Nations, book xiv. ch. v.

DECLA'IM, DECLA'IMER, DECLA'IMING, DECLAMA'TION, DECLAMA'TOR, DECLA'MATORY. } Fr. declamer; Sp. declamar; It. declamare; Lat. declamare; (de, and clamare,) to call or cry out aloud. See CLAIM.

To speak aloud, earnestly, vehemently, to plead loudly, earnestly.

As when one Vibius Curius did speake much of his yeares, and made himself to be much younger then he was, (quoth Tullie) why then maister Vibius, as far as I can gather by my reckening, when you and I declamed together last, you were not then borne by all likelihood, if that be true which you say.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 158.

Parte of their names I thynke to specifie
From olde Quintilian with his declamations,
Theocritus with his Bucolicall relacions.
Skelton. The Crowne of Laurell.

Also they, which only teache rhetorike ought to be named rhetoriciens, declamatours, artificial speakers (named in Greke logodedali) or any other name than oratours.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i. ch. xiii.

They should likewise use to declaim in Latin, and English, as the Romans did in Greek and Latin, and all this travail be rather led on by familiarity, encouragement, and emulation, than driven by severity, punishment, and terrour.
Cowley. Essays. The School.

O let our whole care and carriage, and the dearest of our endeavours, strive and prevail to cross the proverb, and stop the mouth of the rashest declamer.
Hammond. Works. Sermon 10. vol. iv.

I shall be so troublesome to this declaimer for once, as to shew him what he might have better said in their praise.
Milton. An Apology for Smectymnuus.

The king to stay these declaimings which he knew to be made against the Earl of Lenox, called the ministers to Edinburgh, and shewed them what travel he had taken to convert his cousen.
Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, book vi. Anno 1580.

But these last twenty years most of the parliament men seek to improve the reputation of their wisdomes by these declamations, and no honest patriot dare oppose them, lest he incur the reputation of a fool, or a coward in his countries cause.
Cabbala. To his Sacred Majesty, ab ignoto.

Nor doth this come to passe, as I suppose, because (as a certaine declaimor against sciences objects against physicians) they have ever conversant before their eyes such lothesome and sad spectacles, that they must needs retire their minds from these objects, to some other contemplations.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book iv. ch. ii.

But oh, what stock of patience wants the fool,
Who wastes his time and breath in teaching school!
To hear the speeches of declaiming boys,
Deposing tyrants with eternal noise.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 7.

Whosoever strives to beget or foment in his heart such persuasions concerning God, makes himself the Devil's orator, and declaims his cause; whose proper characteristick badge it is, to be the great accuser or calumniator, for that is the force of the Greek word διάβολος. South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 82.

It [affectation] might be borne even here, but it often ascends the pulpit itself; and the declaimer, in that sacred place, is frequently so impertinently witty, speaks of the last day itself with so many quaint phrases, that there is no man who understands raillery, but must resolve to sin no more. Spectator, No. 38.

I confess their verses are to me the coldest I ever read: neither indeed is it possible for them, in the way they take, so to express their passion, as that the effects of it should appear in the concernment of an audience; their speeches being so many declamations, which tire us with the length.
Dryden. Essay on Dramatick Poesie.

Who could, I say, hear this generous declamator, without being fir'd at his noble zeal, and becoming his profess'd follower, if he might be admitted. Tatler, No. 56.

He [Demosthenes] had, moreover, a looking-glass in his house, before which he used to declaim, and adjust all his motions. Langhorne. Plutarch. Demosthenes.

——— He that takes
Deep in his soft credulity the stamp
Design'd by loud declaimers on the part
Of liberty, themselves the slaves of lust,
Incurs derision for his easy faith,
And lack of knowledge, and with cause enough.
Cowper. The Task, book v.

DECLARE. — DECLARATION.

Thus Elias and Elisha revived the dead by prayer to the Lord of Life. 1 Kings, xvii. 20, 21. 2 Kings, iv. 33, 34. This was declaratory, that the prophets were but instruments, and that God was the absolute author of them.

Bates. Sermons. The Marriage Feast.

The French were, from the very first, most declaredly averse from treating, either from writings, or from agreeing to a place of public conference. Sir W. Temple. Memoirs, part ii.

So far are the Scriptures from giving us the least intimation, that the bishops of Rome are set up by God to be the infallible declarers and interpreters of the sense of Scripture to all the Christian world, from generation to generation, and that consequently in all disputes concerning the meaning of any passage in the Bible, we ought to have recourse to that see.

Sharp. Sermon 4. vol. vii.

But we, who have no such prejudices and passions as theirs to mislead our judgments and overpower our natural feelings, must necessarily be filled with love and reverence towards him, when we read that sublime and affecting declaration of his intentions, which is conveyed in the words of the text. (Luke, iv. 17—20.)

Porteus. Sermon 17. vol. i.

If we affirm absolutely, we use the indicative or declarative mood; if relatively, conditionally, or dependently on something else, it is the subjunctive.

Beattie. Elem. Moral Science, part i. ch. i. sec. 3.

This proceeding of Mr. Fox does not (as I conceive) amount to absolute high treason; Russia, though on bad terms, not having been then declaredly at war with this kingdom.

Burke. On the Conduct of the Minority.

DECLARATION, in Law, a specification in legal form of the circumstances which constitute a cause of action. The parts of a Declaration are: first, the title; secondly, the Venue or County where the action is intended to be tried; thirdly, the commencement; fourthly, the statement of the cause of action; and lastly, the conclusion by which the Plaintiff proffers to prove his suit, and show the damage he had sustained by the wrong done him. At the end of the Declaration are also added the Plaintiff's pledges of prosecution, John Doe and Richard Roe; these are now become a mere matter of form, and are always returned as the standing pledges. The ancient use of them was to answer for the Plaintiff, who, in case he brought an action without cause, or failed in the prosecution of it when brought, was liable to an amercement from the Crown for raising a false accusation. The requisites or qualities of a Declaration are, that it correspond with the Process or Writ issued, and in bailable actions, with the ac etiam and affidavit to hold to bail; that it contain a statement of all the facts necessary in point of law to sustain the action, and no more; and that these circumstances be set forth with certainty and truth: for it is the foundation of the suit whereunto the adverse party must answer, and whereupon the Court is to give judgment. In local actions, where possession of land is to be recovered, or damages for an actual trespass, or for waste, &c. affecting land, the Plaintiff must lay his Declaration or declare his injury to have happened in the very County and place where it really did happen; but in transitory actions, for injuries which might have happened any where, as a debt, detinue, slander, and the like, he may declare in what County he pleases, but the trial must take place in the County in which the Declaration is laid. The Court will, however, upon special circumstances being laid before it, such as prejudice, &c. against either Plaintiff or Defendant, order the Venue to be changed. A variety of Rules of Court, as connected with Declarations and the legal practices concerning them, will be found in Blackstone's Comm. vol. iii. p. 293; Viner's Abridg. vol. vii., Art. Declaration; Jacob's Law Dict. by Tomlins, Art. Declaration; Chitty, On Pleading, vol. i. p. 248; and Tidd's Practice, vol. i. p. 421.

DECLARATION. — DECLINE.

DECLENSION, Lat. declinatio. See DECLINE, below.

Upon this so palpable declension of spirit in the house, the army seem'd much quieter, and resolv'd to set other agents on their work, that they might not appear too busy and active in their own concernment.

Clarendon. History of Civil Wars, vol. iii. part i. book x.

And is not that worthy observation (though it may serve to abate our high conceipt of our own times,) that ancient languages were more full of declentions; cases, conjugations; tenses, and the like; the moderne commonly destitute of these, doe loosely deliver themselves in many expressions by prepositions, and auxiliary verbes.

Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi. ch. i.

I don't know any greater instance of the decay of wit and learning among the French (which generally follows the declension of empire,) than the endeavouring to follow this foolish kind of wit. [Bouts Rimez.] Spectator, No. 60.

The declension of the needle was discovered, A. D. 1492, by Columbus, in his first voyage to America; and would have been highly alarming to any but one of his undaunted and philosophical turn of mind.

Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book i. Notes.

DECLI'NE, v. DECLI'NE, n. DECLI'NABLE, DECLINA'TION, DECLI'NATORY, DECLI'NING, n. Fr. decliner; Sp. declinar; It. declinare; Lat. declinare; (de, and clin-are; Gr. κλίν-ειν, to bend.) "Fr. decliner; to bend or fall downwards, also, to eschew, decline, bend from, wave, avoid, swarve, turn away, pass by." Cotgrave.

But this is the fortune (q^d she) of hem that either be put in vertue, and battailen against aspre things, or else of hem that enclinen, and declinen fro vices, and taken y^e way of vertue.

Chaucer. The fourth Booke of Boecius, fol. 236.

He was that time in Geminis, I gesse,
But litel fro his declination
Of Cancer.

Id. The Marchantes Tale, vol. i. p. 410.

The high noblesse shal draw to decline
Of Greekes blood, in mischiefe, sorow and wo.

Id. The Story of Thebes. The third Part.

But soo was it after that the worlde waxynge worse, right good and vertuous lygnages declyned and decayed.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 157. A Dialogue concerning Heresies, ch. xxv.

By night she flies amid the cloudy skie,
Shriking by the dark shadow of the earth,
Ne doth decline to the sweete sleepe her eyes.

Surrey. Æneis, book iv.

Your manhoode and courage is alwayes in encrease: but oure force groweth in declination.

Brende. Quintus Curtius, book ix. fol. 260.

O that the ocean did not bound our style
Within these strict and narrow limits so;
But that the melody of our sweet isle
Might now be heard by Tyber, Arne, and Po:
That they might know how far Thames doth out-go
The music of declined Italy.

Daniel. Dedication of the Tragedy of Cleopatra.

ÆCIUS. Mistake not;
I would not stain your honour for the empire,
Nor any way decline you to discredit,
'Tis not my profession, but a villain's.

Beaumont and Fletcher. Valentinian, act iii. sc. 1.

In the afternoone towards the decline of the day (which was done the better to keepe the rebels in opinion, that they should not fight that day,) the Lord Dawbeny marched on towards them, and first bet some troups of them from Detford-bridge, where they fought manfully. Bacon. Henry VII. fol. 170.

This evening from the sun's decline arriv'd
Who tells of som infernal spirit seen
Hitherward bent (who could have thought?) escap'd
The barrs of hell, on errand bad no doubt:
Such where ye find, seise fast, and hither bring.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book iv. l. 792.

The preamble recites, That in time of declination of justice, under pretext of defending the country and themselues, divers great men arrogated to themselves regal authority, under the names of captains; that they acquired to themselves that government, which belonged to the crown.
State Trials. Trial of the Earl of Strafford.

After diuers secret conferences among themselues, and returne of sundry letters into Fraunce, signefying the queen's declination from marriage, and the people's unwillingness, to match that way, (the foresaid lords) held it most conuenient that the duke should come in proper power.
Stow. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1581.

Those who are shaken and scandaliz'd at God's order ev'n in this, which is one of the most seeming declinings of his equitie, at the best, incur Oza's trespass of incredulitie, when he saw the oxen stumble, and the ark lean towards a fall.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 4. part ii. sec. 4.

And a better and nearer example herein may be, our most noble Queen Elizabeth, who never toke yet Greeke or Latin grammer in her hand, after the first declining of a nowne and a verbe. Ascham. The Schole Master.

And, since the Muses do invoke my power,
I shall no more decline that sacred bower,
Where Gloriana, their great mistress lies.
Waller. The Apology of Sleep.

The decline of the old Roman empire making easy way for the powerful ascent of this new comet, [Mahomet] that appeared with such wonder and terror in the world, and with a flaming sword made way wherever it came, or laid all desolate that opposed it.
Sir W. Temple. Of Heroic Virtue.

But, this voluntary neglect of honours has been of rare example in the world: few men have frown'd first upon Fortune, and precipitated themselves from the top of her wheel, before they felt at least, the declination of it.
Dryden. Amboyna. Dedication.

But generally, the extremities of old age are very peeuish and querulous, and a declining and falling back to the weak and helpless condition of infancy and childhood.
Tillotson. Sermon 24.

It however hurt the vogue of Mr. Rysbrach, who, though certainly not obscured, found his business decline, as it was affected considerably afterwards by the competition of Mr. Roubiliac.
Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iv. p. 210.

The strength of the frontiers, which had always consisted in arms rather than fortifications, was insensibly undermined; and the fairest provinces were left exposed to the rapaciousness or ambition of the barbarians, who soon discovered the decline of the Roman empire.
Gibbon. Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. vii.

Infinitives [of Hebrew words] are not declinable.
Sharpe. On the Hebrew language, Letter 4.

These put a sort of bias on the mind, which makes it decline from the straight course; and the further these supposed improvements are carried, the greater this declination grows, till men lose sight of primitive and real nature, and have no other guide but custom, a second and a false nature.
Bolingbroke. Letters to A. Pope. Esq.

At length it was finally settled, in the reign of Henry the Sixth, that the prisoner should first be arraigned; and might either then claim his benefit of clergy, by way of declinatory plea; or, after conviction, by way of arresting judgment.
Blackstone. Commentaries, book iv. ch. xxviii.

DECLIVITY, Fr. declive, steep, deep, hanging or bending downwards. De, and clivus, Gr. κλιτὸς; Æol. κλιπὺς, κλιτὺς, from κλίν-ειν, to bend.
Declination or descent; sloping downwards.

We have, first, the river Dove, that we shall come to by and by, which divides the two counties of Darby and Stafford for many miles together, and is so called from the swiftness of its current: and that swiftness [is] occasioned by the declivity of its course.
Walton. Angler, part ii. ch. i.

And indeed such prodigious conveyances of the waters make it manifest, that no accidental currents and alterations of the waters themselves, no art, or power of man, nothing less than the fiat of the Almighty could ever have made or found so long and commodious declivities and channels for the passage of the waters.
Derham. Physico-Theology, book ii. ch. v.

At length we descended into a valley of greater extent than the former: a river or large wintry torrent ran through it and fell down a steep declivity at the end of it, where it seemed to be lost among the rocks.
Sir W. Jones. Remarks on the Island of Hinsuan.

DECO'CT, DECO'CTION. } Fr. decoction; It. decozione; Sp. decocion; Lat. decoquere, decoctum; de, and coquere, to boil, to seethe. See CONCOCT.

Take the barke and leaues of the sayd tree, and boyl them together, then drinke of the sayd decoccion every other day.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Jaques Cartier, 2. vol. iii. fol. 227.

In all colerike feuers the decoction of this herbe [suckorie] or the water therof stylled, is right expedient.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Castel of Helth, book ii.

Here she attracts, and there she doth retain;
There she decocts, and doth the food prepare;
There she distributes it to ev'ry vein,
There she expels what she may fitly spare.
Davies. The Immortality of the Soul, sec. 12.

If after a decoction of hearbs in a winter-night, we expose the liquor to the frigid air; we may observe in the morning under a crust of ice, the perfect appearance both in figure, and colour of the plants that were taken from it.
Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatising, ch. v.

Holy thistle decocted in clear posset drink was heretofore much used at the beginnings of agues, fevers, unknown diseases, and especially if there be any suspicion of poison or infection.
Boyle. Letter from several Persons, vol. vi. p. 371.

I persuaded her to take, as hot as she could well drink it every morning, a full draught of the decoction of centaury boiled in beer or ale, and to walk after it: she did it heartily for a fortnight or more, recovered her roses, was married, hath children, and continues in health these fourteen years since, this being her only medicine at the first, and in all relapses. Id. Ib.

DECO'LLING, DECO'LLATE, DECOLLA'TION. } Lat. decollare; (de, and collum, the neck; of which the Latin Etymologists give no satisfactory account.) See COLLAR.
To cut off the neck; to sever or separate the head from shoulders; to behead.

In this, xxv. yere aboute the feast of the decollacion of Seynt Johne Baptyst, in the latter ende of August, a noble man of Spayne called Sir Charlys, with a stronge nauye of Spanyardes entrede the Englysshe stremys, and dyd moche harme vnto Kynge Edwardes frendes. Fabyan, Anno 1350.

On tying the cord, there was a strong seam about the neck, by which the head had been, as was supposed, immediately after decollation, fastned again to the body.
State Trials. The Trials of the Regicides.

By a speedy public dethroning and decolling of the King, and disinheriting his posterity, as the army-remonstrants advise.
Parl. History. 24 Charles I. 1648.

The said archbishop esteeming them as varieties, did put them into the library there, where remaining till the decollation of Archb. Laud, were then by the brethren of the predominant faction, given, with the library, to that most notorious villain Hugh Peters. Wood. Athenæ Oxonienses, i. 303.

Heal the poor martyr flay'd or rackt
Shrivel'd and scorcht, and torn and hackt,
Restore the decollated head,
Revive the dying and the dead.
Cambridge. On Painting.

A fine piece of a decollated head of St. John the Baptist was shown to a Turkish Emperor; he praised many things, but he observed one defect; he observed that the skin did not shrink from the wounded part of the neck.

Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful. Introduction.

But one of his [Meloue's] most striking performances was the decollation of St. John, painted in the shades of a single colour.

Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. i. p. 82.

DECOMPO'SE, DECO'MPOSITE, DECOMPOSI'TION, DECOMPO'UND, v. DECOMPO'UND, s. DECOMPO'UND, adj. — Decomponere, ositum; (de, com, and ponere, of uncertain origin.) Componere, to put, place, or set together. To separate or disjoin things so composed or put, placed or set together; to disorder, disarrange, unsettle. To decompound, is also, (by usage) To compound compounds; or to compound things already in themselves compounded.

Decompositæ of three metals, or more, are too long to enquire of, except there be some compositions of them already observed.

Bacon. Works, vol. i. p. 411. Questions touching Minerals.

Congregational presbyteries, they are the natural presbyteries, those others, they are but as step-dames, secondaries; they are but compounds, and decompounds of the several presbyteries of presbyterial churches.

Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. part iv. fol. 139.

For these more confined hypotheses may be subordinated to those more general and fertile principles, and there can be no ingredient assigned, that has a real existence in nature, that may not be derived either immediately, or by a row of decompositions, from the universal matter, modified by its mechanical affections.

Boyle. On Mechanical Hypothesis.

The same may be done in all our complex ideas whatsoever; which, however compounded and decompounded, may at last be resolv'd into simple ideas, which are all the materials of knowledge or thought we have, or can have.

Locke. On Human Understanding, book ii. ch. xxii.

Glass appears to be not only a compounded, but a decompounded body, since the sand or cygnil (as the Venetian glass-men call their pebbles,) or other stones being themselves mixt bodies, are further compounded with the salts that dissolve them.

Boyle. Producibleness of Earth, part vi.

If, I say, we consider this, it may seem probable, that there may be among the works of nature, (not to mention those of art,) a greater number of decompound bodies, than men take notice of.

Id. The Sceptical Chymist.

The naturalist who has made a thousand experiments, with the utmost care and skill; the chemist who has, in like manner, decomposed a thousand natural, and composed as many artificial bodies, are still liable to be deceived.

Bolingbroke. Essay 1. On Human Knowledge.

The change is to be confined to the peccant part only; to the part which produced the necessary deviation; and even then it is to be effected without a decomposition of the whole civil and political mass, for the purpose of originating a new civil order out of the first elements of society.

Burke. On the Revolution in France.

The first is evident of itself, and the second will appear so too, if we consider that in learning their names, and the signification of those names, we learn to decompound them; and that by learning to decompound some, the mind was instructed to compound others.

Bolingbroke. Essay 1. On Human Knowledge.

DE'CORE, DE'CORATE, DECORA'TION, DECO'ROUS, DECO'ROUSNESS, DECO'RUM. — Lat. decorus; from decere. See DECENT, above. Fr. decorer. Used consequentially, To adorn, to ornament, to beautify, to embellish.

It was to theim a notable vertue to decore and beautifie the house of God, to the whiche apperteined holynes, and to set a concorde in Christ's.

Hall. Henry V. The second Yere.

To decore and illustre the same assemblye, and to shewe their forces in armes, thei shall take counsaill & dispose themselfes to do some fayre feate of armes, as well on foot as on horseback, against all commers.

Hall. Henry VIII. The eleventh Yere.

For God I call to record, my harte was fully sette, and my mynde deliberately determined to have decorated this realme, wyth wholesome lawes, statues and ordinaunces.

Id. Edward IV. The twenty-third Yere.

For undoubtedly as many places as thei vexed and sacked with murder and spoylynge, so many or more in conclusion they did ennoble and decorate with their blood and slaughter.

Id. Henry VII. The seventh Yere.

Straight when one nam'd a message from the Lord,
The wicked Eglon rose, (all pride suppress)
And (as he dream'd) with sacred robes decor'd.

Stirling. Doomes-day. The fifth Hour.

Which church he decored with many ornaments and edifices, especially the south side thereof.

Fuller. Worthies. Hant-shire.

His familie (saith Hector Boetius) hath and doth continue in great honor amongest Scotishmen euen vnto this day, and is decorated with the office of the marshalship of Scotland, to the high renowne and fame thereof, amongest the chiefest peeres of the realme.

Holinshed. Scotland. Malcolm.

I have been told by those that have seen both, that our church did even then exceed the Romish in ceremonies and decorations.

Marvel. Works. The Rehearsal Transposed, vol. ii. p. 208.

Men of embitter'd passions and of a destroying spirit, altogether devoid of civility, gentleness and moderation, kindness and benignity towards men, and altogether unacquainted with what is lovely, decorous, venerable, praise-worthy, equitable, and just, can have no part nor lot in this matter.

Mede. Works. The Author's Life, fol. 23.

The will of God is goodness, justice, and wisdom, decorumness, fitness.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 874.

Decorum, or decency, in all our actions that we may avoid all possible offences given, and using this decorum in our gestures, applications, speeches, habit, addresses, receptions, and generally in all we do.

Hall. Contemplations. Of doing as thee would be done to.

At this the seed of Neptune, goddess born,
"For ornament, not use, these arms are worn;
This helm, and heavy buckler, I can spare;
As only decorations of the war."

Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book xii.

If he [Charles Townsend] had not so great a stock, as some have had who flourished formerly, of knowledge long treasured up, he knew better by far, than any man I ever was acquainted with, how to bring together within a short time, all that was necessary to establish, to illustrate, and to decorate that side of the question he supported.

Burke. On the American Taxation.

Such is the apology, expressed or implied, of many individuals, who support a decorous character, and imagine that they are in no respect objects of compassion.

V. Knox. Sermon 9.

Her first fault evidently was that gross violation of all decorum, and all custom too, in appearing and dancing publicly before Herod, and a large number of his friends assembled at a festive meeting, and perhaps half intoxicated with wine.

Porteus. Lecture 14.

DECO'RTICATE, DECORTICA'TION. — De, and cortex, the bark. To strip off the bark or rind.

Take great barley, dried and decorticated, after it is well washed, and boil it in water.

Arbuthnot. On Coins.

Decortication, the putting off the outward bark of trees; also the peeling or unhusking of roots.

Miller. Gardener's Dictionary.

DECOSTEA, in Botany, a genus of the class Dioecia, order Pentandria. Generic character: male flower, calyx five-toothed; corolla, petals five: female flower, corolla none; style three; drupe one-seeded. One species, D. scandens, native of Peru. Persoon.

DE-CREASE. — DECREE.

Never such comfort came to mortal man,
Never such joy was since the world began,
As in the ark, when Noah and his behold
The olive leaf, which certainly them told
The flood decreas'd. Drayton. Noah's Flood.

It is a position of mathematiques; that there is no proportion between somewhat and nothing; therefore the degrees of nullity and quiddity, seem larger than the degrees of increase and decrease. Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi.

For the inertia of matter, causeth, not only (as this learned author observes) that velocity decreases in proportion as quantity of matter increases, (which is indeed no decrease of the quantity of motion;) but also that solid and perfectly hard bodies, void of elasticity, meeting together with equal and contrary forces, lose their whole motion and active force.

Papers between Clarke and Leibnitz. Fifth Reply, p. 345.

If this spring had its origine from rain and vapours, there would be an increase and decrease of the one, as there should happen to be of the other; as actually it is in such temporary springs, as have undoubtedly their source from rain and vapours.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book ii. ch. v.

According to the latest observations the hoops are found to have increased two-tenths of an inch in diameter, and the hats to have decreased two-fifths in the brim. Adventurer, No. 35.

In this run, the variation of the compass gradually decreased from 11° west, which it was at Ascension, to 1° west, which we found off Fernando de Noronha.

Cook. Second Voyage, book iv. ch. x.

DECREATION; de, and creare, atum, to create. See CONCREATE.

Especially the continual decreation and annihilation of the souls of brutes, &c. Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 45.

DECRE'E, v.
DECRE'E, n.
DECRE'ER, DE'CREMENT, DECRE'TE,
DECRE'TAL, n.
DECRE'TAL, adj.
DECRE'TIST, DECRE'TIVE,
DE'CRETORY,
DE'CRETORIAL.

Lat. decern-ere, decretum; de, and cernere, from the Gr. κρίνειν, to separate, to distinguish, to divide. See DECERN, and DISCERN. It. decretare; Sp. decretar; Fr. de-creter.

To adjudge, to order, ordain, enact, establish, award, appoint.

At London þei wer atteynt, decre was mad for þate.

R. Brunne, p. 122.

þe decretal ne were ordeynd for þis.

Id. p. 337.

And, eke as sayth the decree, a woman that is a wif, as long as she is a wif, she hath non auctoritee to swere ne bere witnesse, without leve of hire husbonde, that is hire lord.

Chaucer. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 372.

Thilke same senate, doen through her decretes and her iudgmentes, as though it were a sin and a fellony, that is, to wilne the sauacion of them.

Id. The first Booke of Boecius, fol. 213.

The pope anone vpon the cas
Of his papall auctoritee
Hath made and youe the decree.

Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 44.

Suche was the decreed wyll of the father, that Christe shoulde suffre these thynges for our offences.

Udall. Philippians, ch. ii.

As they went thorow the cities, they delyuered theim the decrees for to kepe, ordeyned the apostles and elders, whiche were at Jerusalem. Bible, Anno 1551. Acts, ch. xvi.

Yᵉ pope, whē he hath bene enformed of a bisshoppes faut, hath as by diuers decretals appereth proceded to the punishment & amendment thereof.

Sir Thomas More. Workes. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall's Answer, fol. 619.

RICH. Let them lay by their helmets and their speares,
And both returne back to their chaires againe:
Withdraw with us, and let the trumpets sounde,
While we returne these dukes what we decree.

Shakspeare. Richard II. fol. 26.

——— They therefore as to right belong'd,
So were created, nor can justly accuse
Their maker, or their making, or thir fate,
As if predestination over-rul'd
Thir will, dispos'd by absolute decree
Or high forknowledg; they themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I.

Milton. Paradise Lost, book iii. l. 115.

COM. Flower of warriors, how is it with Titus Lartius?
MAR. As with a man busied about decrees;
Condemning some to death, and some to exile,
Ransoming him, or pittying, threat'ning th' other.

Shakspeare. Coriolanus, fol. 6.

Further yet, and it is worth observing, there was never any Bishop of Rome from S. Peter to S. Sylvester, that ever writ a decretal epistle now extant and transmitted to us, but either professedly or accidentally he said or intimated, that the order of bishops did come from God.

Taylor. Pol. Dis. Episcopacy Asserted, sec. 12.

The decree of Gratian is concordantia discordantiarum, a heap or bundle of contrary opinions, doctrines, or rules; and they agree no otherwise than a hyæna and a dog catch'd in the same snare, or put into a bag; and the decretals and extravagants are in very great parts of them nothing but boxes of tyranny and error, usurpation and superstition.

Id. Ib. fol. 400.

In thy book it is written of me, says Christ; that I should do thy will; he is not willing only, but the first decreer of it, it is written of me.

Goodwin. Works, vol. i. part iii. fol. 103.

By way of publick duel, to the decreeing whereof the lord constable and himself, with the assent of those honourable persons of counsel with the court, did intend to proceed.

State Trials. Proceedings of the Court of Chivalry against Mr. David Ramsey.

For I was afraid for the weake hearers of the Scripture (which scarslie obeie the iust sentence of their pastour) much more despising this vniust decreement, through the onerous and importable transgression of their pastor, should shew themselues disobedient.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 124. Hulderike's Epistle to Pope Nicholas, Anno 867.

These men are vain and light, easie and effeminate, childish and absurd; these are they of whom our blessed Saviour said those sad decretory words, many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able. Taylor. Sermon 7. part i.

But the main considerations, which most set off this number, are observations drawn from the motions of the moon, supposed to be measured by sevens, and the critical or decretory daies dependant on that number.

Sir Thomas Brown, book iv. ch. xii.

Celestial states, immortal Gods! give ear,
Hear our decree, and reverence what ye hear;
The fix'd decree, which not all heaven can move,
Thou, Fate! fulfil it; and, ye Powers, approve.

Pope. Homer. Iliad, book viii.

But that there was a decretal bull sent by Campegio, will appear evidently in the sequel of this relation.

Burnet. History of the Reformation, Anno 1527.

So that by this law, we are liable to have a large Bible; not only the Old and New Testament, but all the new decretals of the old gentleman at Rome, and they not apocryphal, but most properly canonical.

Boyle. Letters from several Persons, vol. vi. p. 311.

The will of God is either decretive or preceptive: the decretive extends to all events; nothing falls out at random, nothing by rash chance and casualty, but all things come to pass "according to the counsel of his will," by his efficiency or permission.

Bates. On Spiritual Perfection, ch. xi.

DECREE. God found it needful to bring up the rear of all with those decretory words, in Deut. xxx. 19. Behold, I have this day set before you life and death, blessing and cursing.

South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 221.

With regard to the parts and powers of nature, which the heathen world deified, they are represented in Scripture as the creatures of God's power, and the passive instruments of his decrees. Farmer. On Miracles, ch. iii. sec. 2.

You would persuade the world, that I condemn Scripture doctrines in the lump, and overrule the Scripture itself, in a decretorial manner; because I do not submit to your explications of Scripture. Id. Letters to Worthington, let. 1.

The DECRETALS mentioned in the above quotations are rescripts of the Pope, or of the Pope and Cardinals, for ordering or determining some matter of controversy. In the Roman Catholic Church they rank as Canonical Epistles, and have the authority of Law in themselves. The first collection of the Decretals appeared about the year 760, under the name of Isidore Peccator, or Mercator. It was brought from Spain into Germany by Riculphus, Bishop of Mayence. Both the authenticity and the authority of this collection is disputed, and in great measure given up, even by the Roman Catholics themselves; and it is generally admitted, that no part of it is genuine, anterior to a Letter of Pope Siricius to Himerus, Bishop of Tarragona in 385. The proofs of the forgeries contained in this collection are given by Moreri, (Decretales.) This was followed in 845 by the Capitularies of Adrian; in 906 by the Collection of Rheginon, Abbot of Prumia; in 1000 by the Collection of Burchardius, Bishop of Worms, known as the Magnum Decretorum seu Canonum volumen; in 1100 by the Decretum Canonum et Pannomia of Ivo. The Western Church in 1150 adopted the celebrated work of Gratian, a Benedictine Monk of Bologna, Concordia discordantium Canonum, which is an epitome of Canon Law, drawn from Decrees of Councils, Letters of Pontiffs, and writings of ancient Doctors. This work was frequently republished with large additions and corrections; and for many centuries was the text book of Canonists. Innocent III. and Honorius III. published their own Letters. Raynal of Pennafort, a Dominican, formed a new collection, at the desire of Gregory IX., which bears the name of that Pontiff, Libri quinque Decretalium Gregorii Noni. It appeared in 1230, and is sometimes called the Pentateuch. Boniface VIII. added to it a Liber Sextus Decretalium in 1298, containing the Decretals of Gregory IX. and those subsequent down to his own Papacy. To this again was appended Liber Septimus Decretalium, or Clementis Papæ Constitutiones, by Clement V. in 1313. The Extravagantes Joannis XXII. were compiled in 1340, the Extravagantes Communes, (containing Decrees from Urban VI. to Sixtus IV.) in 1483. Neither of the last bear any authority, for John XXII. never approved or sanctioned the Collection passing under his name; and the author of the other is unknown. Peter Matthæi published a Collection in 1590, sometimes stiled the Liber Septimus Decretalium, and with this the legitimate Decretals end. Butler's Horæ Juridicæ subsecivæ.

DECREE, in Law, the judgment of a Court of Equity on a Bill preferred, after fully hearing the merits of the case. Decrees are either interlocutory or final. It seldom happens that they are in the first instance final; for if any matter of fact is strongly controverted, a Court of Equity is so fully aware of the deficiency of trial by written depositions, that it usually directs the fact so controverted to be tried by a Jury, for which purpose it makes an interlocutory Decree, directing an issue to be tried in one of the Courts of Common Law; or if a question of Law arises in the course of a Cause, then it Decrees that a case should be stated wherein all the material facts are admitted, for the opinion of the Judges of one of the Courts. This case is argued before them, and they certify their opinion to the Chancellor; and upon such certificate, or finding of a Jury, the final Decree is founded. Matters of account, inquiries as to incumbrances and debts, are also referred to the Masters of the Court by interlocutory Decrees; and on their report the final Decree is pronounced. If by this final Decree either party conceive himself aggrieved, he may petition the Chancellor for a rehearing of the Cause. This petition must be signed by two Counsel, certifying, that they apprehend the Cause is proper to be reheard. Upon the rehearing, all the evidence taken in the Cause, whether read before or not, is admitted to be read; because the rehearing implies that the Chancellor is sitting to hear the reasons why the Decree should not be enrolled and perfected. After the Decree is once signed and enrolled it cannot be reheard, or rectified, except by Bill of review, or Appeal to the House of Lords. DECREE. — DECREMENTS.

A Bill of review may be had upon an error in judgment appearing on the face of the Decree, or by special leave of the Court, upon oath made of the discovery of new matter or evidence which could not be had or used at the time when the Decree was passed; but no new evidence or matter then in the knowledge of the parties, and which might have been used before shall be a sufficient ground for a Bill of review.

An Appeal to the House of Lords is effected by petition, and not by writ of error, as upon judgments at Common Law. This jurisdiction is supposed to have originated about 18 James I. No new evidence is admitted to be produced in an Appeal to the House of Lords.

The authority of the Master of the Rolls as to hearing Causes, was at one time much disputed; and it became necessary to pass a Statute, 3 George II. ch. 30, declaring that all Orders and Decrees made by him, except such as by the course of the Court were appropriated to the Great Seal alone, should be deemed valid, subject to review by the Chancellor. They cannot be enrolled, however, without being first signed by the Chancellor.

DECREMENT, decrescere, to grow less, to decrease, q. v.

Lessening, decrease, diminution.

SPA. Thou'rt a prick-ear'd foist, a cittern-headed gew-gaw, a knack, a snipper-snapper! Twit me with the decrements of my pendants.

Ford. The Fancies Chaste and Noble, act i. sc. 2.

For in the latter age upon the tropick and first descension from our solstice, we are scarce sensible of declination; but declining further, our decrement accelerates, we set apace, and in our last dayes precipitate into our graves.

Sir Thomas Brown, book vi. ch. iv.

We found it very difficult to measure, in what proportion these decrements of the mercurial cylinder did proceed.

Boyle. On the Spring of the Air.

The term DECREMENTS is still in use in the Bursarial accounts of Colleges; and signifies small sums, deducted from the payments to the scholars, for various trifling articles not specifically charged, such as salt, pepper, &c., and, in some instances, for the fuel used in the common Hall. The word has, by some, been derived from decoramen, as applied to the decorations of the table; but decresco appears to be the proper Etymology.

DECREMENTS. DECREW.

DECRE'PIT, DECRE'PITNESS, DECRE'PITUDE, DECRE'PITY. } Fr. decrepite; It. decrepito; Lat. decrepitus. Scaliger says, that old men are called decrepit, by a metaphor derived from lanterns or candles; which are said decrepare, to creak or crackle, when they send forth a noise at the moment of going out. Vossius;—a metaphor, a rebus fragilibus, which from old age creak if you move them.

Groaning under infirmities, under the weight of age; weighed down by years.

Ages be foure:—Age decrepite, vntil the last time of lyfe accidently moist, but naturally cold and dry, wherein the powers and strength of the bodye be more and more minished.
Sir Thomas Elyot. The Castel of Helth, book i. fol. 13.

And therein sate an old man, halfe blind,
And all decrepit in his feeble corse,
Yet lively vigour rested in his mind,
And recompenc't him with a better scorse: [exchange]
Weake body well is chang'd for minds redoubled forse.
Spenser. Faerie Quene, book ii. can. 9.

——————— But chief of all,
O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, decrepit age!
Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 69.

How think you now, sir?
GOST. Even just as before,
And have more cause to think honest credulity
Is a true loadstone to draw on decrepity.
Chapman. All Fools, act iv. sc. 1.

Nor John Apple, whose wither'd rind, intrencht
With many a furrow, aptly represents
Decrepid age, nor that from Harvey nam'd,
Quick relishing. J. Philips. Cider, book i.

All ages, from wailing infancy to querulous decrepitness, and all conditions, from the carefull sceptre to the painfull spade, are fraught with many great inconveniences peculiar to each of them.
Barrow. Sermon 8. vol. iii.

Last, Winter comes; decrepid, old, and dull;
Yet has his comforts too—his barns are full;
The social converse, circulating glass,
And cheerful fire, are his.
Jenyns. An Ode.

By the young and gay, those who are entering the world, either as a scene of business or pleasure, I [To-day] am frequently desired with much impatience, that although every moment brings on wrinkles and decrepitude with irresistible rapidity, they would be willing that the time of my absence should be annihilated, and the approach of wrinkles and decrepitude rendered yet more precipitate. Adventurer, No. 11.

DECRE'PITATE, DECRI'PATE. } To deprive of the power of crackling. See DECREPIT.

So will it come to pass in a pot of salt, although decrepitated, and so also in a pot of snow.
Sir Thomas Brown, ch. v.

Into the leg of a worsted stocking, that has long been worn next to the flesh, put in a sufficient quantity of sea-salt exactly dried, or else decripated. Boyle. Receipt 234.

DECREW, Fr. decru; from "decroistre, to lessen, decrease, wain." Cotgrave.

Thus long they tract, and trauerst to and fro,
Sometimes persewing and sometimes persewed,
Still as advantage they espied thereto:
But toward th' end, Sir Arthegall renewed
His strength still more, but she still more decrewed.
Spenser. Faerie Quecne, book iv. can. 6.

DECROWNING; taking away, or depriving of the Crown.

He holds it no more sin the decrowning of kings, than our puritans do the suppression of bishops.
Overbury. Characters.

DECRY', DECRI'AL, DECRI'ER, DECRY'ING. } To cry down, to raise a cry or clamour against. "Fr. descrier; to cry down or call in, uncurrent or naughty coin; also publickly to discredit, disparage, disgrace; to publish the faults, divulge the imperfections, blaze the wants, proclaim the defects of." Cotgrave.

And it ought to be remembered, that this was done by those men, who a few years before had so bitterly decried, and openly opposed, the king's regular and formal way of proceeding in the trial of a little ship-money.
Cowley. On the Government of Oliver Cromwell.

They preserve the authority and sacredness of government, and possibly they are therefore decried, that the reputation of authority may decline altogether.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 29. An Apology for authorised Forms of Liturgie.

Next, my lords to shew the decrying of the people in this time of shipping itself in the rolls of 21 and 51 of Ed. I., there the people said they were not bound to bear the charge: so it was no practice for the commons to decry it.
State Trials. The King against John Hampden, Esq.

But it hath been said, that the people have always petitioned against it, and there hath been a decrying by the people, and they have petitioned in parliament against it. Id. Ib.

Thus men are rais'd by faction, and decry'd;
And rogue and saint distinguish'd by their side.
Dryden. The Medal.

The forward wits, who without waiting their due time, or performing their requisite studys, start up in the world as authors, having with little pains or judgment, and by the strength of fancy merely, acquir'd a name with mankind, can on no account afterwards submit to a decrial or disparagement of those raw works to which they ow'd their early character and distinction.
Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, misc. 5. ch. ii.

And here I cannot but reflect on the brutish folly and absurd impudence of the late fanatic decryers of the necessity of human learning, in order to the ministerial function.
South. Sermons, vol. vii. p. 37.

What an insufferable impudence then are they guilty of, who now-a-days decry all reading, study, and learning, and rely only on enthusiasm and immediate inspiration.
Bishop Bull. Works, vol. i. p. 251.

DECU'BATION, DECU'MBENCE, DECU'MBENCY, DECU'MBENT. } Lat. decumbere, to lie down; present participle decumbens, past decubitus; de, and cumbere, to lie. A lying down.

And yet must thus much come to pass, if we opinion they lie not down and enjoy no decumbence at all.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. i.

And therefore Causabon justly rejecteth Theophilact; who not considering the ancient manner of decumbency, imputed this gueasture of the beloved disciple unto rusticity, or an act of incivility. Id. book v. ch. vi.

Underneath is the decumbent portraiture of a woman, resting on a death's head. Ashmol. Berkshire, vol. i. p. 2.

A phrenitis came on the eighth day, where the patient was in the vigour of his youth, had not been blooded, and had been kept in a dose from his first decumbiture.
Boyle. Letters from several Persons, vol. vi. p. 649.

BANUN.

If but a mile she travel out of town,
The planetary hour must first be known
And lucky moment; if her eye but akes
Or itches, its decumbiture she takes.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 6.

DECUMARIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Icosandria, order Monogynia, natural order Myrti. Generic character: calyx superior, eight to ten-cleft; petals eight to ten; capsules seven to nine-celled, many-seeded; seeds awl-shaped, minute.

Two species, D. barbara and D. tomentosa, natives of North America. Nuttall.

DECUPLE, Fr. decuple; Lat. decuplus, from decem, ten. Tenfold.

If the apostle, 1 Tim. v. 17, requires that an elder, provided he rule well, be accounted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in the word and doctrine, it excludes not a decuple or any further proportion, and indeed there cannot too high a value be set upon such a person.
Marvel. Works, vol. ii. p. 120. Essay touching General Councils, &c.

If the same proportion holds between the insects native of England, and those of the rest of the world, as doth between plants domestick and exotick, (that is, as I guess, near a decuple) the species of insects in the whole earth, (land and water) will amount to 10,000. Ray. On the Creation, part i.

There is no impossibility or absurdity in its being double or treble or decuple to what it is, for there is abundant room for multitudes of atoms more in the empty spaces between those already in being.
Search. Light of Nature, vol. ii. part i. ch. vii.

DECU'RION, DECU'RY. Lat. decurio; one who is appointed over ten, decem. See DECIMATE.

And lo a man, Joseph by name, of Aramathie a cytee of Judee that was a decurion, a good man and a just.
Wiclif. Luke, ch. xxiii.

He equalled it also after a sort, and in some part with the verie cittie of Rome in priviledges and estimation: by devising a new kind of suffrages which the decurions or elders of colonies gave every one in their own tounеshippe, as touching maiestrates to bee created in Rome.
Holland. Suetonius. Octavius Cæsar Augustus, fol. 60.

The order of it was this: All the fathers or senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into tens or decuries, and governed successively by the space of five days, one decury after another in order.
Ralegh. History of the World, book v. ch. iii. sec. 7.

To three decuries of judges he added a fourth out of a lower and meaner degree, which went under the name of ducenarii, and were to iudge of smaller summes.
Holland. Suetonius. Octavius Cæsar Augustus, fol. 53.

He instituted decurions through both these colonies, that is, one over every ten families, another over fifty, a third over a hundred, a fourth over five hundred, and a fifth over a thousand.
Sir William Temple. On Heroic Virtue.

Some of the Roman uses of the title DECURIO are sufficiently explained in the above quotations. The Military Decurio commanded a Decuria or ten men. The Decurio Municipalis was one of a Council of Ten in free and corporate colonial towns, or as others say, not called so from the number of the Minor Senatus being confined to ten, but because every tenth man was made a Senator when the colony was planted. There were also Religious Decuriones, whose offices are less perfectly known.

DECURRENT, decurrere, decurrens, to run down; de, and currere, to run. Running down. DECURRENT.

[Leaves] darker and very soft above, paler below with protuberant veins, downy on both sides, mostly decurrent on the long hoary petiols.
Sir William Jones. Botan. Obs. On Select Indian Plants.

DECURSION, decurrere, ursum; to run down, de, and currere, to run. A running down.

Matter is never lost or annihilated: what is decayed by that decursion of waters is in some measure supplied by the terrene faces which that water brings with it.
Hale. The Origination of Mankind, sec. 1. ch. iii.

Moreover not only things but customs, civil and religious, are preserved upon coins, as sacrifices, triumphs, congiaries, allocutions, decursions, &c. Priestley. On History, part ii. lec. 6.

DECURT, Lat. curtus; Gr. κυρτός, cut short.

Your decurted or headlesse clause, Angelorū enim et cet, is thus Englyshed. Bale. Apology, p. 147.

DECU'SSATE, DECUSSA'TION, DECU'SSATIVE, DECU'SSATIVELY. Lat. decussis, decem asses. From its sign or mark X (ten) is decussare, to decussate, to reduce any thing to this form; and thus, to intersect at acute angles.

Answerable whereunto we observe the decussated characters in many Consulary coynes, and even in those of Constantine and his sons, which pretend their pattern in the sky.
Sir Thomas Brown. Cyrus Garden, ch. i.

Owing this name not onely unto the quintuple number of trees, but the figure declaring that number, which being doubled at the angle, makes up the letter X, that is the emphatical decussation, or fundamental figure. Id. Ib.

The Statuæ Isiacæ, Teraphims, and little idols found about the mummies, do make decussation or Jacob's crosse, with their armes, like that on the head of Ephraim and Manasses, and this decussis is also graphically described between them.
Id. Ib. ch. iii.

As the oyle was poured coronally or circularly upon the head of kings, so the high priest was anointed decussatively or in the form of a X. Id. Ib.

The incession or locall motion of animals is made with analogy unto this figure, by decussative diametrals, quincunciall lines and angles. Id. Ib.

This Galen, and others after him, generally thought to be from a coalition or decussation of the optick nerves, behind the os sphænoides. But whether they decussate, coalesce, or only touch one another, they do not well agree.
Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. ii.

What infinite rencounters and decussations, meetings and crossings through all the parts of our solar system.
Watts. Philosophical Essays, ess. 10. sec. 1.

DEDENTITION, falling of the teeth. Lat. dens, dentis; if, says Vossius, of Latin origin, it is formed by apocope from edens, eating, that which eateth.

Solon divided it into ten septenaries, because in every one thereof, a man received some sensible mutation, in the first is dedentition or falling of teeth.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iv.

Brown has wor still more extraordinary, as feriation, for keeping holiday, dedentition for falling of teeth.
Beattie. Moral Science, part iv. ch. i. sec. 3.

DE'DICATE, v. DE'DICATE, adj. DEDICA'TION, DEDICA'TING, DEDICA'TOR, DE'DICATORY. Lat. dedicare; Sp. dedicar; Fr. dedier; de, and dicare, which, says Vossius, is the same as attribuere, ac præcipuè consecrare; to attribute, and especially to consecrate. To allot, to appropriate or apportion, to devote, to consecrate. DE-DICATE.

The thridde circumstance is the place, ther thou hast don sinne, whether in other mennes houses or in thine owen, in feld, in chirche, or in chirchawe, in chirche dedicate, or non.
Chaucer. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 376.

DE-DICATE. — DEDI-TION.

Now, before we vse either to write, or speake eloquently, wee must dedicate our myndes wholy to followe the most wise and learned men, and seeke to fashion as wel thir speache and gesturing, as their witte or endytyng.

Wilson. The Arte of Retorique, fol. 5.

And the princes offered vnto y^e^ dedicatynge of the altar in the daye that it was anoynted, & brought their gyftes before the altar. Bible, Anno 1551. Numeri, ch. vii.

To her my thoughts I daily dedicate,
To her my hart I nightly martyrize:
To her my loue I lowely do prostrate,
To her my life I wholly sacrifice.

Spenser. Colin Clouts come home again.

Upon this vow of amendment, they had their desire; plenty was sent them, and then setting aside the dedicate portion, the tenth of all the increase of their grounds, and of their cattel, they offered it unto those Gods.

Spelman. On Tithes, fol. 123.

Neither is it to be pass'd over in silence, that this dedicating of colledges and societies, only to the use of professory learning, hath, not only bin an enemy to the growth of sciences, but hath redounded likewise to the prejudice of states and governments.

Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats. To the King, book ii.

That which is made holy by the dedication of men, and given to God, so as to be used only in his public service, is called also sacred, and said to be consecrated.

Hobbes. Of a Christian Commonwealth, part iii. ch. xxv.

My Lord, this poem, which receiv'd its first occasion of birth from yourselfe and others of your noble familie, and much honour from your own person in the performance, now returns againe to make a final dedication of itselfe to you.

H. Lawes. To Lord Viscount Brackly, in Birch's Life of Milton.

He made it his work to see what books were in the press, and to look over epistles dedicatory, and prefaces to the reader, to see what faults might be found.

State Trials. The Case of Archbishop Abbot.

I conceive, readers, much may be guess'd at the man and his book, what depth there is, by the framing of his title; which being in this remonstrant so rash and unadvised as ye see, I conceit him to be near a-kin to him who set forth a passion sermon, with a formal dedicatory in great letters to our Saviour.

Milton. An Apology for Smectymnuus.

For to whom can I dedicate this poem, with so much justice as to you? It is the representation of your own hero: it is the picture drawn at length, which you admire and prize so much in little. Dryden. The Medal. Epistle to the Whigs.

The feast of the dedication of churches was to be held every year, on the first Sunday in October; but the feast of the patron of the church was to be no more observed.

Burnet. History of the Reformation, Anno 1536.

Leave dangerous truths to unsuccessful satires,
And flattery to some fulsome dedicators,
Whom, when they praise, the world believes no more
Than when they promise to give scribbling o'er.

Pope. Essay on Criticism.

This digression, my lord, is not altogether to the purpose of an epistle dedicatory: yet 'tis expected that somewhat shou'd be said even here, in relation to criticism; at least in vindication of my address, that you may not be desir'd to patronize a poem, which is wholly unworthy of your protection.

Dryden. Love's Triumph. Epistle Dedicatory.

'Tis in vain, alas! I find,
Much in vain, my zealous mind
Would to learned Wisdom's throne
Dedicate each thoughtful hour:
Nature bids a softer power
Claim some minutes for his own.

Akenside. Ode 8. book ii.

One can hardly think otherwise than that the author of Mr. Evelyn's life must have been misiuformed, and never have seen or carefully considered the inscription on the title dedicatory, and the prints themselves.

Walpole. Catalogue of Engravers, vol. v. p. 150.

DEDITION, Lat. deditio; from dedere, deditum, to give up. A giving up, yielding, surrendering.

The asseige of the castell of Bridgenorth vpon Seuerne, and the compulsion of the woorthie knight Hugh Mortimer to dedition to the terrible example of all.

Holinshed. Ireland, book ii. ch. vi.

And the rather because of the custom of the eastern princes, who in token of dedition exacted from subjugated provinces earth and water. Judith, ii. 7.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. fol. 323. Annotations on the 111 Psalm.

DEDU'CE. DEDU'CEMENT, DEDU'CIBLE, DEDU'CING, DEDU'CIVE, DEDU'CT, DEDU'CTION, DEDU'CTIVE, DEDU'CTIVELY.

Deduce, Lat. deducere, to lead away from; and deduct, from deduct-um, past participle; (de, and ducere, to lead. Of uncertain origin.) Fr. deduir; Sp. deduzir; It. didurre.

To lead, draw or bring from. See the Example from Selden. Generally used met. in reasoning, as to deduce a consequence from premised propositions; to infer, to bring, bear or take from, to subtract.

We deduce therupō that he wil not suffer his church fal into y^e^ erronious belief of anie dānable vntrouthe, but lead thē into y^e^ trouth y^t^ is y^e^ cōtrarie of y^e^ vntrouth.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 461. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

It is easy also & lyght, and a very pure gospell, y^t^ is to wit, a preaching of fayth & loue: deducyng the loue to God out of fayth, and the loue of a man's neighbour out of the loue of God.

Tyndall. Workes, fol. 21. Prologues upon the Five Books of Moses.

This werke who so shal se or rede
Of any incongruitie doe me not impeche,
Ordinately behoveth mee first to procede
In deduction thereof, in maner as the leche
His pacient's sicknes oweth first for to seche.

Chaucer. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 323.

The Philippians are in the first parte of Macedonia, as it is declared in the xvi. of the Acts, a people deducted oute of the citie of Philippos, so called of Philip the buyldour of it.

Udall. Preface to the Philippians.

Whom when he beheld coming, he sodainly lefte the matter, with which he was in hand, and without ani deduccion therunto, out of al order, & oute of al frame, began to repete those wordes again.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 61. History of King Richard III.

But yet if he would honestlye stande to his tackling in this pointe, and geue vs the like libertie that himselfe wil take, and neither vse false deduccions of hys owne, nor refuse our deduccions yf we deduce them wel: we would neuer finde fault in this point.

Id. Ib. fol. 461. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

It is justified by express assertion of an old oracle to Archias, a Corinthian, advising him he should hither deduce a colony.

Selden. Illustrations of Drayton, song 17.

Out of these grounds, I may then in my opinion safely and with some confidence deduce and maintain this position; that the common law of England giveth to the king, as to the head of the common wealth, no perpetuall revenue or matter of profit out of the interest or property of the subject.

State Trials. The great Case of Impositions.

What other deducements or analogies are cited out of St. Paul, to prove a likeness between the ministers of the Old and New Testament, having tried their sinews, I judge they may pass without harm-doing to our cause.

Milton. Reason of Church Government, vol. i. fol. 49.

And so not laying to heart the greatness and goodness of God, but blinding himself with an undue zeal to his own person, he [Adam] most unnaturally made himself God's rival, as if he himself were capable of divine knowledge, or God deducible to human imbecility.

State Trials. Trial of Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn.

For hauing yet in his deducted spright
Some sparks remaining of that heauenly fire,
He is enlumin'd with that goodly light,
Vnto like goodly semblant to aspire.

Spenser. An Hymn of Loue.

DUCE. — EED.

He keepeth a hundred slaves at least in the mines, each slave being bound to bring in dayly cleare gaine (all charges deducted) three pezoes of gold for himself, and two for his woman (eight shillings and three pence to the pezo.)
Sir Francis Drake Revived, fol. 69.

To insist upon the declaration and deduction of this point, and pass along through the series and course of so many ages and centuries, as it would be over long for this place, so further I might herein seem as it were to gild gold.
State Trials. Trial of Henry Garnet.

Where he succeeds not thus high, he labours to introduce a secondary and deductive Atheism; that although men concede there is a God, yet should they deny his providence.
Sir Thomas Brown, book i. ch. x.

For although to opinion there be many Gods, may seem an access in religion, and such as cannot at all consist with Atheism, yet doth it deductively and upon inference include the same, for unity is the inseparable and essential attribute of Deity.
Id.

Some things too I have omitted, and sometimes have added of my own. Yet the omissions, I hope, are but of circumstances, and such as wou'd have no grace in English; and the additions, I also hope, are easily deduc'd from Virgil's sense.
Dryden. Virgil's Æneid. Dedication.

Our modern philosophers, nay and some of our philosophising divines, have too much exalted the faculties of our souls, when they have maintained that, by their force, mankind has been able to find out that there is one supreme agent or intellectual being, which we call God: that praise and prayer are his due worship; and the rest of those deducements, which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation, and unattainable by our discourse, I mean as simply considered, and without the benefit of divine illumination. Id. Religio Laici. Preface.

The late king had also agreed, that two and a half per cent should be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops, which amounted to fifteen thousand pounds.
Burnet. Own Times, Anno 1711.

And I should wonder, if any one should allow the certainty of deduction to consist in the agreement of two things in a third, and yet should deny that the knowledge or certainty of that agreement consisted in the perception of it.
Locke. Second Reply to the Bishop of Worcester.

This is the true virtue of fortitude, which is nothing but endeavouring firmly and honestly to act as truth requires; and therefore is directly deducible from that notion on which we have founded the morality of human acts.
Wollaston. Religion of Nature, p. 183.

From the words of Moses, cited by our Saviour, the doctrine of a future state may as clearly be deduced as from any single text which can be produced out of any one of the prophets.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

His omniscience also, as far as respects things present, is deducible from his nature, as an intelligent being, joined with the extent, or rather the universality of his operations.
Paley. Natural Theology, ch. xxiv.

Which poem I ordain to be always in English, and to be printed, the expense of which shall be deducted out of the product of the estate, and the residue given as a reward for the composer of the poem, or ode, or copy of verses.
Smart. Clause in Mr. Seaton's Will.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shewn in the deduction of one language from another.
Johnson. English Dictionary. Preface.

DEED, DEE'DLESS, DEE'DY, DEED-DARING. ("Like actum and factum) means something, any thing done. It is the past participle of the A. S. verb don, to do. Do-ed, did, deed, is the same word differently spelled. It was formerly written dede, both for the past tense and past participle." See Tooke, v. 2.

Deedy; industrious, notable. Berks. Grose. It is properly applied to any one doing attentively.

DEED.

Sire, heo seyde, yleue not þat my sustren al soþ seide.
Ac for me my self, [Cordelia] ich wol soþ segge of þis dede.
R. Gloucester, p. 30.

Walter Spek was in þat stoure, gode knight at alle nedes, þe boke tellis grete honour of his douhty dedes.
R. Brunne, p. 114.

For David was þe douhtiest. of dedus in hus tyme.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 373.

For pitee maketh a kynge curteise
Both in his worde and in his dede.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 159.

Howe be it in uery dede the name of the cytie was Lais at the beginninge. Bible, Anno 1551. Judges, ch. xviii.

——————————— Dispaire:
Who first vs greets, and after faire areedes
Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:
So creeping close, as snake in hidden weedes,
Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.
Spenser. Facrie Queene, book i. can. 9.

Vnblest, great-high deed-daring man that car'd not doing ill.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book v. fol. 71.

Th' undaunted power of princes should not be
Confin'd in deedless cold calamity.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Bloody Brother, act iv. sc. 2.

Yet thou (even Hector) deedlesse standst, and car'st not to employ,
Thy towne borne friends, to bid them stand, to fight and save their wives. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book v. fol. 73.

The monarch, blinded with desire of wealth,
With steel invades his brother's life by stealth;
Before the sacred altar made him bleed,
And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book i.

Whatever notions some may have of the soul in its state of separate existence, yet a mere spirit is not a man; for man is made of soul and body: and therefore to bring the man into judgment to answer for his deeds, the soul and the body must be brought together again Sherlock. Discourse 49.

DEED, in Law, a written contract signed, sealed, and delivered: the signing and sealing are requisite, to testify the consent of the parties; the delivery, to make it binding and perfect, since it takes effect from the day of delivery. Deeds can only be made by parties capable of contracting, and for good considerations; and the subject matter must be legally and lawfully set out. The formal parts of a Deed are: the premises containing the number, names, additions, and titles of the parties; the habendum, which determines the estate and interest intended to be granted by the Deed; the reddendum or reservation, whereby the grantor reserves to himself something out of the thing granted; a condition, which is a clause of contingency, on the happening of which the estate granted may be defeated; the warranty, whereby the grantor for himself and heirs warrants or secures to the grantee the estate so granted; the covenants, which are clauses of agreement contained in the Deed whereby the contracting parties stipulate for the truth of certain facts, or bind themselves to the performance of some specific acts; and the conclusion, which states the execution and date of the Deed, or the time of its being given or executed, either expressly or with reference to some day and year before mentioned. A Deed may be either an Indenture or Deed-poll: the former derives its name from being indented or cut in an uneven manner so as to tally with counterparts; the latter, or Deed-poll, of which there is one part only, is so called from its being polled or shaved even. A Deed is the most solemn act of law which a man can perform with respect to the disposition of his property, and therefore no person shall be permitted to aver or prove any thing against his own Deed. Every Deed must be founded upon good and sufficient consideration, not upon an usurious contract, nor upon fraud or collusion, either to deceive bond fide purchasers or just creditors; any of which considerations will vacate the Deed. A Deed must be written upon proper stamps, otherwise it cannot be given in evidence. The written matter of a Deed must be set forth in a Legal manner, so as that there are words sufficient to explain the meaning of the parties, and at the same time to bind them to the execution of their contract; and of this sufficiency, the Courts of Law are to determine. Another requisite is that it should be witnessed or attested; the attestation is, however, necessary rather for preserving the evidence than as intrinsically essential to the validity of the instrument. The following principles are adopted by Courts of Law for the exposition of Deeds: that they are beneficial to the person in whose favour they are intended to operate; that where the words used in the Deed may be employed to some intent, they shall not be void; that the words be construed according to the meaning of the parties, and not otherwise; that the intent of the parties shall be carried into effect, provided such intent can possibly stand in law: and that Deeds shall be expounded reasonably, without injury to the grantor and to the greatest advantage of the grantee.

DEED. — DEEP.

DEEM, v. / DEEM, n. / DEE'MING. A. S. dem-an, to think, to judge, to determine. See DOOM, and DAMN.

He tolde, þat in a uÿsÿon he sey bÿ hÿm a cas,
Þat he was byuore God ÿbrozt, hys dom vor to avonge,
And þat he was þere ÿdemd to þe pyne of helle strong.
R. Gloucester, p. 420.

Þe barons wrote ageÿn, at his demÿng þei ches,
Þei held his dome certeÿn, for he was prince of pes.
R. Brunne, p. 86.

And deme wel and wislÿche.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 194.

Nyle ye deme that ghe be not demed. For in what doom ye demen; you schulen be demed, and in what measure ye meten: it schal be meten agen to you.
Wiclif. Matthew, ch. vii.

DEE — DEE

Now demeth as you liste, ye that can,
For I wol tell you forth as I began.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1355.

But still Creseide heuy in her entent,
Into the church would nat herself present,
For giuing of the people any deming
Of her expulse fro Diomede the king.
Id. The Testament of Creseide, fol. 195.

But false Egyste aboue hem alle
Was deemed to diuers peine,
The werst that men couthe ordeine.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iii. fol. 56.

These thre estates ordayned and stablysshed in their names, receyuers of all male totes, deames, subsidies, and other rightes, pertayning to the kyng, and to the realme.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, ch. 171.

This hellish porter, deeming that Such musik would delight
His weeping mistris, did conuay
The harper to hir sight.
Warner. Albion's England, book i. ch. vi.

There was graunted vnto him halfe a deeme of the spiritualitie, and half a deeme of the temporaltie, to be payde at the feast of Saint Mighell then next, if it seemed to the lordes and counsaylours that it was neede.
Grafton. Richard II. The tenth Yere.

TROY. Here me, loue: be thou but true of heart.
CRES. I true? how now? what wicked deeme is this?
Shakespeare. Troylus and Cressida, fol. 96.

Nor could her wretched sister once divine
These rites could cover such a dire design,
Nor deem'd a lover treacherous to his vows
Should more afflict her than her murder'd spouse.
Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book iv.

I suppose it agreed by all who admit a future judgment, that misery and happiness are set before us upon some terms: I suppose, likewise, that it will be deemed reasonable for God to act upon such terms as reason itself, the interpreter of God's will in this case, proposes to us. Sherlock. Discourse 27.

DEEP.

DEEP, adj. / DEEP, n. / DEEP, adv. / DEE'PEN, / DE'EPLY, / DE'EPNESS, / DE'EPSOME, / DEPTH, / DE'PTHLESS. A. S. deope; Dutch, diep; Ger. tief; Swe. djup. From A. S. dipp-an, to dip, to dive. Depth is the third person singular. As now applied, deep is Far below the surface; sunk, depressed, immersed; met. not easily fathomed, not easily seen through or penetrated; profound.

Deep is much used in Composition, and supplies some words of strong import.

Þe þef, þat laÿ bÿneþ hÿm, þozte on luþer bote,
And smot þe kÿng wÿþ a knÿf in þe breste depe ynou,
And, to gret harm to al þÿs lond, þe gode kÿng he slou.
R. Gloucester, p. 277.

Now adde heÿe men of þe lond ÿtake þere bÿuore,
Hÿs fader ostage god ÿnou, and dep oþ ÿsuore,
Wÿþ hym to holde trewelyche, and breke þoluer oþ.
Id. p. 301.

He did Harald body do drawe vp also tite,
& þorȝh þe podels it drouh, that foule were & deppest,
& siþen in to Temse his body did he kest.
R. Brunne, p. 54.

Athelstan in Scotland a selcouth ded he one,
He smote depe al Donbarre, an elne in þe stone.
R. Brunne, p. 29.

A water in Snowdoun runnes, Amber is the name,
An arm of þe se men kennes, þe depnes may none ame [tell.]
Id. p. 240.

The dupe dale and durke. un sÿmely to see to,
What may hit by mene. madam ich by seche.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 15.

He is lyk to a man that bildith an hous that diggide depe and sette the foundement on a stoon. Wiclif. Luke, ch. vi.

Thries I was at schip breche, nyght and dai I was in the depnesse of the see. Id. 2 Corynthians, ch. xii.

Alone in woods, in rockes and in caues depe,
I may at mine owne wil both waile and wepe.
Chaucer. The Lamentation of Marie Magdaleine, fol. 320.

Then tooke I of the nightingale kepe,
How she cast a sigh out of her depe,
And saied, alas that euer I was bore.
Id. Of the Cuckow and the Nightingale, fol. 344.

And here I make mine protestacioun
And deepely sweare as mine power to bene
Faithful deuoid of variation
Chaucer. The Court of Loue, fol. 355.

Of the darke depenesse of hell been her gestes:
Beware yong man therefore I thee rede.
Id. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 324.

His tales with myn eares I herde,
But to myn herte came it nouht,
Ne sanke no deeper in my thought.
Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 39.

And whan the citee was a slepe,
A wilde fyre into the depe
Thei caste amonge the tymber werke.
Id. Ib. book v. fol. 96.

O Gods that empier keepes on ghostes, and soules of silens dumme,
Thou Chaos, and firy boyling pittes and places glumme:
Giue licens me to tell your secret workings vnder ground,
Giue pardon to disclose thinges deepe in mist. and darknes dround.
Phaer. Æneidos, book vi. p. 143.

Thy rightuousnese standeth lyke the stronge mountaynes, and thy judgements lyke the greate deepe.
Bible, Anno 1551. Psalm 36.

We gaue it [holy Sacrament] the same honour that we geue vnto the Holy Scripture and Word of God, becanse it expresseth vnto our senses the death of our Sauiour and doth more deepely print it within vs.
Frith. Workes, fol. 168. Conclusion of a Booke made by him.

In the meane waie there is a litle broke called Cocke not very broade, but of greate deapenes, in the whiche, what for haste of escapyng, and for feare of folowers, a great number were drent and drowned. Hall. Henry VI. The thirty-ninth Yere.

And as he cesside to speke he seyde to Symount, lede thou into the depthe, and slake youre nettis to take fish.
Wiclif. Luke, ch. v.

——————— Geometrie
Through which a man hath the sleight
Of length, of brede, or depth, of height.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 142.

Not rashe in uttering, but ware in considering every matter: and thereby, not quick in speaking, but deepe of judgement, whether they write or give counsell in all weightie affairs.
Ascham. The Schole Master, p. 208.

——————— Dark'n'd so yet shon
Above them all th' Arch-angel: but his face
Deep scars of thunder had intrenchi.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book i. l. 601

Happy the man, I grant, thrice happy, he,
Who can through gross effects their causes see:
Whose courage from the deeps of knowledge springs,
Nor vainly fears inevitable things.
Cowley. Essays. Virgil. Georgics, lib. ii. fol. 458.

——————— What can be worse
Then to dwell here, driv'n out from bliss, condemn'd
In this abhorred deep to utter woe.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book ii. l. 87.

I hear that you begin to blow the coal, and offer sacrifice to Demogorgan, the God of Minerals: Be well advis'd before you engage yourself too deep.
Howell. Letter 41. book i. sec. 6.

——————— The place
Was knee deep where she sate.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Two Noble Kinsmen, act iv. sc. 1.

He made forts and barricadoes, heightened the ditches, deepened the trenches. Stow. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1601.

She brought Sir Henry Montague from delivering law on the King's Bench, to look to his bags in the Exchequer, for she made him Lord High Treasurer of England; but he parted with his white staff before the year's end, though his purse had bled deeply for it. (above 20,000.)
Howell. Letter 1. book i. sec. 3.

By these remarkable steps, among others, did the merciful hand of God, in this short space of time, not only bind up and heal all those wounds, but even make the scars as undiscernable, as, in respect of the deepness, was possible; which was a glorious addition to the deliverance. DEEP.
Clarendon. History of the Civil Wars, vol. iii. part ii. p. 773.

This said; he [Proteus] diu'd the deepsome watrie heapes:
I, and my tried men, tooke vs to our ships.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book iv. fol. 62.

Through these his slights he many doth confound:
And eke the rocke, in which he wonts to dwell,
Is wondrous strong, and hewen far vnder ground
A dreadfull depth, how deep no man can tell.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book v. can. 9.

The preservation of his life, which was in the utmost hazard, by reason of the prejudices then reigning, obliged him to confine himself to the deepest privacy.
Ludlow. Memoirs. Preface.

Then toils for beasts, and lime for birds were found,
And deep-mouthed dogs did forest walks surround:
And casting nets were spread in shallow brooks,
Drags in the deep, and baits were hung on hooks.
Dryden. Virgil. Georgics, book i.

The water deepned and sholdned so very gently, that in heaving five or six times we could scarce have a foot difference.
Dampier. Voyage to New Holland, &c. Anno 1699.

O save me God, thy floods about me roll,
Thy wrath divine hath overflow'd my soul:
I come at length where rising waters drown,
And sink in deep affliction, deeply down.
Parnell. The Gift of Poetry.

The deepness of their soil, and wetness of seasons, which would render it unpassable, forces them, not only to exactness of paving in their streets, but to the expence of so long causeys between many of their towns, and in their highways.
Sir William Temple. On the United Provinces, ch. iv.

Achitophel had form'd it, with intent
To sound the depths, and fathom where it went,
The people's hearts, distinguish friend from foes,
And try their strength before they came to blows.
Dryden. Absalom and Achitophel, part i.

But now, admitted guests in heav'n, we rove
Free and familiar in the realms above:
The wonders hidden deep in earth below,
And nature's laws, before conceal'd we know.
Fawkes. An Eulogy on Sir I. Newton.

Ere yet the deepening incidents prevail,
Till rous'd attention feel our plaintive tale,
Record whom chief among the gallant crew,
Th' unblest pursuit of fortune hither drew.
Falconer. Shipwreck, can. 1.

We kept to the northward all night, at the distance of from four miles to four leagues from the shore, and with a depth of water from seventeen to thirty-four fathom.
Cook. First Voyage, book iii. ch. ii.

But Jove, in goodness ever wise,
Hath hid, in clouds of depthless night,
All that in future prospect lies,
Beyond the ken of mortal sight.
Francis. Horace. Ode 29. book iii.

DEEP, in Composition.

And then the sweete-voict nymphs that crown his mountains,
(Flockt round about, the deepe-black-watred fountains;)
Fall in with their contention of song. Chapman. To Pan.

Meane time I wish a good renowne, that these deepe-brested dames
Of Ilion and Dardania may, for th' extinguisht flames
Of their friends lives, with both their hands, wipe miserable teares
From their so curiously kept cheekes.
Id. Homer. Iliad, book xviii. fol. 256.

DEEP.

Ah! gentle knight, whose deepe-conceiued griefe
Well seemes t' exceed the powre of patience,
Yet if that heauenly grace some good reliefe
You send, submit you to high prouidence.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 14.

——— When I did heare
The motley foole, thus morall on the time,
My lungs began to crow like Chanticleere,
That fooles should be so deepe-contemplative.
Shakspeare. As You Like It.

This, I confess, it is to me a complication of riddles, (and therefore put some artists under that deep-dark-phrase, and title of fundamental laws of the kingdom) to which certainly no liberty or right of the subject in Magna Charta, no nor legislative power, will enable any man to give any intelligible, much less legal name.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 313.

The vault or charnell-house of rottenness, of all the impurity in the world, (the deep-digged Golgotha and Aceldama) under the fairest and most inviting inscriptions.
Id. Works. Sermon 6. vol. iv. p. 508.

Wouldst thou not spit at me, and spurn at me,
And hurle the name of husband in my face,
And tear the stain'd skin of my harlot brow,
And from my false hand cut the wedding ring,
And break it with a deep-diuorcing vow?
Shakspeare. Comedy of Errours, fol. 89.

To Tenedos they come,
And the deepe-drawing barke do there disgorge
Their warlike fruitage.
Id. Prologue to Troylus and Cressida.

So she deep-drenched in a sea of care,
Holds disputation with each thing she views,
And to herself all sorrow doth compare.
Id. The Rape of Lucrece.

——— Yf any leaches skill,
Or other learned meanes could haue redreast:
This my deare daughter's deepe-ingraffed ill
Certis I should be loth thee to molest.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii.

Me thinkes I should not thus be led along,
Mayl'd vp in shame, with papers on my back,
And follow'd with a rabble, that reioyce
To see my teares, and heare my deep-fet groanes.
Shakspeare. Henry IV. Second Part, fol. 129.

I had my conge; plant myself of one leg,
Draw back the other with a deep-fetched honour.
Chapman. All Fools, act ii. sc. 1.

Tush! what care I to be Arcesilas
Or some sad Solon, whose deep-furrowed face,
And sullen head, and yellow clouded sight,
Still on the steadfast earth are musing pight.
Hall. Satire 2. book ii.

God, heaven, this middle world, deep-glimmering hell
With all the lives and shapes that there remain,
The forms of all in humane souls do dwell.
More. On the Soul, part iii. can. 3. st. 23.

The deep-green emerald in whose fresh regard,
Weak sights their sickly radiance do amend.
Shakspeare. A Lover's Complaint.

But as she waxeth wide,
So Essex in her tides, her deep-grown marshes drowns,
And to enclosures cuts her drier upland grounds.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 23.

He sees his deep-laid projects turn'd into
Just engines of their masters overthrow.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 15. st. 55.

Amidst these sapphire far extending heights,
The never-twinkling, ever wandering lights
Their fixed motions keep; one dry and cold,
Deep-leaden colour'd, slowly there is roll'd.
Drummond. An Hymn on the Fairest Fair.

Go, and your deeply-earned places take
Amidst the ever-burning brimstone lake.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 24. st. 107.

Now if we consult that prayer said to be his [Manassah] (which was perhaps but the collection of some broken parts of it let down by tradition, and set together by some other) though reckoned among the Apocrypha, yet (as Junius says) is pious, and certainly expresseth the true sense of a deeply-humbled soul. DE
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. part i. fol. 486.

The hills and vallies here and there resound,
With the re-echoes of the deepe-mouth'd hound.
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, song 4. book i.

The deep-observing mother joyn'd to hear
Their humble orison; and what, said she,
My honest friends, has call'd you from your care
Thus to attend on this new piety;
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 6. st. 205.

And deep-pain'd nature, though but fresh and new,
In this sad moment crack'd and crazy grew.
Id. Ib. can. 6. st. 293.

Damon, the wounds deep-rankling in the minde
What herbs could ever cure? what art could finde?
P. Fletcher. Eclogue 5.

More furnished with strength of argument
From learned Athens never student came,
Who had his nimblest years and spirits spent
The engins of deep-reaching wit to frame.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 23. st. 25.

This Argive earth which ere while was full soft,
Now baked hard with fire, the blood deep-red,
Of Bacchus hides within.
Holland. Plutarch, fol. 588.

The deepe-reuoluing wittie Buckingham,
No more shall be the neighbor of my counsailes,
Hath he so long held out with me, vntry'd,
And stops he now for breath?
Shakspeare. Richard III. fol. 194.

See'st thou that rueful place, that garden where Eternal barrenness deep-rooted grows.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 9. st. 191.

SHAPE. Take heed,
He's nois'd about for a deep-searching head,
I'll pawn my life 'tis a trick.
Cartwright. The Ordinary, act ii. sc. 3.

Sir Walter Rawleigh hath showen himself as deep-sighted, and apprehensive to spy out the stories and imperfect narrations of times, what the face or scheme of things in any age was, as any historian whatever that hath undertaken to set forth matters of that nature. Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. part iv. fol. 366.

Thy mermaid's voice hath done me double wrong,
I had my load before, now press'd with bearing:
Melodious discord, heavenly tune harsh-sounding,
Earth's deep-sweet music, and heart's deep-sore wounding.
Shakspeare. Venus and Adonis.

Thou canst be therefore, none else but the man
Of many virtues: Ithacensian,
Deepe-soul'd Vlysses.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book x. fol. 154.

W. SMALL-SH. How, marry him! 'foot, art mad, widow?
Wo'ot marry an old crazed man,
With chap-fallen gums, and deep-sunk eyes?
Barry. Ram Alley; or Merry Tricks, act iv. sc. 4.

Then being ask'd where all thy beauty lies,
Where all the treasure of thy lusty days;
To say within thine own deep-sunken eyes,
Were an all-eating shame and thriftless praise.
Shakspeare. Sonnet 2.

The latest breath that gaue the sound of words
Was deepe-sworne faith, peace, amity, true loue,
Betweene our kingdoms and our royall selues.
Id. King John, fol. 10.

——— Had cautious fear not prest
For some demur, and to his party won
Deep-thinking jealousy.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. iv. st. 177.

——————Immediate in a flame
But soon obscur'd with smoak, all heav'n appear'd,
From those deep-throated engins belcht.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book vi. l. 586.

Unanimous they all commit the care
And management of this main enterprize
To him their great dictator, whose attempt
At first against mankind so well had thriv'd
In Adam's overthrow, and led their march
From hell's deep-vaulted den to dwell in light.
Id. Paradise Regained, book i. l. 116.

Now where the aged oak his green arms spreads,
He lies, now in the flow'ry meads:
Whilst through their deep-worn banks the murmuring floods,
Do glide, and birds do chant in the woods.
Cotton. Horace. His second Epode.

The varlet at his plaint was grieu'd so sore,
That his deepe-wounded heart in two did riue,
And his own health remembring now no more
Did follow that ensample which he blam'd afore.
Spenser. Facrie Queene, book vi. can. 6.

She, silly queen, with more than Love's good will Forbade the boy, he should not pass those grounds;
"Once," quoth she, "did I see a fair sweet youth
Here in these brakes deep-wounded with a boar."
Shakspeare. Passionate Pilgrim.

For never spy'd they any one, but in
His self-betraying countenance they saw
The odious characters of deep-writ sin.
Beaumont. Psyche, can. 9. st. 121.

Or should the deep-brew'd tempest muttering rise,
While rocks and shoals perfidious lurk around,
With Tully she her wide reviving light
To senates holds, a Catiline confounds,
And saves awhile from Cæsar sinking Rome.
Thomson. Liberty, part v.

Sudden the sword tempestuous cleaves in twain
His cheeks, and sinks deep-bury'd in the brain.
Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book ix.

Hence, in old dusky time, a deluge came:
When the deep-cleft disparting orb, that arch'd
The central waters round, impetuous rush'd,
With universal burst, into the gulph.
Thomson. Seasons. Spring.

The Belgians hop'd that, with disordered haste,
Our deep-cut keels upon the sands might run:
Or, if with caution leisurely were past,
Their numerous gross might charge us one by one.
Dryden. Annus Mirabilis, st. 182.

——————The penetrative sun
His force deep-darting to the dark retreat
Of vegetation, sets the steaming power
At large, to wander o'er the vernant earth,
In various hues. Thomson. Seasons. Spring.

——————The furry millions there,
Deep-dig their dens beneath the sheltering snows.
Id. Liberty, part iii.

Sometimes she bids the deep-embattled host,
Above the vulgar reach, resistless form'd,
March to sure conquest—never gain'd before!
Id. Ib. part v.

Such small, such contemptible, and almost unobservable hints, have sometimes unravell'd and thrown open the mysterious contexture of the deepest-laid villanies.
South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 163.

Ombus and Tentyr neighb'ring towns, of late
Broke into outrage of deep-fester'd hate.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 15.

A field deep-furrow'd next, the God design'd,
The third time labour'd by the sweating hind.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, book xviii.

'Twas thus th' armipotent advis'd the Gods,
When from his throne the cloud-compeller nods,
Deep-lengthening thunders run from pole to pole,
Olympus trembles as the thunders roll.
Parnell. The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Now, while I task the sweetness of the shade,
While Nature lies around deep-lull'd in noon;
Now come bold Fancy, spread a daring flight,
And view the wonders of the torrid zone.
Thomson. Seasons. Summer.

As when a ship-wright stands his workmen o'er,
Who ply the wimble, some huge beam to bore;
Urg'd on all hands, it nimbly spins about,
The grain deep-piercing till it scoops it out.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book ix.

——————You, gallant Vernon, saw
The miserable scene; you, pitying, saw
To infant weakness sunk the warrior's arm;
Saw the deep-racking pang, the ghastly form,
The lip pale-quivering, and the beamless eye
No more with ardour bright.
Thomson. Seasons. Summer.

Full in the root, Æneas drove his spear:
The dart, deep-riveted, stood trembling there.
Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book xii.

He, when deep-rolling clouds blot out the day,
And thunderous storms a solemn gloom display,
Pours down a watery deluge from on high,
And opens all the sluices of the sky.
Broome. The forty-third Chapter of Ecclesiasticus.

——————Nor shuns the lance of Crete,
Fixt as some column, or deep-rooted oak,
(While the winds sleep) his breast receiv'd the stroke.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, book xiii.

——————Deep-rous'd, I feel, methinks,
A sacred terrour, a severe delight,
Creep through my mortal frame.
Thomson. Seasons. Summer.

Deep-sighted in intelligences,
Ideas, atoms, influences.
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 1.

Milkah for wiles above her peers renown'd,
Deep-skill'd in charms and many a mystic sound.
Tickell. Kensington Garden.

Where angel forms athwart the solemn dusk
Tremendous sweep, or seem to sweep along.
And voices more than human, through the void
Deep-sounding, seize th' enthusiastic ear.
Thomson. Seasons. Autumn.

——————At once he darts along
Deep-struck, and runs out all the lengthen'd line:
Then seeks the farthest ooze, the sheltering weed,
The cavern'd bank, his old secure abode. Id. Spring.

——————Every copse
Deep-tangled, tree irregular, and bush
Bending with dewy moisture, o'er the heads
Of the coy quiristers that lodge within,
Are prodigal of harmony. Id. Ib.

Dun shades, in rocky shapes up ether roll'd,
Project long, shaggy points, deep-tinged with gold.
Savage. The Wanderer, can. 5.

——————O'er th' extended vales,
The wood-girt lawns I ran, nor slack'd my pace,
Till at my flock thick-panting I arriv'd,
And drove far off, beneath a deep-arch'd cave.
Warton. Eclogue 4.

——————In the rear they stood
Behind two thousand Locrians, deep-array'd
By warlike Medon, from Oileus sprung.
Glover. Leonidas, book vii.

Beyond the shadow of these mountains green,
Deep-bosom'd in the vale, a cottage stands,
The dwelling of my sire, a peaceful swain.
Logan. The Episode of Levina.

Down prest by wat'ry weight the bowsprit bends,
And from above the stern deep-crashing rends.
Falconer. Shipwreck, can. 3.

Awaken'd by the clamour of my friends
Newly arisen, he also sprang to rise,
And, in his haste, forgetful where to find
The deep-descending stairs, plung'd through the roof.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book x.

DEEP.

Nor fateful only is the bursting flame:
The exhalations of the deep-dug mine,
Though slow; shake from their wings as sure a death.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book iv.

My form was pleasing; health refin'd
My blood, a deep-discerning mind
Crown'd all the rest.
Harte. Thomas a Kempis.

——— Near at hand the wide
Majestic wave of Severn slowly rolls
Along the deep-divided glebe.
Dyer. The Fleece, book ii.

——— A dreadful pause ensues:
Deceitful calm, portending fiercer storm.
Sad night at once, with all her deep-dy'd shades,
Falls black and boundless o'er the scene.
Mallet. The Excursion, can. 1.

So saying, from battle she conducted forth
The stormy Mars to a sequester'd seat,
Where deep-embanked Scamander roll'd below.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book v.

——— That soft tract
Of Cambria, deep-embay'd Dimetian land,
By green hills fenc'd, by ocean's murmur lull'd.
Dyer. The Fleece, book iii.

——— The deep-enamour'd youth
Stood gazing on her charms, and all his soul
Was lost in love.
Logan. The Episode of Levina.

Yet they did assert it: and far from being disproved in it, thousands at once, notwithstanding the most powerful worldly motives, and the deepest-rooted prejudices, to the contrary, were convinced by them. Secker. Lecture 10.

——— But rather now unfold
By what mysterious fabric of the mind,
The deep-felt joys and harmony of sound
Result from airy motion.
Akenside. The Pleasures of Imagination, book iii.

High on the topmost eminence sublime
Of the deep-fork'd Olympian she perceiv'd
The thund'rer seated, from the Gods apart.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book i.

——— His lov'd associates, Echius' son,
Mecisteus, with Alastor, rais'd and bore
The maim'd deep-groaning warrior to his fleet.
Id. Ib. book viii.

Let sun and rain mature thy deep-hoed land,
And old fat dung cooperate with these.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book i.

While all the comforts that on life attend,
The cheerful converse, and the faithful friend,
By thought deep-imag'd in her bosom play,
Endearing life, and charm despair away.
Broome. The Love of Medea and Jason.

——— Then grave arose
The hero, old Ægyptius; bow'd with age
Was he, and by experience deep-inform'd.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book ii.

What, when to raise the meditated scene,
The flame of passion through the struggling soul
Deep-kindled, shows across that sudden blaze
The object of its rapture, vast of size,
With fiercer colours and a night of shade?
Akenside. The Pleasures of Imagination, book ii.

Whose latrant stomachs oft molest
The deep laid plans their dreams suggest.
Green. The Spleen.

The bear may leap, its lumpish cubs in view,
Or sportive cat her circling tale pursue,
The grin deep-lengthen pug's half-human face,
Or prick'd-up ear confess the simp'ring ass.
Whitehead. On Ridicule.

Yet not vext Ætna's pillar'd flames that strike
The stars! nor molten mountains hurl'd on high;
Nor pond'rous rapid deluges, that burn
Its deeply-channel'd sides: cause such dismay,
Such desolation, Hurricane! as thou.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book ii.

——— See the silver maze
Of stately Thamis, ever checquer'd o'er
With deeply-laden barges, gliding smooth
And constant as his stream.
Dyer. The Fleece, book iv.

——— ——— Eternal sire!
Shall I displease thee, should I punish Mars,
And chase him deeply-wounded from the field.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book v.

And hark! from rock to rock the sound
Of winding horn, and deep-mouth'd hound,
Breaking with rapture on the ear,
Proclaims the blithesome Phœbe near.
Lloyd. Arcadia.

So saying, he plung'd into the billowy waste.
I then, with my brave comrades, to the fleet
Return'd, deep-musing as I went, and sad.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book iv.

——— A less pleasing theme,
What ills await the ripening cane, demands
My serious numbers; these the thoughtful Muse
Hath oft beheld, deep-pierc'd with generous woe.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book ii.

——— Their heads deep-plunging oft
Our galleys flew, and rent, and rent again,
Our tatter'd sail-cloth crackled in the wind.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book ix.

Pour into their cloven feet
Corrosive drugs, deep-searching arsenic,
Dry alum, verdigrise, or vitriol keen.
Dyer. The Fleece, book i.

Awe-quell'd he sat, and from his visage mean,
Deep-sighing wip'd the rheums.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book ii.

Borne on a corded raft, and suff'ring wo
Extreme, he on the twentieth day shall reach,
Not sooner, Scherie the deep-soil'd, possess'd
By the Phæacians, kinsmen of the Gods.
Id. Odyssey, book v.

Happy the first of men, ere yet confin'd
To smoky cities; who in sheltering groves,
Warm caves, and deep-sunk vallies liv'd and lov'd,
By cares unwounded.
Warton. The Enthusiast.

Fatal to Priam's ancient sway
You bear th' ill-omen'd fair away:
For soon shall Greece in arms arise,
Deep-sworn to break thy nuptial ties.
Francis. Horace. Ode 15. book i.

Had I been witholden by the awe of these partial examiners and hasty judges from concluding my last book in the manner I did, I could not have made it so apparent as I think it must be to every one who considers the arguments urged there, of how necessary importance religion is, not only for keeping the vulgar and the giddy in order; but likewise for the refined and deep-thinking. Search. Light of Nature, part xiii. ch. xxxi.

The excellence of colouring does not proceed from fine colours, but true colours; from breaking down these fine colours which would appear too raw, to a deep-ton'd brightness.
Sir Joshua Reynolds. The Art of Painting, note 37.

See the detestful owl, ill-omen'd, rise!
Dragg'd, by despair, from her sequestr'd cell;
And, by the discord of shrill shrieking cries,
Doubling the horrours of the deep-ton'd hell.
Cunningham. An Elegiac Ode.

O for the warblings of the Doric ote,
That wept the youth deep-whelm'd in ocean's tide.
Warton. On the Death of Frederick Prince of Wales.

DEER. — FACE.

DEER, DEER-SKIN, DEER-STEALER. A. S. deor; Dutch, dier; Ger. thier; Swed. djur. Somner says, "Deor; wild deer, wild beasts of all kind;" and the Etymologists derive it from the Greek θήρ, bestia.

And þe parc of Wodestoke, & der þer inne do.
R. Gloucester, p. 439.

þe kyng no man suld deme in courte for wilde dere.
R. Brunne, p. 110.

He shewed him, or they went to soupere,
Forestes, parkes ful of wilde dere.
Chaucer. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11502.

White foxes and dere-skinnes are brought thither by the men of Penninge. Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. John Hasse.

First, for his weeping into the needlesse streame;
Poore deere, quoth he, thou mak'st a testament
As worldlings doe, giuing thy sum of more
To that which had too much.
Shakspeare. As You Like It, fol. 190.

Here the brakishness of the water, and the grossenesse of the ayre, is recompensed by the goodness of the earth, abounding with deries and pasture.
Fuller. Worthies. Lincolne-shire.

Whom [Python] Phœbus basking on a bank espy'd,
Ere now the God his arrows had not try'd,
But on the trembling deer, or mountain-goat;
At this new quarry he prepares to shoot.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book i.

The first tryal of skill he ever performed was with one Cacus, a dear-stealer; the next was with Typhonus, a giant of 40 foot 4 inches. Tatler, No. 31.

To freeze beneath the midnight air,
The huntsmen leaves the sighing fair,
Pleas'd if his hounds the deer pursue,
Or hold th' entangled boar in view.
Boyse. Horace. Ode 1. book i.

She stood awhile to gaze upon the departing vessel, and then returning to her hut, silent and dejected, laid aside, from that hour, her white deer-skin, suffered her hair to spread unbraided on her shoulders, and forbore to mix in the dances of the maidens.
Johnson. Rambler, No. 187.

DEFA'CE, v. DEFA'CER, DEFA'CEMENT, DEFA'CING. Cotgrave says, Desfacer, as effacer. And effacer; "to efface, race, blot, rub out, wipe away." And Minsheu, quasi pristinam faciem auferre, seu formam delere. It. sfaeciare. And Skinner, pristinam faciem eruere.

To take away "all the feture of the face," (Gower;) to disfigure, to deform; to destroy the face, form or figure; and, generally, to destroy.

It was conserued with the shade,
All the writing that I sie,
Of a castell that stoode on hie
And stode eke in so cold a place
That heat might it not deface.
Chaucer. The third Booke of Fame, fol. 280.

And all the feture of thy face
In suche a wise I shall deface,
That euery man the shall forbeare.
Gower. Conf. Am. book v. fol. 118.

For as the Apostles in the primitive age first planted the church in trueth of the Gospel: so the same trueth beyng agayne defaced and decayed by enemies in thys our latter tyme, there was none that trauayled more ernestly in restoring of the same in this realme of England, than did William Tyndall.
Tyndall. Works. Foxe. Epistle to the Reader.

The which defacynge & blottyng of the beutye of that countrey, sometyme called the quene of y^e^ earth, and floure of the worlde, chaunced not of her awne selfe or her awne cause or desert, but that Italians her awne suckyng chyldren opened the gappe, and made the waye of her destruccion.
Hall. Henry VII. The seventh Yere.

DEFACE. — DEFAIL.

Whensoeuer a man of a relenting spirit casteth his eie, he can not but enter into a dolefull consideration of former miseries, and lamenting the defacements of this isle by the crueltie of the bloudthirstie enemie, cannot but wish and earnestlie desire in his heart that the like may neuer light vpon this land.
Holinshed. England, book vii. ch. xv.

You may haue heard, that his grace was enforced to flye out of Britaine into France, for doubts of being betrayed; his grace would not in any sort haue that reflect vpon Duke of Britaine, in defacement of his former benefits.
Bacon. Henry VII. fol. 55.

HIP. 'Twere pity
The ruins of so fair a monument
Should not be dipt in the defacer's blood.
Tourneur. The Revenger's Tragedy, act i. sc. 1.

They tende to the disturbing of the quiet state of the church, the discrediting and defacing of such as be in authoritie, and maintaining of licentiousness and lewd libertie.
Whitgift. Defence, fol. 31.

Better a thousand such as I,
Their grief untold, should pine and die
Than her bright morning, overcast
With sullen clouds, should be defac'd.
Waller. On Sylvia.

The will of God, saith St. Paul, is our sanctification; what is that? what, but that the decales of our frame, and the defacements of God's image within us should be repaired; that the faculties of our soul should be restored to their original integrity and vigour. Barrow. Sermon 4. vol. iii.

With these honourable qualifications, and the decisive advantage of situation,—low craft and falsehood are all the abilities that are wanting to destroy the wisdom of ages, and to deface the noblest monument that human policy has erected—I know such a man. Junius. Letter 57.

Yet in all these straits, we see him [the Pope] display, amidst the recent ruins and the new defacements of his plundered capital, along with the mild and decorated piety of the modern, all the spirit and magnanimity of ancient Rome.
Burke. On a Regicide Peace.

DEFAI'L, v. DEFAI'LANCE. "Fr. defaillance; a failing, languor, faintness; defect, want, lack, defection." Cotgrave. From the Fr. defaillir, to fail; from Lat. de, and fallere. Skinner.

Which to withstand I boldly enter thus,
And will defail, or else prove recreant.
Machin. The Dumb Knight, act i. sc. 1.

Yet this gift of God even in those times, when they were dispensed with miracle, and assistances extraordinary, were given as all things now are given, by the means also of our endeavour, and was capable of improvement by industry, and of defailance by neglect, and therefore much rather is it so now in the days of ordinary ministration and common assistances.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 7. An Apologie for set forms of Liturgie.

It was necessary that the covenant of works should begin, for the covenant of faith and repentance could not be at first; there was no need of it, no opportunity for it, it must suppose a defailance, or an infirmity, as physick supposes sickness and mortality. Id. Ib. On Repentance.

Were there times by law or custom defined, (as in some places indeed there are,) when all men should be required in person solemnly to attend on their Prince, for professing their allegiance, or deferring any homage to him; would not those who should wilfully refuse or decline appearance, be justly chargeable as guilty of dishonouring and wronging him? would not their such defailance pass for sufficient proof, that they do not acknowledge him, that at least they do not much regard or value him?
Barrow. Sermon 7. vol. i.

There are no cares to disturb, nor fears to allay, nor sorrows to abate those ravishments of delight for ever; there is joy which far surpasseth the half sad and mixed pleasures of this world, being nothing else but pure delight, which pleaseth by its own excellence, and by having nor fears nor possibility of defailance in degree or continuance.
Comber. Companion to the Temple, part ii. sec. 4.

DE-FAITED. — DEFAME.

DEFAITED. Mr. Tyrwhitt says, Wasted. It is Fr. desfait or desfaict; defeated, undone; decayed in feature and colour.

He so defaite was, that no maner man
Unneth he might knowen there he went
So was he leane, and thereto pale and wan
And feble.
Chaucer. The fifth Booke of Troilus, fol. 191.

And of himselfe imagined he oft
To ben defaited, pale and woxen lesse
Than he was wont. Id. Ib. fol. 188.

DEFA'LK, DEFA'LCATE, DEFALCA'TION. Fr. deffalquer; It. defalcare; subtrahere, q. d. Lat. defalcare, i. e. falce resecare, et quasi amputare; to cut off as with a falchion.

To cut off, prune or lop off, take away part of, to diminish, to withdraw, to deduce, to subtract.

Although philosophers applie magnificence to the substaunce and astate of princis, and to priuate persones beneficence and liberalitie; yet ben nat these in anie parte defalcate of their cõdigne praises. Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book ii. ch. x.

And thereupon, Dec. 31, 1622, the lord treasurer did agree with them, that they should be allowed £9500. to be defalked in 9¼ years out of their rent after the rate of £1000. per ann.
State Trials. Proceedings on the Impeachment of the Lord Treasurer Middlesex.

But how infinitely temerarious is it for vile wretches either to invert or defalcate, and as it were to decimate the laws of the great God, by the which they and all their actions, must be judged at the last day?
Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 211.

Upon this the old gentleman, being pleased, it seems, with their desire of improving themselves, has granted them the continuance both of the Spectator and their bread and butter; having given particular orders, that the tea table shall be set forth every morning with its customary bill of fare, and without any manner of defalcation. Spectator, No 488.

One would have thought the natural method in a plan of reformation would be, to take the present existing estimates as they stand; and then to shew what may be practicably and safely defalcated from them.
Burke. On a late State of the Nation.

Nay, it is assured, that a reversionary grant of the office of laureat has in this instance been added to the treasurership, yet with the defalcation of the annual butt of sack, which the lord steward calculates will be a great saving to the nation.
Mason. Ode to Sir Fletcher Norton. Note.

DEFA'ME, v. DEFA'ME, n. DEFAMA'TION, DEFA'MATORY, DEFA'MER, DEFA'MING. Fr. diffamer; Sp. desfamar; It. diffamare; Lat. diffamare; Gr. δυσ-φημ-εῖν, to speak ill; (from δὺς, ill, and φήμ-ι, I say.)

To speak ill of, to speak against the fame, reputation or character; to speak to the discredit, disgrace or dishonour of any one; to calumniate.

Defame, the noun, is used by Chaucer and others as we now use infamy.

þe date a þousand was, þre hundred mo bi þre, þe kyng did grete trespas, diffamed þe pape's se.
R. Brunne, p. 321.

Blesse ye men that cursen you, preye ye for men that defamen you. Wiclif. Luk, ch. vi.

And me were leauer die than her diffame.
Chaucer. The fourthe Booke of Troilus, fol. 179.

It is a sinne and eke a gret folie
To apeiren any man, or him defame,
And eke to bringen wives in swiche a name.
Id. The Milleres Prologue, v. 3149.

And to thise cherles two he gan to preye
To slen him, and to girden of his hed,
That to his body, whan that he were ded,
Were no despit ydon for his defame.
Id. The Monkes Tale, v. 14467.

Suspicious was the diffame of this man,
Suspect his face, suspect his word also,
Suspect the time in which he this began.
Chaucer. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8394.

Wilom ther was dwelling in my contree
An archedeken, a man of high degree,
That boldely did execution
In punishing of fornication,
Of defamation, &c.
Id. The Freres Prologue, v. 6888.

And better it shall: for of thy dede
The worlde shall euer singe and rede,
In remembrance of thy defame.
Gower. Conf. Am. book v. fol. 116.

O euil tonges, which clap at eu'ry winde
Ye slea the quick, and eke the dead defame,
Those that liue well, some faut in them ye fynde;
Ye take no thought in slaundering their good name.
Vncertaine Auctors. Against Wicked Tongues.

And if we do, or suffre to be done to the cõtrary, by any maner of way, the which God forbede, we wyll than, yᵗ we be reputed for false and forsworne, and to ryn into suche blame and diffame as a kinge sacred ought to do in suche case.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, ch. 242.

Lastly, the end of it must be either to the diffamation of the queen's majesty, or stirring up of insurrection, sedition, and rebellion; for the former I trust, that the whole course of our behaviour, both in our ministry and conversation, declareth itself to be so far from seeking to defame her highness, as it tendeth, to the uttermost of our powers, to the advancement of her honour.
State Trials. Trial of John Udall.

I meane curyous, fantasticall parsons, pryuye dyffamours of dylygent and vertuous laboure.
Nicoll. Thucydides. Preface, fol. 3.

But on the tother syde now, if he saye not true, but that in the diffaming & slaunderyng of the spiritualitie, hys sentence ended not there, but wēt there much farther furth, & so farre furth also, as amoũted vnto as much as I say yᵗ he sayd, and vnto much more too: then will euery man beare me record, yᵗ I misse-report not him, but he me.
Sir Thomas More. Workes. The Debellacion of Salem and Byzance, fol. 1008.

But shee herselfe did thinke it done for spight,
And touched was with secret wrath and shame
Therewith, as thing deuiz'd her to defame.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iv. can. 5.

Therewith he mured vp his mouth along
And therein shut up his blasphemous tong,
For neuer more defaming gentle knight,
Or any louely lady dooing wrong.
Id. Ib. book vi. can. 12.

They that went about to excuse the defame of this slight, reported how he feared that he should have beene betraied to the English by his host, for hatred which they had conceiued against him for manie of his offences.
Holinshed. Scotland. Queen Marie, Anno 1544.

Their ayme is onely men's defamation, not their reformation: since they proclaime men's vices unto others, not lay them open to themselves.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act iii. sc. 6.

When C. Calvus after certaine libels and defamatorie epigrams against him, dealt by the mediation of friends for a reconciliation, he of his owne accord wrote first unto him.
Holland. Suetonius. Caius Julius Cæsar Dictator.

And where my lord advocate doth urge against the pannel defaming of the noblemen, it is answered by the pannel, that the first author must be the defamer and not the revealer.
State Trials. The Trial of James Lord Uchiltrie.

They held no torture then so great as shame,
And that to slay was less than to defame.
Butler. On the Weakness and Misery of Man.

Many virulent writers, (whether set on to it, or officiously studying to merit by it, did not appear,) threw out, in many defamatory libels, a great deal of their malice against the Duke of DEFEASANCE.

DEFE'ASANCE, } Fr. desfaire, to undo. (See DEFE'ASIBLE. } DEFEAT.) And thus,—to annul, to abrogate, to avoid or make void.

Spenser uses Defeasance as defeat.

But who shall look into my compting-house shall find many [debts] of £100., £200. or £300. whereof all is discharged, except some of £50. and some £40. and such like, without any defeasance, and lie only in my credit.

State Trials. Proceedings against Abington and others.

The whiles that hoarie king, with all his traine,
Being arriued, where that champion stout
After his foes defeasance did remaine
Him goodly greets.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 12.

He made Egerton to acknowledge a recognizance of 10,000 marks, with a defeasance, that if my lord chancellor did decree it for him, 6000 marks was to be distributed among those honourable persons that did solicit it for him.

State Trials. Proceedings against Lord Bacon.

PUFF. How? I tell thee, Justice Tutchin, not all
Thy bailiffs, sergeants, busy constables,
Defeasants, warrants, or thy mittimusses,
Shall save his throat from cutting, if he presume
To woo the widow eclipped Taffata;
She is my wife by oath.

Barry. Merry Tricks, act iii. sc. 1.

If the king be seised of land by a defesible title, and dieth seised, this descent shall toll the entry of him that right hath, as it appeareth by 9 E. IV. 51.

State Trials. The Case of the Postnati.

DEFEAZANCE, in Law, is of two sorts: 1. a collateral Deed made at the same time with a feoffment or other conveyance, containing certain conditions, upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated. In this manner Mortgages were formerly made, the Mortgager enfeoffed the Mortgagee, and at the same time executed a Deed of Defeazance, whereby the feoffment was rendered void on repayment of the money borrowed on a certain day. This, when executed at the same time with the original feoffment, was by the ancient law considered a part of it, and therefore only indulged; no subsequent secret revocation of a solemn conveyance executed by livery of seisin, being allowed in those days of simplicity and truth, though when uses were afterwards introduced, a revocation of such uses was permitted by Courts of Equity; but things that were merely executory or to be completed by matter subsequent, (as rents of which no seisin could be had till the time of payment, and also annuities, conditions, warranties, and the like,) were always liable to be recalled by Defeazance made subsequent to the time of their creation. Co. Litt. 236, 237. 2. A Defeazance on a Bond, Recognisance or Judgment recovered, is a condition which, when performed, defeats it in the same manner as the foregoing Defeazance of an estate; it differs only from the common condition of a Bond, in that the one is always inserted in the Deed or Bond itself, the other is made between the same parties by a separate, and frequently by a subsequent Deed. This, like the condition of a Bond, when performed, disincumbers the estate of the Obliger. To make a good Defeazance, it must be by Deed, for there cannot be a Defeazance of a Deed without a Deed; and a writing under hand doth not imply it to be a Deed; it must state the material parts of the Deed it relates to; it must be made between the same persons who were parties to the first Deed, and at the same time with or after it.

DEFE'AT, v. } It. disfare; "Fr. desfaire; to undo, break; defeat, discomfit, overcome, ruin, destroy, overthrow." Cotgrave. De, and feat, past participle of faire; Lat. facere, to do, to make.

DEFE'AT, n. }
DEFE'ATURE. }

And of himselfe imagined he oft
To ben defaited, pale and woxen lesse
Than he was wont.

Chaucer. The fifth Booke of Troilus, fol. 188.

The kynge and the Duke of Burgoyne, were so charged and busyed in that behalfe, that the iourney into Lombardy was defeated. Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, ch. 290.

He therefore what by deceitful fraude, flaterye and fayer false promises, gote the fauour of y^e^ Romans to defeat his brother's sone of the kingdom. Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. xi.

Where our Indians flayed off the skinne of his head, cut off both his armes in the high way, reseruing his haire for the triumph, which their king hoped to make for the defeat of his enemy. Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. M. Rene Laudonnier, vol. iii. fol. 340.

——— Fool, not to think how vain
Against th' Omnipotent to rise in arms;
Who out of smallest things could without end
Have rais'd incessant armies to defeat
Thy folly. Milton. Paradise Lost, book vi. l. 138.

He all their ammunition
And feats of war defeats
With plain heroic magnitude of mind
And celestial vigour arm'd.

Id. Samson Agonistes, l. 1278.

Too well I see and rue the dire event
That with sad overthrow and foul defeat
Hath lost us heav'n.

Id. Paradise Lost, book i. l. 135.

The day before the night of my defeature,
He greets me with a casket richly wrought;
So rare, that art did seem to strive with nature,
T' express the cunning workman's curious thought.

Daniel. The Complaint of Rosamond.

And therefore hath she brib'd the destinies,
To cross the curious workmanship of nature,
To mingle beauty with infirmities,
And pure perfection with impure defeature.

Shakspeare. Venus and Adonis.

The flame spreading farre abroad declared the diffeature of the Samnites more evidently, and staied them there for going farther. Holland. Livius, fol. 384.

Yea, Almighty God himself often complains, how in a manner his designs were defeated, his desires thwarted, his offers refused, his counsels rejected, his expectations deceived.

Barrow. Sermon 1. vol. i.

If, on this one defeat, our hopes are o'er;
If all our future prospects are no more;
Gods! let us raise these coward hands, to gain
Peace, pardon, life; and court the victor's chain.

Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book ii.

But if this be sufficient to convict the adventure of imposture, the best attested facts of antiquity will be in danger; such, for instance, as the defeat of Julian's impious purpose to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem; to the true circumstances of which defeat, the relators of it have added many very fabulous and absurd.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book ii. Notes.

DEFE'CATE, v. }
DEFE'CATE, adj. }
DEFECA'TION. }

Fr. defequer; to fine, purge, cleanse, purify. Lat. defecare, to free from the fæces, lees, dregs, any filthy excrescence; to purify.

And sith ye are all seven deficate
Participant of diuine sapience,
This great iniury done to our hie estate
Me think with pain we shuld make recõpence.

Chaucer. The Testament of Creseide, fol. 196.

If the corne be good, the water holesome and clene, and the ale or biere welle and perfytelye brewed and clensed, and by the space of syx dayes or more, settled and defecate it must needs be a necessary & conuenient drynk, as well in syknes as in helth.

Sir Thomas Elyot. Castel of Helth, book ii. p. 34.

They were neuer yet in any age, or countrie, that I can heare, or reade of; so regulated, or reformed by lawes, or otherwise; as to be thoroughly defæcated, and purged from their filthinesse, or reduced to such honest, commendable, profitable, necessary, or Christian ends, as might justly plead in their defence.

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act ii.

Thus are we involved in inextricable perplexities about the divine nature, and attributes; and in our reasonings about those sublimities are puzled with contradictions, which are but toyings of our phancies, no absurdities to our more defæcate faculties.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xi.

He was afterwards an hungry, (said the Evangelist,) and his abstinence from meat might be a defecation of his faculties, and an opportunity of prayer, but we are not sure it intended any thing else. Taylor. The Great Exemplar, part i. sec. 9.

Till the soul be defecate from the dregs of sense, and refined to an angelic temper, it can "never taste how good the Lord is," and will not forsake sensual enjoyments.

Bates. On Spiritual Perfection, ch. i.

The Cocceians [the followers of Hutchinson] have sublimed the crude nonsense of the Cabalists, so long buried in the dull amusement of picking mysteries out of letters, into a more spiritual kind of folly; a quintessence well defecated from all the impurities of sense and meaning.

Warburton. Divine Legation, book v. sec. 1.

DEFE'CT, v.
DEFE'CT, n.
DEFE'CT, adj.
DEFE'CTIBLE,
DEFECTIBI'LITY,
DEFE'CTION,
DEFE'CTIVE,
DEFE'CTIVELY,
DEFE'CTIVENESS,
DEFE'CTUOUS,
DEFECTUO'SITY.

Lat. deficere, defectum, to undo; (de, and facere, to do.) A defect, any thing undone, sc. which ought to be done; and therefore wanting. Defect, the verb, is used by some of our old writers.

To be wanting, to fail, to fall off, to fall short, to be insufficient, to be inadequate.

For (qd. she) thou must nedes know, that good folke ben alwaie stronge & mighty, and the shrewes ben feeble and defect, & naked of all strengthes.

Chaucer. The fourth Booke of Boecius, fol. 230.

If they had let the action fall at the height thereof in respect of those defects, which were such especially for the seruice at land, as would haue made a mighty subiect stoope vnder thē, I do not see how any man could iustly haue layd any reproch vpon him who commanded the same.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. vol. ii. part ii. fol. 136. The Portugal Voiage.

The ciuill magistrates now fall frō good and decline away most farre & do cōpell others to the same defection & rebellion.

Calvine. Foure Godlye Sermons, serm. 4.

Marke this hardely, for suche a defection from Christ as Saint Paul speketh of, and of the strong delusyon y^t^ they shuld haue which beleued lyes, y^t^ they mighte be dampned. 2 Thess. ii.

Bale. English Votaries, part ii.

Defected honour neuer more
Is to be got againe.

Warner. Albion's England, book v. ch. xxviii.

After he perceiued that nature began to faile and defect, he ycelded himselfe to die, and was verie desirous that his friends and wellwillers should haue access vnto him, and to abide by him at their pleasure. Holinshed. Ireland, Anno 1576.

——— O why did God,
Creator wise, that peopl'd highest heav'n
With spirits masculine, create at last
This novelty on earth, this fair defect
Of nature.

Milton. Paradise Lost, book x. l. 891.

Now Arius maintained, the Son or word, to be κτίσμα, a creature, made in time, and mutable or defectible.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 606.

It hath a defectible understanding, and a free and changeable will, and innumerable weaknesses.

Taylor. The second Part of the Dissuasive from Popery. Introduction.

And some of these are the more considerable, I mean, those defectibilities in pronunciation, because the priest always speaking the words of consecration in a secret voice not to be heard.

Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 268. A Discourse of the Real Presence.

And this defectibility may well be supposed, seeing it is granted by all, that there was that difference between the condition of saints and angels now in glory, and of the angels and Adam in their creation estate.

Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part iii. fol. 28.

Vnmov'd thou didst behold the pride
Of th' angels, when they to defection fell?
And without passion didst provide
To punish treason, racks and death in hell.

Habingdon. Castara, part iii.

The king thought it unjust to condemn a nation for the transgression of a part of it, and still hoped to redeem it from the infamy of a general defection.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i. p. 113.

We press nature with overweighty burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong waters, hot spices, and provoking sauces. Ralegh. History of the World, book i. ch. v. sec. 5.

Fabius Maximus is reprehended by Polybius for defectively writing the Punicke warres. Speed. The Preeme.

And what greater nakedness or unfitness of mind than that which hinders ever the solace and peaceful society of the married couple: and what hinders that more than the unfitness and defectiveness of an unconjugal mind?

Milton. Doctrine, &c. of Divorce.

Amongst the infirmities, therefore, of a commonwealth, I will reckon in the first place those that arise from an imperfct institution, and resemble the diseases of a natural body, which proceed from a defectuous procreation.

Hobbes. Of Commonwealth, part ii. ch. xxix.

Diogenes supposeth that they [the souls] have an intelligence; but partly for the grosse thicknesse of their temperature, and in part for the abundance of moisture, they have neither discourse of reason nor sense, but are like unto those who be furious; for the principall part of the soul, to wit, reason is defectuous and empeached. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 692.

We must not take this mercifull indulgence given to our defectuosities, as a dispensation for the sordidnes of our loves.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 14. sec. 2.

——— The lovers soon espy'd
This small defect, for love is eagle-ey'd,
And in soft whispers soon the passage try'd.

Hughes. Pyramus and Thisbe.

There were fewer instances then of leaving one sect for another, than now we have of defection to Popery, or of apostacy to Mahometism. Bentley. On Free Thinking, p. 203.

Now his mind was to have made up this defect, by taking the picture, and placing it, as it might stand properly enough, before the whole book of the Psalms; and being fair on the back side, to have appointed his servant Lyly, an artist in such matters, to have written thereon what was defective.

Strype. Life of Parker, book iv. sec. 3.

But, when this matter was in private debated, some observed, that, King James by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and yet doing it so defectively, had really made it more suspicious than it was before. Burnet. Own Times, Anno 1689.

In the same manner, self contempt supposes a self meanness or defectiveness; and may be either a just modesty, or unjust humility. Shaftesbury. The Moralist.

Nothing in Nature, or in Providence that is scant, or defectuous, can be stable and lasting. Barrow. Sermon 15. vol. ii.

If they see one man beat another they readily enough discern a power in him that beats, but they cannot so easily conceive the the others defeat owing to his power of being beaten, which they rather look upon as weakness and defect of power.

Search. Light of Nature, vol. i. part i. ch. i.

He quickly therefore withdrew himself from such wretched auxiliaries, and the Regent himself seemed pleased at his defection. Goldsmith. Life of Lord Bolingbroke.

DEFECT. — DEFENCE. — And these all, the rules of religion and virtue, which were known by the name philosophers, were more imperfect and defective in many substances.
Wotton. On the Strength and Weakness of Human Reason, conf. 2.

DEFE'NCE, s.
DEFE'NCE, s.
DEFE'NCELESS,
DEFE'NCELESSLY,
DEFE'NCELESSNESS,
DEFE'ND,
DEFE'NDABLE,
DEFENDA'NT, s.
DEFE'NDANT, adj.
DEFE'NDER,
DEFE'NDO,
DEFE'NDRESS,
DEFE'NDATIVE,
DEFE'NSE,
DEFE'NSIBLE,
DEFE'NSIVE, adj.
DEFE'NSIVE, s.
DEFE'NSIVELY, DEFE'NSOUR.

Fr. defense; It. defensione; Sp. defensa; Fr. defendre; It. defendere; Sp. defender; Lat. defendere, propriè de se ac suis, tendere, hinc est, arcere, depellere.

1. To keep or hold off, ward off, repel; and thus—to guard, to secure, to fortify, to uphold, to protect.

2. To keep off, to ward off; to prohibit, to forbid, to contradict, to deny.

Mr. Tyrwhitt says, to defend, in Romance of the Rose, is to ransom; it is, to guard, protect, save themselves, s. by the gifts of lampreie; and thus, redeem or ransom themselves, or they shall be bound with a cord, &c.

To defence or defense, is used by our old writers as they used, to defend.

Al her wyf out defence, by norþe and eke by weste.
R. Gloucester, p. 253.

Vor gret ransum he easte [asked] of hem, to helpe him spene. [spend]
Vor defendi is lond, & is worre to wenteen. Id. p. 498.

And wo so another monne's God by nyme wole mid varyst,
Mid ryht he may þs owe leve, zif þe defendor aþ þe myste.
Id. p. 198.

Hii hulde hom there defensables, to libbe other to deie.
Id. p. 549.

He salle at þi wille mak alle þin amendes,
& late alle be stille, þat þou him defendes.
R. Brunne, p. 177.

Ac God to alle good folke, suche guyinge defendeþ.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 41.

Kynge and knyghtes, þat holy churche defenden.
Id. Ib. p. 147.

Adam afterwarde, a zens hus defens [this prohibition]
Paste fret [eat] of þat frut.
Id. Ib. p. 350.

But summe for ennye and stryf, summe for good wille prechen Crist, and summe of charite witynge that I am put in the defense of the Gospel. Wiclif. Philipensis, ch. i.

The roses weren assured all
Defenced with the strong wall.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 136.

This Minos hath a monster, a wicked best
That was so cruel, that without arest
Whā yᵗ a man was brought into his presence
He would hym eat; there helpeth no defence.
Id. Of Ariadne, fol. 207.

If that I break your defence, [i. e. prohibition.]
Id. Troilus, book iii. v. 138.

At last, she sailed to a yong man hartlesse
Other disceit vnware and defencelesse.
Id. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 324.

And Adam eke in Paradise,
When he stode moste in all his prise,
After the state of innocence,
Ayen the God brake his defence,
And fell out of his place aweie.
Gower. Conf. Am. book v. fol. 93.

Which meane he willed to be ensured more
Toward the skies, and climed all with ease
So that your power, as veil maynt. [illegible]
Ne yet your people might defeasant be
By the great mist of our invasion.
Surrey. Æneis, book i.

But when they came thether and founde the same well manned and more strongly defensed, then expectation vanquished the gust to assaute but rather abuse the same.
Hal. Henry VI. The fifth Yere.

Then he: O my knight, wel I wote, for thee I fast, as my defence, & my merytall God.
Bible, Anno [illegible] Psalm 35.

As it is iust to me to seeke this thing for al them for whom I am given as debte and in my bondis and in defendyng and confirmyng of the Gospel that ale ghe be knowen of my ioye.
Wicl. Philipens. ch. i.

How may this weke woman have the strength
How to defend again this renegate?
Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. [illegible]

By all the saints that we preve
But they defend them with iangwine.
He shall have of corde a leigne
With which men shall him binde
Id. Romant of the Rose, v. [illegible]

Prudence answered; certes wel I wote, [illegible] nothing defended, to hem that sorweful is, among folke it serve it is rather graunted him to wepe.
Id. The Tale of Melibeus, v. 2, p. [illegible]

I am seruant of these creatures to me [illegible] defendour. Id. The Testament of Loue, fo. [illegible]

At euery corner of this wall
Was set a tour ful principall
And enerich had without fable
A portcolise defensable
To kepe of enemies.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. [illegible]

Against the proud Grekes made defensio
With her victorious hand.
Id. Certain Balades.

For worde is wynde, but the maistrie
Is that a man hym selfe defende
Of thynge, which is not to commende.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 63.

The plaintife sayth, I require the law; which is graunted: then commeth an officer and arresteth the party defendant, and vseth him contrary to the lawes of England.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Richard Chanceler, vol. i. fol. 268.

Lyke as in the wageour of a lawe, they shall not swere that the defendaunt oweth not yᵉ money, but that they beleue that he swereth trueth.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 979. The Debellacion of Salem and Bizance.

The more appeareth the feblenesse of thei parte, and the falsehoode of theyr heresies, if they haue any greate witte, or any greate learninge in deede, and then for all that, in the defendynge of those matters wyth suche foolyshe handelynge so shamefully confounde them selfe. Id. Ib. fol. 863. The Apology, ch. ix.

What furious thought, my wretched spouse, quod she,
Did moue thee now such wepons for to weld?
Why hastest thow? This time doth not require
Such succor, ne yet such defenders now.
Surrey. Æneis, book ii.

The kynge sent out his cōmyssyoners, chargynge his lordes with theyr assynes sowdyours, to mete with hym in defensable arraye at the cytie of Arras by Marymawdeleyne day next ensuing. Fabyan, vol. ii. Anno 1377.

Dyuers popes, as Alexander the Syxte, Pius the iii. and Julius the ii. nowe beynge pope, by theyr tymes, eyther of them sunderly, wyth auctorytie & concent of theyr spyrituall & temyne counsayll, elected & chase thys excellente prynce, and admytted hym for cheyefe defensour of Chrystes church, before all other Crysten prynces. Id. Anno 1609.

Moreouer, as thou knowest not the infirmitie, so thou approachest not to the cure & helthe. The dolour is not there, as thou haste made defensiues. Golden Boke, S. iiii.

 Thei that be ill, been alwaies double ill, bycause thei beare armour defensiue to defend their own yuels: and armes offensiue, to assaile the good maners of other.

Golden Boke, H.

——————— Hnman invention
Could not instruct me to dispose her where
She could be more defenced from all men's eyes;
An anchorite lives not prisoned in a wall
With more security.

Shirley. The Bird in a Cage.

MAL. Slave, take thy life.
Wert thou defenced, through blood and wounds,
The sternest horror of a civil fight
Would I achieve thee.

Marston. The Malcontent, act v. sc. 2.

He is, said he, a man of great defence
Expert in battell and in deeds of armes.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book v. can. 2.

King Dermote, whom his subjects then
And long ere then did hate,
Was left defenceless, desprate of
His lif, depriu'd his state,
And fled to England.

Warner. Albion's England, book v. ch. xxvi.

Love is as subtily catch'd as a disease;
But being got it is a treasure sweet
Which to defend is harder than to get.
And ought not be profan'd on either part,
For though 'tis got by chance, 'tis kept by art.

Donne. Elegy 17.

Such a bitter contention was among them, that the defendant part was driuen for a while to keepe silence.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 658. Christ's Powertie Denied.

A certaine combat was fought and tried before them in the castell of Dublin, betweene two Oconhours, verie neere coosens and kinsmen: the one was named Teig mac Guill Patrike Oconhour, appellant; the other was named Con mac Cormake Oconhour, defendant. Holinshed. Ireland, vol. vi. p. 455.

Having battered the walls of the town on the south side, but to small purpose, because of the rampiers and ditches which the defendents had cast up within; he retired himself and his army to Leith. Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, Anno 1571.

There was a knight in the field, ready to prove Helen of Corinth had received great injury, both by the erring judgment of the challenger, and the unlucky weakness of her former defender.

Sidney. Arcadia, book i.

They could not inforce the dutie of men's communion with a church confest to be in many things blame-worthy, vnlesse they should oftentimes seeme to speak as halfe defendors of the faults themselues, or at the least not so vehement accusers thereof as their adversaries.

Hooker. Ecclesiastical Polity, book v. fol. 326.

Shortlie after the kyng gathered the sixt penie of the temporall men's goods through England, Ireland, and Wales, which had been granted him at the foresaid Parlement holden at Yorke, towards the defending of the realme against the Scotts.

Holinshed. England. Edward II. Anno 1323.

Who in Latine, French, and English pronounced the Queene's maiesties vsuall stile of England, France, and Ireland, defendresse of the faith, &c. crying three times largesse.

Stow. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1586.

[We] confidently rely upon God, the Holy Scriptures, right reason, and the most venerable and prime antiquity, which are the proper defensatives of truth, for its support and maintenance.

Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 285. A Dissuasive from Popery. Introduction, part i.

If I may know any of their fautors, comforters, counsellers or defencers, or any that haue suspect bookes or quiers of such errours and heresies: I shall let you, my lord of Canterburie, or your officers in your absence, or the diocesans and ordinaries of such men, haue soone and readie knowing.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 591. Certain Godly Persons persecuted.

These, vnder the leading of Robin of Ridsdale, came vp both euill apparelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty armour, neither defencible for proofe, nor scowred for shew.

Speed. Richard III. book ix. ch. xix. sec. 7.

But Robert Fitz-Stephen thus aduanced, for his more assurrance, beganne to raise a towne at Carricke, making the place which nature had already fortified, much more by art defencible.

Speed. Henrie II. book ix. ch. vi. sec. 56.

But when no defensiue could take place, but all went by tyrannie and meere extortion, it burst in the end to an vprore and tumult.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 159. Marriage of Priests Defended.

Both these rush't in, while Norfolke, like a wall,
Which, oft with engines crackt, disdaines to fall,
Maintaines his station by defensiue fight.

Beaumont. Bosworth Field.

This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone, set in the siluer sea
Which serues it in the office of a wall,
Or as a moate defencive to a house,
Against the enuy of lesse happier lands.

Shakspeare. Richard II. fol. 28.

Austriaci were never so matched as with Count Mansfelt, for he is a perpetual motion and doth not stand upon the defensive (as others have done hitherto, and lost by the bargain) but he is always setting upon them, and doth make war at their cost.

Cabbala. Sir Isaac Wake to the Duke.

Camalodunum, where the Romans had seated themselves to dwell pleasantly, rather than defencively, was not fortifyd, against that therefore the Britains make first assault.

Milton. History of England, book ii.

Stout men of armes, and with their guide of powre
Like Troyes old towne, defenst with Ilion's towre.

Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book i. st. 61.

But Justice bears the godlike shape of Law,
And law requires defence, and equal plea
Betwixt th' offender, and the righteous judge.

Dryden. The Duke of Guise, act v. sc. 1.

What better texture could we give it, [the skin,] which altho' less obdurate and firm, than that of some other animals, yet is so much the more sensible of every touch, and more compliant with every motion? and being easily defendible by the power of man's reason and art, is therefore much the properest tegument for a reasonable creature.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book v. ch. vi.

Now growling, spluttering, wauling, such a clutter,
'Tis just like puss defendant in a gutter.

Dryden. Epilogue to the King and Queen.

But now, continu'd I, since I have been thus long the defendant only; I am resolved to take up offensive arms, and be aggressor in my turn. Shaftesbury. The Moralists.

Immortal offspring of my brother Jove;
My brightest nephew, and whom best I love,
Whose hands were join'd with mine to raise the wall
Of tottering Troy, now nodding to her fall;
Dost thou not mourn our power employ'd in vain,
And the defenders of our city slain?

Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book xii.

But where there is contrariety there will be fighting, and where there is fighting, the weaker, I am sure, must suffer; and generally the Christian's is so in all worldly encounters, whose chief defensatives lie not in that armour that is sword-proof or bullet-proof, and who wears no breast-plate upon, but within his breast, that is, his innocence, his conscience, and his confidence in a reconciled God. South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 375.

Men in a town, threatened with a mighty siege, abandon their suburbs, and slight those out-works which are either weak of themselves or not well defensible for want of men; and resolve only to make good those posts which they are able fully to man, and easily to relieve.

Sir W. Temple. On the United Provinces, ch. viii.

Since therefore we cannot win by an offensive war, at least a land-war, the model of our government seems naturally contriv'd for the defensive part: and the consent of a people is easily obtain'd to contribute to that power which must protect it.

Dryden. All for Love. Epistle Dedicatory.

Defence, in it's true legal sense, signifies not a justification, protection, or guard which is now its popular signification; but merely an opposing or denial (from the French verb, defender) of the truth or validity of the complaint.

Blackstone. Commentaries, book iii. ch. xx.

DEFEND. — DE-FENDER.

For it would be ridiculous to suppose that the defendant comes and defends (or, in the vulgar acceptation, justifies) the force and injury, in one line, and pleads that he is not guilty of the trespass complained of, in the next.

Blackstone. Commentaries, book iii. ch. xx.

Revolve our whole discourse; add to it all those reflections which your own good understanding shall suggest, and make a strenuous effort beyond the reach of vulgar philosophy, to confess that the cause of artificial society is more defensible even than that of artificial religion.

Burke. Vindication of Natural Society.

But they are so situated as to be cannonaded by shipping, and are in a manner defenceless against an enemy of any force by land.

Cook. First Voyage, book iii. ch. xiv.

In the rivers, we meet with a thousand minnows for one pike; in the sea, a million of herrings for a single shark. Compensation obtains throughout, defencelessness and devastation are repaired by fecundity. Paley. Natural Theology, ch. xxvi.

For it may, I believe, be as truly said of him, as it was of Carneades, That he never defended an opinion which he did not prove, nor opposed any which he did not confute.

Hurd. Life of Warburton.

As the opposers of the Gospel have frequently had recourse to arguments ad hominem, and have taken advantage from modern systems, and from the writings of divines of this or that persuasion; so the defenders of revelation have often found themselves under a necessity of reducing things to the venerable Christianity of the New Testament, and of adventuring no further; and of declining the rest as not essential to the cause, and to the controversy. Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History. Preface.

Their [Livy and Tacitus] deviations into poetry, though not strictly defensible, yet, as they appear to be the genuine effects of their feelings excited by extraordinary occasions, are really delightful. V. Knox. Essays, No. 23.

They came at once to a resolution of getting rid of the difficulties, which arose from the complication of their trade with their revenue; a step which despoiled them of their best defensive armour, and put them at once into the power of administration.

Burke. On a late State of the Nation.

What I have endeavoured, is only that you may be able, as St. Peter directs, to give an answer to them that ask you a reason of the hope that is in you. In doing which, remember you are concerned only to be on the defensive.

Secker. Sermon 34. vol. iii.

Chamberlayne in his Magnæ Britt. Not. (1. 2,) affirms that the Title DEFENDER of the Faith belonged to the Kings of England long before the formal grant made by Leo X. to Henry VIII., and appeals to several Charters recorded by the University of Oxford, in confirmation of this assertion. Chamberlayne, however, has not cited his authorities.

One of the fullest accounts extant of the received origin of the Title, is given by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in his Life and Reign of Henry VIII. (94,) from which it appears, that at one time the chances were greatly against the Title having been such as any of Henry's Protestant successors could have retained. Dr. John Clark, Dean of Windsor, was sent as Ambassador to the Pope, to deliver the Volume de Septem Sacramentis against Luther, which, we believe, still exists in the Vatican Library, very splendidly bound, and bearing an inscription in the King's own hand-writing, Anglorum Rex Henricus Leoni mittit hoc opus ad Fidei testem et amicitiæ. On his "appearing in full Consistory, the Pope, knowing the glorious present he brought, first gave him his foot and then his cheeks to kiss; then receiving the Book, he promised to do as much for approbation thereof to all Christian Princes, (which our King much desired) as ever was done for St. Augustine's or Hierome's works; assuring him withal, that at the next Consistory he would bestow a public Title on the King; which, having been heretofore privately debated among the Cardinals, and those of Protector, or Defensor Romanæ Ecclesiæ, or Sedis Apostolicæ, or Rex Apostolicus, or Orthodoxus, produced, they at last agreed on Defensor Fidei." FE

The original Bull of Leo X., in 1521, bestowing this Title, is in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum, (Vitellius, B. iv. 226,) but in a very damaged condition; it is printed by Lord Herbert, (loc. cit.) and by Selden, in his Titles of Honor. It contains some passages which the Pope very speedily must have been inclined to revoke. It speaks of Majestas tua, charitate quæ omnia sedulo et nihil perperam agit, Fideique Catholicæ zelo accensa, et devotionis erga nos et hanc sanctam sedem fervore inflammata—of ejus Libri admirabilem quandam et cœlestis Gratiæ rore conspersam doctrinam—and it adds that it is written absolutissimâ doctrinâ nec minori eloquentiâ. Of the effect of the Title itself upon the King's mind Leo feels no misgiving, Et profecto hujus Tituli excellentiâ et dignitate ac singularibus meritis tuis diligenter perpensis et consideratis, nullum neque dignius neque Majestati tuæ convenientius nunc excogitare potuissemus; quod quoties audies et leges, toties propriæ Virtutis optimique meriti tui recordaberis, nec hujusmodi titulo intumesces vel in superbiam elevaberis, sed solitâ tua prudentiâ humilius et in Fide Christi ac devotione hujus Sanctæ Sedis a quâ exaltatus fueris fortius et constantius evades.

The Pope recalled this Title at the time at which he excommunicated Henry for suppressing the Religious Houses, but the King was by no means willing to relinquish it; and in the thirty-fifth year of his reign he obtained the confirmation of it by Parliament. It appears to have been a very favourite badge of majesty.

In the key-stone of the gateway of the Palace which occupies the left-hand side of the celebrated picture (in the Apartments of the Antiquarian Society at Somerset House,) representing the interview between Henry VIII. and Francis I. in the Field of Cloth of Gold, between Guînes and Ardres in the year 1520, stands a male figure with a pair of expanded wings, and a skull-cap with a small Cross on its front. In his right hand he holds a long-shafted Cross, shaped like a Pilgrim's staff; and in his left a shield, the bottom whereof rests upon the head of an expiring dragon, on which he tramples. These figures are believed by Sir Joseph Ayloffe, in his description of the picture, (Archæologia, iii. 203,) to be emblems of the King's then newly-acquired Title, Defender of the Faith. If this be so, the painter, in order to please the Monarch, must have been guilty of a very pardonable anachronism; for the Title, as we have seen, was not granted till the year after the interview which he here represents.

The Emperor Charles V., by virtue of part of his Coronation Oath, was invested with the Title of Defensor Ecclesiæ; and in compliment to the two Monarchs, the following Distich was blazoned in golden letters over the Council Chamber at Guildhall, when Charles visited England.

Carolus, Henricus, vivant DEFENSOR uterque;
Henricus FIDEI, Carolus Ecclesiæ.

Both Titles, probably, were derived from the Primitive Church, which appointed numerous Defensores; as Ecclesiæ, Regni, Civitatum, Plebis. (Cassiodorus, ix. 25. Concilium Africanum. can. 42.) In later days the Defensor Ecclesiæ was called Advocatus, q. v. (Synod. Carthag. can. 99.)

DE-FIGURE. These traditions are defigurations and deformations of Christ exhibited. Bishop Hall. Remains, p. 30.

DEFILE. DEFI'LE, DEFI'LEMENT, DEFI'LER, DEFI'LING. Anciently written File, q.v. Dutch, ruylen; A. S. fyl-an, afyl-an, befyl-an, inquinare, contaminare, fœdare, to defile, pollute or make filthy. Somner.

To dirty, to pollute, to corrupt, to contaminate.

The holy bed, defoiled of marriage
For ones defoiled, may not recouered be.
Chaucer. Certaine Balades, fol. 348.

They haue set vp their abhominacions, in the house that hath my name, and haue defyled it.
Bible, Anno 1551. Jeremye, ch. vii.

But spyghtfully and malycyouslye he called them abortyues or chyldren of destruction, dysdainouslye rebukynge the Gentyll kynge as a defyler of relygion and polluter of their holye ceremonyes. Bale. English Votaries, part ii. L. iii.

Yet now is this so happy a meanwhile,
And interlightning times thy virtues wrought,
That discord had no leisure to defile,
So fair attempts with a tumultuous thought.
Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book v.

Now there are defilements of two sorts; defilements of the flesh, when men wallow in gross and sensual sins; and defilements also of the spirit, and such are they that reside in the heart, and break not forth into outward act: Now from both these the fear of God cleanseth us. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 657.

A wicked spirite came vppon Sobredus your predecessour, which was a defiler of virgines, and a breaker of ecclesiasticall priueledges; for sitting royally among his barons at a dinner the Diuell plucked away his soule without confession of his sinnes.
Stow. The Mercians, Anno 718.

The deputie considering and bethinking with himselfe how the church of God was abused, and that God had in store some wrath and indignation for this defiling of his holie sanctuary, did for the avoiding thereof write his letters of aduertisement to her highnesse, and most earnestlie praied hir princelie authoritie for redresse thereof. Holinshed. Ireland, Anno 1576.

But as those poltroons that fling dirt
Do but defile, but cannot hurt;
So all the honour they have won,
Or we have lost, is much at one.
Butler. Hudibras, part ii. can. 2.

The same apostle adds in the very same verse, that 'tis also an equally essential part of the same religion, that a man keep himself unspotted from the world; that he preserve himself free from the defilement and corruptions of a vicious and debauched age. Clarke. Sermon 3. vol. viii.

No sour, pedantical, abusive rage,
No vicious rant defiles her freest page;
No vile indecent sally, or prophane,
To pleasure fools or give the wise a pain.
Byrom. Dulces Ante Omnia Musæ.

Like flow'rs selected from the rest, and bound
And bundled close to fill some crowded vase,
Fades rapidly, and by compression marr'd,
Contracts defilement not to be endured.
Cowper. The Task, book iv.

DE'FILE, v. DE'FILE, n. Lat. filum, a thread; Fr. filer; to draw out threads, to prolong, to extend in length; and thus, to move off in a line or file.

The Duke of Marlborough was so satisfied with these assurances, that he came back to his army, and quickened their march, so that he brought them to Triers; and he advanced eight leagues further, through so many defiles, that the French might easily have made his march both dangerous and difficult.
Burnet. Own Times, Anno 1705.

Through the hollow, which lies between the hind parts of these two heads, that is to say, under the ham, between the ham strings, and within the concave recess of the bone formed by the extuberances on each side, in a word, along a defile, between rocks, pass the great vessels and nerves, which go to the leg.
Paley. Natural Theology, ch. viii.

DEFI'NE, v. DEFI'NEABLE, DEFI'NER, DE'FINITE, DE'FINITELY, DE'FINITENESS, DEFINI'TION, DEFI'NITIVE, adj. DEFI'NITIVE, n. DEFI'NITIVELY. Sp. definir; It. diffinire; Lat. definere, quasi finem dare; to set a bound or limit.

To bound or limit; to describe the bounds or limits, and thus, consequentially, as in Cotgrave,

Definir; "to conclude, determine or discuss; precisely to express; fully to describe; exactly to declare."

Chaucer uses Definish.

But I wol not determine
Of princes power, ne define,
Ne by my word comprehend iwis
Yf it so farre may stretch in this.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 147.

But I haue defined, that blisfulness is souerain good, for which eueri wight demeth that thilke estate that he desyreth ouer all thinges that it be blisfulnesse.
Id. The third Booke of Boecius, fol. 222.

But if this ne may not be doen, then is it not possible that hap be any soch thynge as I haue definished a little here beforn.
Id. The fifth Booke of Boecius, fol. 237.

The juge answerd, of this in his absence
I may not yeve diffinitif sentence.
Id. The Doctoures Tale, v. 12106.

But that I aske, why that the fifthe man
Was non hosbond to the Samaritan?
How many might she have in marriage?
Yet herd I never tellen in min age
Upon this noumbre diffinitioun.
Id. The Wif of Bathes Prologue, v. 5607.

The grounde my sonne for to seche
Upon this diffinicion,
The worldes constitucion
Hath set the name of gentilness
Upon the fortune of richesse.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 75.

And y^e^ king of Israel said vnto him: euen so shal thy iudgmēt be, as thou hast defyned it thyselfe.
Bible, Anno 1551. 3 Kings, ch. xx.

And how then can such men define upon other regions very farre without that parallel, whether they were inhabited or not, seeing that in so neere a place they so grossly mistook the matter.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. vol. iii. fol. 54. The Temperature of Regions.

Where one is apprhēded for killing a mā, we lay murder to his charge; whereupon the accused person, when he graunteth the killing, & yet denieth it to be murder: we must streight after haue recourse to the definition, and aske what is murder, by defining wherof, and comparing the nature of the word with his deede done, wee shall sone knowe whether he comitted murder, or manslaughter. Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 96.

And for the same causes we pryue hym of all kyngely dignyte and worshyp, of any kyngely worship in hym lefte, and we depose hym by our sentēce defynytyfe. Fabyan, Anno 1399.

For though thei be not cyrcūscribed in place, for lack of bodily dymēciō & measuring, yet are they & angels also diffinitively so placed where thei be for the time, y^t^ thei be not at one time in diuers places at ones as sayntes bee in sundry countryes, & very farre a soudre called vpon at ones.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 188. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

But vertue's seat is deepe within the mind
And not in outward showes, but inward thoughts defin'd.
Spenser. Faerie Queene. The Legend of Sir Calidore, st. 1.

Great varieties there is of those opportunities, not defineable particularly, but only observable by him, that not only in his duty towards God, and toward himself, but also toward his weak or sick brother, doth ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖν, walk circumspectly, and observingly.
Hammond. Works. Of Fraternal Admonition, vol. i. fol. 291.

When any thing is spoken by Christ to a single person or a definite number of persons, which concerns a moral duty, or a perpetual rite of universal concernment, that single person, or that little congregation, are the representatives of the whole church.

Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book ii. ch. iii.

It [the body of Christ] is not there definitively for the same reason, because to be definitely in a place is to be in it so as to be there, and no where else.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 237. The Real Presence.

And therefore in geometry, (which is the only science that it hath pleased God hitherto to bestow on mankind) men begin at settling the significations of their words; which settling of significations, they call definitions; and place them in the beginning of their reckoning. Hobbes. Of Man, part i. ch. iv.

There was a sentence in the admiralty, that the Peter should be discharged; and the king's advocate, not having then any knowledge of further proof, consented to it, but this was not a definitive sentence, but a sentence interlocutory, as it is termed in that court.
State Trials. Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, &c.

No man, no synod, no session of men, though call'd the church, can judge definitively the sense of Scripture to another man's conscience, which is well known to be a general maxim of the Protestant religion.
Milton. Of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes.

A more ready way to define controversies, is for every one not to prescribe to others, or to prosecute: for then men would more calmly see the truth and consent.
Barrow. A Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy.

And indeed it is very improbable, that we, who by the strength of our faculties cannot enter into the knowledge of any being, not so much as of our own, should be able to find out by them, that Supreme nature, which we cannot otherwise define than by saying it is infinite; as if infinite were definable, or infinity a subject for our narrow understanding.
Dryden. Religio Laici. Preface.

> But is he therefore found? vain searcher! no:
> Let your imperfect definition show
> That nothing you, the weak definer, know.
> Prior. I am That I am. An Ode.

From indefinite words a definite conclusion (especially in matters of this kind) may not be inferred; it is said, do thou feed my sheep, it is not said do thou alone feed all my sheep; this is their arbitrary gloss, or presumptuous improvement of the text. Barrow. A Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy.

Definition being nothing but making another understand by words, what idea the term defin'd stands for, a definition is best made by enumerating those simple ideas that are combin'd in the signification of the term defin'd: and if instead of such an enumeration, men have accustomed themselves to use the next general term; it has not been out of necessity, or for greater clearness, but for quickness and dispatch sake.
Locke. On Human Understanding, book iii. ch. iii.

Upon each man, according to the true quality of his doings, thus detected, examined and stated, a definitive sentence shall pass whereby he shall be acquitted and approved, or condemned and reprobated. Barrow. Works. Sermon 33. vol. ii.

Their appellations lie from the eldership to a conference; from that to a provincial; from that to a national synod. Which must definitively end all. Strype. Life of Whitgift.

It [gravity] was no better, but often worse, than what a French wit had long ago defined it, viz. a mysterious carriage of the body, to cover the defects of the mind.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. xi.

In the schools of early discipline, where youth is usually initiated in the studies of humanity, men are taught to believe that virtue is founded on eternal truth, and that the distinctions of right and wrong are as clearly definable as those between the meridian sunshine and the midnight shade.
V. Knox. The Spirit of Despotism, sec. 32.

After all this, it is surely superfluous to answer the question that has once been asked, Whether Pope was a poet; otherwise than by asking in return, if Pope be not a poet, where is poetry to be found? To circumscribe poetry by a definition will only show the narrowness of the definer, though a definition which shall exclude Pope will not easily be made.
Johnson. Life of Pope.

As that [middle age] is the busy period in the life of man, it includes in effect the whole compass of religion, and therefore cannot have its peculiar character so definitely marked and ascertained. Blair. Sermon 4. vol. iii.

The same author held, as was formerly observed, (§ 263) that virtue consists not in transient acts, but in settled habits or dispositions; whence the word ἕξις, or habit, occurs in many of his definitions of the virtues.
Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, part iii. ch. ii.

We were thus employed, when a gentleman arrived from Scotland to represent the state of that country, and to require a definitive answer from the Chevalier, whether he would have the insurrection to be made immediately.
Bolingbroke. A Letter to Sir William Windham.

Definitives, the subject of the present chapter, are commonly called by grammarians, articles, articuli, Ἄρθρα. They are of two kinds, either those properly and strictly so called, or else the pronominal articles, such as this, that, any, &c.
Hermes, book ii. ch. i.

Again he begins libro iii. capite vi. in this manner, viz. "Neither the Lord, nor the Holy Spirit, nor the Apostles, would have definitively and absolutely called him God, who was not God, nor any one unless he were the true God."
Watts. On the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity, diss. 4. sec. 6.

DEFIX, defigere, de-fixum; (de, and figere, to fix,) to fix down, to fix or fasten firmly.

Afterward by reason of the manifold and cruell warres mooued by the Tartars, they were constrained to defixe their princely seate and habitation in that extreme prouince of the north.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. vol. i. part ii. fol. 89. A Description of China.

DEFLAGRA'TION, DEFLAGRABI'LITY, DEFLA'GRABLE. } Deflagrare; de, and flagrare; Gr. φλέγ-ειν, to burn. See CONFLAGRATION, ante.

(I) excited in the melted mass of our transmuted salt as many deflagrations as I could.
Boyle. On the Origin and Qualities of Forms.

In this way of proceeding we have been forced to spend much more time, than the opinion of the already deflagrability (if I may so speak) of salt-petre did beforehand permit us to imagine,
Id. On Salt-Petre, sec. 8.

But to return to our chymical oils, supposing that they were exactly pure; yet I hope they would be, as the best spirit of wine is, but the more inflammable and deflagrable.
Id. The Sceptical Chymist.

Thus smoke and rain and serenity succeed each other, till the mountain in an instant discharges its torrent fires, which rush down with resistless fury, roll over palaces, temples, and cities, and carry with them deflagration, ruin, and horror.
Potter. Sophocles. Preface to Œdipus.

DEFLE'CT, DEFLE'CTION, or DEFLE'XION. } Deflectere, xum; (de, and flectere, to turn,) bend or curve. To bend or curve, to turn aside, out of the straight way, to deviate.

Againe we find in the other triall how the weight of sufferance boweth and deflects a little, even the strongest pillars of humanity.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 1. sec. 1.

By reference whereunto we shall discern nothing to be an evil, that doth not deflect from the rectitude of that line, which is drawen to the centre of goodness by the hand of him, who is himself this centre. Id. Ib. Treat. 15. sec. 2.

In like manner all good men in the way of vertuous practice tending directly towards happiness, (our common journies end;) it being their design, their interest, and their endeavour not to mistake the way, nor to deflect from the right and nearest course thereto, men are apt to think it reasonable, and safe to accompany, in their progress, or to press after them in their steps.
Barrow. Sermon 2. vol. iii.

In consequence upon this sense, and with a little deflection from it, to justifie a person sometime denoteth to approve him, or esteem him just; a mental judgment, as it were, being passed upon him; so wisedom is said to be justified, that is, approved by her children. Id. Sermon 5. vol. ii

DEFLECT. — DEFLOUR

Passive matter being totally inert, its resistance to the laws impressed upon it must be extremely weak; and consequently the disorders arising from that resistance, proportionably slow and unheeded: while that active self moving principle, the mind, flies out at once from the centre of its direction, and can, every moment, deflect from the line of truth and reason.

Warburton. The Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, serm. 2.

The one proceeds to virtue and truth by the nearest and most compendious ways; the other leads to the same point through certain deflections and durations, by a winding but pleasanter path. Lowth. On the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, lec. 1.

DEFLO'UR, DEFLO'URER, DEFLORA'TION, DEFLO'URING, DEFLO'URISH. Fr. deflorer, defleurer; Sp. deflorar; Lat. deflorare, quasi florem demere, to take away the flower. To strip or rob of the flower; the bloom, the grace, the beauty. Used literally by Mountague. Met. To viciate, to defile, to pollute. Deflourish is used by Drummond literally. Defloration is used, as, a picking or culling of the flowers, or generally, the beauties.

But Progne most of sorow made,
Whiche sigh hir sister pale and fade,
And specheles and dishonoured,
Of what she had be defloured.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 105.

Dany of Rothesay prince of the realme and eldest sonne to the kyng was accused to his father of dyuers heynous crymes, and in especiall of lasciuious & disolute lyuyng, as rauyshyng of wiues, deflouryng of virgins, and defouling of maidens.

Hall. Henry IV. The eighth Yere.

As thoughe marryage were an entraunce into violent whoredome, and a filthy deflourer of virginitie, which rather sãctifieth it to increase to God's honour, as in Abraham & Sara, Zachary and Helysabeth. Bale. English Votaries, part ii. D 2.

The sayd bysshop, as the fame then went, hadde disflourysshed a mayden the doughter of the sayde Sir Gautier.

Fabyan, Anno 1308.

Gather therefore the rose, whilst yet is prime,
For soon comes age, that will her pride deflowre.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 12.

That wondrous patterne wheresoere it bee,
Whether in earth layd vp in secret store
Or else in heauen, that no man may it see
With sinfull eyes, for feare it to deflore,
Is perfect beavty, which all men adore.
Spenser. Hymne in Honor of Heauenly Beautie.

If a man had deflowr'd a virgin, or brought an ill name on his wife that she came not a virgin to him, he was amerc'd in certain shekels of silver, and bound never to divorce her all his days, Deut. xxii. which shows that the law gave no liberty to divorce, where the injury was palpable; and the absolute forbidding to divorce, was in part the punishment of a deflowrer and a defamer.

Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

He turneth his eye upon the fields, gardens, and groves, as flying into priviledged retreats, exempt from such violent distractions, and presently he findeth an earthquake, playing, as I may say, upon all of them successively in their several turns; rending the cedars, deflowering the gardens, swallowing the fruits of the campagnes and vineyards, leaving all the pleasures of his prospect inverted into objects of horror and amazement.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 19. sec. 6.

He [Catiline] was accused before (besides many other vile faults) for deflouring of his own daughter, and killing his brother.

Sir Thomas North. Plutarch. Cicero, fol. 715.

Deflourish'd mead, where is your heavenly hue.

Drummond. Sonnet 59. part i.

But the common printed chronicle, is indeed but an epitome or defloration made by Robert of Loraine, Bishop of Hereford, under Henry I. Selden. Preface to the Poly-olbion.

Whereas actual discovery (as it were) rifles and deflowres the newness and freshness of the object, and so for the most part, makes it cheap, familiar and contemptible.

South. Sermons, vol. i. p. 24.

He is ever a thief and robber of his good name, a deflowrer and defiler of his reputation, an assassine and murtherer of his honour. Barrow. Sermon 18. vol. i. DEF DEI

Mothers, and guardian aunts, forbear
Your impious pains to form the fair,
Nor lay out so much cost and art.
But to deflow'r the virgin heart.
Green. The Spleen.

DEFLO'W, DEFLU'ENCY, DEFLU'X, DEFLU'XION. Defluere, xum, to flow down; (de, and fluere, A. S. flow-en, to flow.) See CONFLOW.

It is rather a collection of some superfluous matter defluing from the body.

Sir Thomas Brown. Vulgar Errors, book iii. ch. iv.

Barly meale either raw or boiled, doth discusse and resolve, assuage and ripen, all impostumes engendered either by way of gathering and collection of humors, or by some defluxe and rheumatike descent. Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. fol. 138.

When I landed in Venice, after so long a sea voyage from Spain, I was afraid the same defluxion of salt rheum, which fell from my temples into my throat in Oxford, and distilling upon the uvula, impeach'd my utterance a little to this day, had found the same channel again.

Howell. Letter 1. book i. sec. ii.

The contained water was so far expanded by congelation, that it not only thrust up the corks, but the cold had taken away the defluency of the oil.

Boyle. Experimental History of Cold. Tit. 21.

When a sharp defluxion hath endangered the sight of the eye, I have seen it oftentimes suddenly diverted by raising a blister in the pit of the neck behind, and drawing off the moisture that way.

Id. Letters from Several Persons, vol. vi. p. 347.

I have received a letter from Balbus, wherein he excuses himself for not giving me an account of Antony's intentions concerning the law I inquired after; because he has gotten, it seems, a violent defluction upon his eyes.

Melmoth. Cicero. Letter 8. book xii.

DEFŒDATION, Lat. fœdus, foul. Of uncertain origin. "Fr. defedation; a fowling, soyling, filing, defiling, staining, spotting of." Cotgrave.

Nor then be confident; successive crops
Of defœdations oft will spot the skin:
These thou, with turpentine and guaiac pods,
Reduc'd by coction to a wholesome draught,
Total remove, and give the blood its balm.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book iv.

DEFOIL, de, and folium, a leaf. To strip off the leaves.

Over and beside in disburgening and defoiling a vine, you must beware how you pluck off those burgeons that are like to beare the grape, or to go with it. Holland. Plinie.

DEFORCE, to deprive by force, q. v. "Fr. deforcer; to disseise, dispossess, violently take, forcibly pluck from." Cotgrave.

This Lowys, as affermeth the Frenshe Cronycle, maryed the doughter of Guy, Erle of Cotcheforde, the which after, for nerynesse of kynne, was deforced from the sayd Lowys, to y^e^ great displeasure of the sayd Erle Guy. Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 215.

Putting and establishing armed men in townes, castels, and other places to defend the land against him, to deforce him of his fee. Holinshed. Edward I. Anno 1296.

In levying a fine of lands, the person, against whom the fictitious action is brought upon a supposed breach of covenant, is called the deforciant. And, lastly, by way of analogy, keeping a man by any means out of a freehold office is construed to be a deforcement: though, being an incorporeal hereditament, the deforciant has no corporeal possession.

Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. iii. p. 174.

DEFORM.

DEFO'RM, v.
DEFO'RM, adj.
DEFORMA'TE, adj.
DEFORMA'TION,
DEFO'RMED,
DEFO'RMEDLY,
DEFO'RMER,
DEFO'RMITY,
DIFFO'RMITY.

Fr. deformer; Sp. desformar; It. difformare; Lat. deformare; de, and forma, which Tooke thinks is the A.S. frem-an, facere, to frame, by a common transposition of the R.

To strip or spoil of the form, shape or figure; to take it away, to disfigure, to deface.

Difformity, in Beveridge, is equivalent to Non-conformity.

Deformed is the figure of my face,
To loke on it no people hath liking.
Chaucer. The Complaint of Creseide, fol. 197.

——— Then rose she up and toke
A polished glasse, and her shadowe couth loke
And whan she sawe her visage so deformate
If she in hart were wo, I ne wite God wate.
Id. Ib. fol. 196.

For other haue their ful shap and beauty
And we (qd. they) ben in deformity.
Id. The Court of Loue, fol. 354.

He beseched the Scottish kyng that frō thēce foorth he woulde not afflicte and plage his people, nor deforme and deface his naturall realme and countrey with such terrible fyer, flame, and hauocke. Hall. Henry VII. The eleventh Yere.

No man that is deformed of the seed of Aaron the prieste, shall come nye to offer the sacrifices of the Lorde. Yf he haue a deformite, he shall not preace to offer the breade of hys God.
Bible, Anno 1551. Leuiticus, ch. xxi.

Their fell contention still increased more,
And more thereby increased Furor's might,
That he his foe has hurt, and wounded sore,
And him in bloud and durt deformed quight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 5.

How oft do we neglect this bodies life,
And outward comely plight, for to adorn
Our soul with virtuous ornaments? and strive
To fat our mind with truth, while it's forlorn,
Squallid, half-nasty, pallid, wan, deform.
More. On the Soul, part ii. book iii. ch. ii. st. 41.

ANSW. I confesse 'tis hard in some sense, i. e. to them that suffer under you for being hereticks, (as you call those that depart from your deformations) and for being invaders, (which all may at pleasure be called,) that are not able to resist.
Hammond. Works. A View of the Apology, vol. ii. fol. 617.

And now thir mightiest quell'd, the battel swerv'd
With many an inrode gor'd; deformed rout
Enter'd, and foul disorder.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book vi. l. 387.

We do injuriously in thinking to taste better the pure Evangelic manna, by seasoning our mouths with the tainted scraps and fragments of an unknown table, and searching among the verminous and polluted rags dropt over-worn from the toiling shoulders of time, with these deformedly to quilt and interlace the entire, the spotless, and undecaying robe of truth, the daughter not of time, but of heaven. Id. Of Prelatical Episcopacy.

A matter, indeed, so distastiue for me to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very soule to fill the pen with inke, or to blot the paper with these black spots of darknesse, and deformers of England's faire face.
Speed. King James, book x. ch. i. sec. 31.

To reduce our worship, &c. now into the pattern of the first four or five hundred years, (which is the plausible pretence of our new deformers,) is to bring Popery again in by the same degrees now, as it at first crept in by.
Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 129.

——— If every thing
Be not done fitly and in proportion,
To satisfy wise and good lookers on,
Since most men be such as most think they be
They're lothsome too by this deformity.
Donne. Funeral Elegies. The first Anniversary.

So parting summer bids her flowery prime
Attend the sun to dress some foreign clime,
While withering seasons in succession, here,
Strip the gay gardens, and deform the year.
Parnell. To an Old Beauty.

DEFORM. — DEFRAUD.

For one or two good virtues in a face,
Where all the rest are scandalously ill,
Make it but more remarkably deform'd.
Roscommon. Horace. Art of Poetry.

I might add, that the works of nature, the better lights and glasses you use, the more clearer and exactly form'd they appear; whereas the effects of human art, the more curiously they are view'd and examin'd, the more of deformity they discover.
Ray. On the Creation, part i.

And this difformity to the will and nature of God is that we call sin, or which the word sin, in its proper notion, brings into my mind. Beveridge. Private Thoughts, art. 2.

Monsters, on the contrary, or what is perfectly deformed, are always most singular and odd, and have the least resemblance to the generality of that species to which they belong.
Smith. Moral Sentiments, part v. ch. i.

——— There was discord, prowess there,
There hot pursuit, and there the feature grim
Of Gorgon, dire deformity, a sign
Oft borne portentous on the arm of Jove.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book v.

DEFO'UL, DEFO'ULING. See DEFILE, above. To dirty, to pollute, to corrupt, to contaminate. See an Example of the noun Defouling in v. Deflour, from Hall.

He hupte hym vp fram þe bord, in gret wraþþe ynou,
And hente þys Lof by þe top, fram the borde hym drou,
An defouled hym vnder hym myd honde, & myd fote.
R. Gloucester, p. 277.

I haue leuer þat þou do me to dethe, þen defowle my body, þat I have made a woo to kepe in maydon hede, whille þat I lyue, to my Lorde Jhesu Criste. R. Brunne, p. 197. Preface.

Heere ye and undirstonde, That thing that entrith into the mouth defoulith not a man, but that thing that comith out of the mouth defoulith a man. Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xv.

For which thing I deme hem that of hethene men ben convirtid to God to be not diseesid, but to write to hem, that thei absteyne hem fro defoulingis of mawmetis.
Id. The Dedis of Apostlis, ch. xv.

Wel ought a wif rather hireselven sle
Than be defouled, as it thinketh me.
Chaucer. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11708.

And after when they be defoyled againe by sinne, they be agayne clensed, purged, and made fayre, by grace & perdon of God and the sacramēt of penaunce, and other holy sacraments taking their effect, strength, and vertue of Christes passion.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 771. Confutacion of Freere Barnes Church.

Where, when they saw that goodly boy, with blood
Defouled, and their lady dresse his wound,
They wondred much.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 5.

But yet some mad fooles say (for to eschew slaunder,) they will be shriuen once in the yeare, and communed of their proper priests, though they know them defouled of slaunderous vices.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 500. Prelates and Priests negligent in their Duty.

DEFRA'UD,
DEFRAUDA'TION,
DEFRA'UDER,
DEFRA'UDING,
DEFRA'UDMENT.

Fr. defrauder; Sp. defraudar; It. and Lat. defraudare, to take away by fraud; de, and fraud-are. Of uncertain origin.

To take away by fraud, by deceit, by guile; to cheat.

DE-FRAUD. — DEFRAY.

But Sache stood: and seide to the Lord, lo Lord, I geue the half of my good to pore men, and if I haue ony thing defraudid ony man: I yelde foure so myche.
Wiclif. Luk, ch. xix.

He besought, Pallas and Juno
And Diane, for to helpe also
That he be not defrauded of his boone.
Chaucer. The Story of Thebes, part i. fol. 372.

When the saied Cardinall, had forfeited all his good, because of prouision, as the statute therevpon more plainly declareth, by hauing the rule of you my right doubted Lorde, [he] purchased hymselfe, in greate defraudacion of your highnes, a charter of pardon. Hall. Henry VI. The twentieth Yere.

To denye this right yf eyther of bothe aske it, is a defraudyng, for not onlye suche defraude, whiche pay not the money, that they are bound to paye, but such also, as refuse to doe, that they are bound to do. Udall. 1 Corinthians, ch. vii.

——— They all did so conspire
To stand out fortune, that not one would go,
To bear away a hand from blood, not one,
Defraud the field of th' evil might be done?
Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book viii.

To this is to be applied that which here follows in this place, why do ye not rather suffer injury and defraudation? i. e. it is more Christian and excellent to do so.
Hammond. Works, vol. iii. fol. 529. Annotations on Corinthians, ch. vi. ep. 1.

I onely observe this one thing, that St. Paul permits it [going to law] onely in the instance of defraudation, or matter of interest; such as are defending of widowes and orphans, and churches, which, in estimation of law, are by way of fiction reckoned to be in pupillage and minority.
Taylor. Holy Life, part ii. Of Law-suits.

That immediately after the choice of any new duke, in the next grand council, shall be openly rehearsed all former degrees against defrauders of the publick chests.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 257.

Thirdly, he forbids rapines, defraudyngs, gaining to ourselves by other man's losses.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 145. Of the Reasonableness of the Christian Religion.

If Cæsar to his own his hand extends,
Say which of your's his charity offends:
You know he largely gives to more than are his friends.
Are you defrauded when he feeds the poor?
Our mite decreases nothing of your store.
Dryden. The Hind and Panther, part iii.

Loose wits, made wise, a public good become,
The sons of pride an humble mien assume;
The profligate in morals grows severe,
Defrauders just, and sycophants sincere.
Blackmore. Creation, book ii.

Godlike Achilles, valiant as thou art,
Wouldst thou be subtle too? But me no fraud
Shall overreach, or art persuade, of thine.
Wouldst thou, that thou be recompens'd, and I
Sit meekly down defrauded of my due?
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book i.

Here the great masters of the healing art,
These mighty mock defrauders of the tomb,
Spite of their juleps and catholicons,
Resign to fate. Blair. The Grave.

DEFRA'Y, DEFRA'YER, DEFRA'YING, DERA'YMENT. } Fr. defrayer. Fraiz, (of which Skinner says, quod si a Lat. paratus,) is—costs, expenses, charges. To defray, is used as equivalent to—

To bear, pay or settle the costs, charges or expenses; to discharge them.

It may admit a conjecture, that fray in defray and affray, are the same word; that defray is the reverse of affray; and signifies to compose or settle a fray, debate or dispute; and thus, to settle damages, costs or charges.

And hereupon, we were of necessitie enforced to bestowe in giftes a great part of those things which were giuen vs by well disposed people, to defray our charges. DEI
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Tartars, vol. i. fol. 60. DE I

[The King] received him [the Emperor of Constantinople] as beseemed so great a Prince, and brought him to London, and roially entertained him for a long season, defraying the charges of his diet, and giuing him many honourable presents.
Id. Ib. Henry IV. vol. ii. part i. fol. 71.

He received 20,000 per ann. by way of imprest, for the ordinary charge only of that office; which a far less sum would have fully defrayed.
State Trials. Proceedings against the Lord Treasurer Middleton.

For since the time of the wars of the Medes, unto the beginning of the war of Peloponnesus, in all the registers and records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common plays, there were found but two men bearing name of Aristides that obtained victory.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 273. Aristides.

Ptolemei appointed him [Lucullus] his lodging, and his table at court, which was never before known to be done to any foreign commander, and for the discharge of his expenses, and defraying his cost, he allowed him not as usually he did to others, but four times as much. Usher. Annals, Anno Mundi 3918.

That the king of Spaine should lade eight cars with wedges of gold for the duke, or (as some write) pay two hundreth thousand nobles, towards the defrayment of the duke's huge charges.
Speed. Richard II. book ix. ch. xiii. sec. 85.

He feared Cromwell might apprehend a necessity of using me with more severity than he wished; and, to soften this delay, gave a warrant for a sum of money to me, for defraying my expenses while I staid, together with those of my journey to London.
Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 80.

The enormous expence of the late war, therefore, must have been chiefly defrayed, not by the exportation of gold and silver, but by that of British commodities of some kind or other.
Smith. Wealth of Nations, book iv. ch. i.

DEFT, DE'FTLY, DE'FTNESS. } A. S. dæfe, meet, fit, convenient, meetly. Dæflice, fitly, conveniently, seasonably, in good time, commodiously. Somner. See DEFFLY.

——— A laughter neuer left,
Shook all the blessed deities, to see the lame so deft
At that cup service.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book i. fol. 13.

——— ——— But far she hath not gone,
When Ivel, a clear nymph, from Shefford sallying on,
Comes deftly dancing in thro' many a dainty slade.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 22.

By her, two little isles, her handmaids (which compar'd
With those within the Pool, for deftness not out-dar'd)
The greater Haling hight.
Id. Ib. song 2.

The wanton calf may skip with many a bound,
And my cur Tray play deftest feats around.
Gay. The Shepherd's Week. Monday.

Hawkins, whose lips the Muses have imbued
With all the sweetness of th' Aonian spring;
Whom emuling I deftly learn'd to sing,
And smoother tune my numbers round and rude.
Edwards, son. 16. To J. H. Browne, Esq.

Or if ye ween, for worldly stirs,
That man does right to mar his rest,
Let me be deft, and debonair,
I am content, I do not care.
Byrom. Careless Content.

DEFTER-DAR, or BOOK-KEEPER, is the Title given by the Turks to the Ministers in the Finance department. There was originally only one officer bearing that Title, in the whole Empire; but in later times, the number of Defter-dárs was increased from three to nine, who were classed in two divisions. The ancient system has now, however, been restored, and there are only three, styled Defter-dári shikki evvel, Sáni, and Salis, (Treasurers of the first, second, and third class;) the first of whom is the Turkish Chancellor of the Exchequer and first Lord of the Treasury; the others acting only as his Deputies, and under his orders. His public office is held in a large building, situated between the Seraglio (Serâi) and the Grand Vezir's Díván-kháneh, or Hall of Audience. It is divided into twenty-seven different Chambers, over each of which a different Khójah, or head Clerk presides, having several Khalífahs, (Deputies,) Kátibs, (Secretaries,) and Shágirds, (Clerks,) under his orders. The business of every branch of the Revenue, direct and indirect, with the exception of the Sultán's Privy Purse, is transacted in this office.

DEFTERDAR. — DEFUNCT.

Von Hanmer, Osmanischen Reich Staatsverfassung, i. 92, ii. 142; Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire; Mouradgea d'Ohsson, Tableau Général de l'Empire Ottoman.

DEFU'NCT, adj. / DEFU'NCT, n. / DEFU'NCTION, / DEFU'NCTIVE. — Lat. defunctus; (de, and fungi, functus.) There is in this word, says Vossius, the notion of perfecting and bringing to an end, (ad finem,) and hence (from finis) some Etymologists suppose it to be derived. Defunctus est vitâ, id est, finivit officium vitæ. In English it is used as equivalent to Dead, deceased, departed from life.

After that all thynges necessary, for the interment and funerall pōpe of the late kyng were sumpteously prepared and done: the corps of the said defunct, was brought out of his priuie chambre, into the great chāber.

Hall. Henry VIII. The firste Yere.

What, shall thy lubricall and glibberie Muse
Live as she were defunct.

Ben Jonson. Poctaster, act v. sc. 3.

Recommending the defunct, that is, him who hath performed all the duties of life, as one who shall enjoy the everlasting conversation of pious souls.

Translation of Plato's Apology of Socrates, &c. (1675,) p. 295.

In the anthems, versicles, and responses, there are prayers made recommending to God the soul of the newly defunct, praying he may be freed from hell, and eternal death, that in the day of judgment he be not judged and condemned according to his sins, but that he may appear among the elect in the glory of the resurrection; but not one word of purgatory, or its pains.

Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 295. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. sec. 4.

The former [invention of arts and sciences] of these I report to be wholly deficient, which seems to me to be such a deficience, as if in the making of an inventory touching the estate of a defunct, it should be set downe, of ready money nothing: for as money will fetch all other commodities; so all other arts are purchas'd by this art. Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book iv. ch. ii.

Nor did the French possesse the Salike land,
Vntill foure hundred one and twentie yeeres
After defunction of King Pharamond,
Idly suppos'd the founder of this law.

Shakspeare. Henry V. fol. 70.

Let the priest in surplice white,
That defunctive music can,
Be the death-divining swan,
Lest the requiem lack his right.

Id. The Passionate Pilgrim, 20.

Seeing the soul of man is permanent, and subsists after the death of the body, and yet the body also belongs essentially to the constitution of man; when the body is defunct, either the soul must remain perpetually in a state of separation, and, as it were, of widowhood, or the body must be recalled to life, and again united to it.

Bishop Bull. Works, vol. i. p. 39.

Cause all executors of the deceased, and the widows and kindred of such as are departed intestate, living within the city and diocese of Norwich, to appear, and produce the testaments and last wills of the said defuncts.

Strype. Life of Parker, Anno 1567.

DE-FUNCT. — DEFY.

I cannot, however, forbear adding, that the people were extremely solicitous concerning the fate of Sulla, till the news of his death was confirmed; but now that they are assured of the fact, they are no longer inquisitive how it happened; well contented with the intelligence that he is undoubtedly defunct.

Melmoth. Cicero. Letter 18. book x.

It might, indeed, be considered as an infringement of liberty, if they were to assume a right to dictate the manner of an epitaph; but to reform the style, and to prevent the appearance of ridiculous and ungrammatical inscriptions, would be to consult the honour of the defunct, and of the surviving friend.

V. Knox. Winter Evenings, even. 38.

DEFUSEDLY,—confusedly; see CONFUSE.

Finallie (sauing that I saw afterward the image of a naked man grasping a serpent in each hand,) there was an inscription of a toomb or buriall wherein these words did plainelie appeare, "Vixit annos xxx:" but so defusedlie written, that letters stood for whole words, and two or three letters combined into one.

Holinshed. Description of Ireland, ch. xxii.

DEFY', v. / DEFY', n. / DEFI'ANCE, / DEFI'ER. — Fr. desfier, and defier; It. sfidare, and disfidare; Low Lat. diffidare, and diffiduciare. Omnia fidem apertè resonantia. Diffidare est fidei vinculum solvere, quod prius aliquando affidare connexerat. Spelman. See AFFY.

To renounce, refuse, deny or reject affiance, i. e. faith given, placed or reposed; and, consequently, to proclaim independence, hostility; to challenge. Also, simply, to deny, renounce or refuse.

Edmunde bi messengers þe erle he diffies.

R. Brunne, p. 46.

This was her song: The fowler we defie
And all his craft.

Chaucer. The Prologue.

For I defie the suretee and the bond,
Which that thou saist that I have made to thee.

Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 1606.

And the Philistine sayde: I haue defyed the hoost of Israel this daye, geue me a man and let vs fight together.

Bible, Anno 1551. 1 Kings, ch. xvii.

Your pleasant looke, my very lode sterre
Was made a heraude of thilke same defiaunce,
Which vtterly behight me for to barre,
My faithfull trust, and all mine affiaunce.

Chaucer. La belle Dame sans Marcie, fol. 252.

The king of Fraunce hearing the fauour that was shewed vnto the Emperour, sent imediatly a defiaunce vnto our king, not without our cardinal's and bishop's counsell thou mayst well wite.

Tyndall. Workes, fol. 371. The Practice of Popish Prelates.

O. E. BOL. Not for the world: since I have lost my sons,
All outward joys are from my heart remov'd:
Vain pleasures I abhor, all things I defy,
That teach not to despair, or how to die.

Heywood. The Four Prentices of London.

PAR. I do defie thy commisseration,
And apprehend thee for a fellon here.

Shakspeare. Romeo and Juliet, fol. 75.

And calling unto him a herald, quoth he, fly
To th' Earl of Le'ster's tents, and publickly proclaim
Defiance to his face, and to the Mountford's name.

Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 22.

——— Brief I am
To those that prate, and have done; no companion
To those that boast and have not; a defyer
To those that would and cannot.

Beaumont and Fletcher. The Two Noble Kinsmen, act v. sc. 1.

DEFY — DE-GENER.

My bane and antidote are both before me:
This in a moment brings me to an end,
But this informs me I shall never die.
The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.
Addison. Cato, act v. sc. 1.

Will not God visit us for these things? Will he not some time or other call us to a sad account for this open and scandalous violation and defiance of his most sacred fundamental laws, by which the world is governed and doth subsist.
Sharp. Works. Discourse 8. vol. vi.

They [the best men] are for God's sake made the spectacles of extreme misery, whilst the insolent defiers of his majesty and laws enjoy all visible felicities.
Bates. On the Existence of God, &c. ch. xi.

From motives of vanity, health and peace are sacrificed, fortunes lavished without credit or enjoyment, every relative and personal duty neglected, and religion boldly set at defiance.
V. Knox. Essays, No. 2.

But these defiers of sleep seem not to remember, that though it must be granted them that they are crawling about before the break of day, it can seldom be said that they are perfectly awake; they exhaust no spirits, and require no repairs.
Johnson. The Adventurer, No. 39.

DEGE'NER, v.
DEGE'NERATE, v.
DEGE'NERATE, adj.
DEGE'NERATELY,
DEGE'NERATENESS,
DEGENERA'TION,
DEGE'NERACY,
DEGE'NEROUS,
DEGE'NEROUSLY.

Fr. degenerer; Sp. degenerar; It. degenerare; Lat. degenerare; de, and generare, formed from Gr. γέν-ειν, to beget, to bear. Degener, verb, is used by some of our old writers. In the passage from Spenser, some editions read Dejender.

To grow out of kind, be unlike his ancestors, (Cotgrave,) to be inferior to them; to become of a worse or baser nature or kind.

Man when he was in honour he vnderstode it not, wherefore he degenereth into beastlynes. Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. iv.

The Gortnans came next, which sometime folowed the Mediãs out of Euboia: but at those dayes degenerated from their country customes. Brende. Quintus Curtius, book iv. fol. 85.

The which thing declareth moste euidently that men whiche haue caste downe their myndes, hope and iudgemen, from the dignitie and excellencye of their nature, are so degenerat and growen out of kinde, that thei seeme vtterly to be brute beastes.
Calsine. Foure Godlye Sermons, serm. 3.

So that next off-spring of the Maker's loue,
Next to himselfe in glorious degree,
Degenering to hate, fell from aboue
Through pride, (for pride and loue may ill agree.)
Spenser. An Hymn of Heauenly Loue.

And if then those may any worse be red,
They into that ere long will be degenered.
Id. Faerie Queene, book v. Of Justice, st. 2.

Though God, nor what he crav'd was then not knowne,
Yet of religion a degener'd seed
Industrious nature in each heart had sowen;
Which fruits (though wilde) did in abundance breed.
Stirling. Doomes-day. The fifth Hour.

The spotlesse lillies shew his pure intent,
The flaming marigold his zeale present,
The purple violets his noble minde,
Degen'rate neuer from his princely kind.
Beaumont. On the Death of Edward Stafford.

For nothing now-a-days is more degenerately forgotten, than the true dignity of man, almost in every respect, but especially in this prime institution, matrimony, wherein his native preeminence ought most to shine. Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

Neither does it at all check or interfere with any parties in a state or religion; but is indifferently to be embraced by all differences in opinion, and can hardly be conceived capable (as many good institutions have done,) even of degeneration unto any thing harmful. Cowley. Essays. The Scheol.

We incline rather, to excuse the generality of the first and most ancient Stoicks from the imputation of atheism, and to account this form of atheism which we now speak of, to be but a certain degeneracy from the right Heraclitick and Zenonian cabala.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 133.

Which public death (receiv'd with such a chear,
As not a sigh, a look, a shrink bewrays
The least felt touch of a degenerous fear,)
Gave life to envy, to his courage praise.
Daniel. History of the Civil Wars, book i.

Gassendus hath excellently performed it, and, I am confident, to the conviction of those, whom nobler principles have not yet emancipated from that degenerous slavery.
Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatising, ch. xvi.

How wounding a spectacle is it to see heroes, like Hercules, at the distaff, thus degenerously employed.
Decay of Piety.

How fair and sweet the planted rose
Beyond the wild in hedges grows!
For, without art, the noblest seeds
Of flowers degenerate into weeds.
Butler. The Lady's Answer to Hudibras.

It were happy for us if we could say, that all the Lord's people are holy; for then we should have nothing to do, but to praise and commend their virtues, which were an easy and a delightful task; but what pleasure is it to rake into the sores, or to reprove the vices of a degenerate age.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 3. vol. ii.

This upbraids our degeneration and apostacy, that we who are most indebted to the goodness of our Creator, should prove disloyal and rebellious, when the inferior creatures with one consent serve and glorify him.
Bates. Miscellaneous Sermons, serm. 1. On the Existence of God.

1. There was plainly wanting a Divine Revelation, to recover mankind out of their universal corruption and degeneracy; and without such a revelation, it was not possible the world should ever be effectually reformed.
Clarke. On Natural and Revealed Religion.

The base and degenerous saying of one them [Epicureans] is very well known; that life is always sweet, and he should still desire to prolong it; though, after he had been maimed and distorted by the rack, he should lastly be condemn'd to hang on a gibbet. Bentley. Sermon 1.

Popery is the most degenerate form of Christianity that can be conceived, and lays a heavier yoke upon the necks of Christians than the Scribes and the Pharisees ever imposed upon the Jews.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

I am apt to think, that in monarchial governments there is a source of improvement, and in popular governments a source of degeneracy, which in time will bring these species of polity still nearer an equality. Hume. Essay 12.

DEGHOMBAH, (spelt Dagwumba by Mr. Bowdich,) is a considerable and important, and hitherto unexplored territory in the Central Súdán, (Nigritia.) It was first known in Europe through Mr. Lucas, who set out from Tripoli, under the patronage of the African Association, with the intention of penetrating into the interior, but was prevented, by the war between the Arab tribes in the Ghâriyán Mountains and the troops of the Báshá, from entering the desert which separates the Páshálic of Tripoli from Fezzán. He had, however, the good fortune to meet with an intelligent communicative Sherîf, or descendant of the Prophet, named after his revered ancestor, Mohammed, who had travelled as a Slave-factor of the Sultán of Fezzán almost to the Coast of Guinea. (Proceedings of the Afric. Ass., i. 331.)

Kalanshee, (probably Coransah, a Province of Ashantí, about seventy miles north-northeast of Kumási, according to Mr. Bowdich,) was the termination of Mohammed's journeyings southwards; and, as a DEGHOMBAH. long time had elapsed since he last visited those remote regions, his bearings and distances were very incorrect; though most of the names mentioned by him, have appeared in itineraries since collected from native traders in different parts of the Peninsula. He spoke of Deghombah as a Mohammedan kingdom, distinguished by the skill of its inhabitants in taming elephants; and described the whole country to the south of a large river called the Níl-el-âbíd, (Slave's Nile,) as too mountainous for camels, and only fit for horses and mules. The Gúrú nuts, apparently its staple production, and an abundance of horses and cattle, were mentioned as the principle articles of trade next to slaves, in which all the Mohammedan States of Africa traffic.

Nothing more was known respecting Deghombah till the inquiries of Mr. Bowdich in 1817; and Mr. Dupuis in 1820 at Kumásí, much nearer to the country in question, ascertained the following particulars. Deghombah lies between Bambárah and Fillaní (Fulládú?) on the north, and Ghunjah on the south, Sárena on the west, and Yarrabah on the east. Yándí, its Capital, is in 8° 38′ north and 55′ west, according to Mr. Bowdich; but in 9° 40′ north and 1° 10′ east, according to Mr. Dupuis; their calculations, however, are built on a very insecure basis, viz. wretched itineraries made from recollection, with little or no attention to bearings, and it will probably turn out that the place lies further to the south and west, and is nearer to the sea than either of those writers supposed.

The greatest length of Deghombah from north to south amounts to 160 miles, and its breadth from east to west is nearly 300. The Capital, Yándí, is said to be four times as large as Kumásí, and is celebrated for its wealth and manufactures. The inhabitants carry on a constant commercial intercourse with their neighbours, especially to the north and west. "None of the Arab tribes ever penetrated so far to the south," said Mr. Dupuis's informers, "but before the VIIth century of the Hejrah, (i. e. before A. D. 1200,) these countries had been invaded, and probably converted by the Musulmán Princes on the Ghulbí, (Níl-el-âbíd.)" This, however, is not very probable, as Idrísí knew of no Mohammedan State to the south of that river.

One of the staple productions of Deghombah is, it seems, the Kola or Gúrú (pronounced Gorò or Ngworò, by the people of Gúber;) the bean of the Sterculia acuminata, (Palissot de Beauvois, Flore d'Oware et de Benin, i. 41. tab. 24,) so much esteemed by the Negroes. (Brande's Journal of Science, &c. No. 27. Oct. 1822; Annals of Orient. Lit. 537; and Proceed. Afr. Assoc. i. 329.) It is, therefore, probable, that the soil, climate, and level may be similar to those of the mountains behind Sierra Leone, where this Sterculia is also found, and that Deghombah is on the eastern, as Futa Jállon is on the western declivity of the Mountains of Kong; a conjecture strengthened by the account of Mohammed Misrí, (Brande's Journal, No. 27,) who spoke of Deghombah as a beautiful and fertile country, with lofty mountains on the horizon to the west.

It is divided into the Provinces of Ghombah, Ghobagho, Simmer, and Tonúmah, (Tonúwah of Sheriff Mohammed?) and at Ng-wà (Aughoa of Dupuis,) on its north-west frontier, a dialect is used which differs a little from that of the Capital. The numerals, as deduced from Mr. Bowdich's Table, (505. Nos. 12, 13, 15, 16,) are probably as follows: 1. Yán-bo; 2. Ayí; 3. Atà; 4. Nasì; 5. Enún; 6. Yóbí; 7. Póí; 8. Nehí or Nehí-nú; 9. Waïhí; 10. Píghá. The same language is spoken in Músí, to the north-west of Deghombah, and in Kumsallahoo, supposed to be further to the north-west. These numerals do not appear to have an affinity with those of any other African nations, except it be the Ayís to the north of Dà-hómé and the people of Wídáh, who speak the Dà-hómean language; but in those instances, the resemblance is so faint as to be scarcely admissible. DEGHOMBAH. DEGRADE

Since the conquest of Ghofan by the Ashantís, the Adirré or Bahr-as-wad (Rio da Volta) seems to be the boundary separating their territory on the north-west from that of Deghombah.

If it were allowable to assign an Arabic origin to that name, it might be derived from Dà 'l combah, or Dá-combah, the Pimento Country; for combah, or cánbeh, as Mr. Browne and the French Savans in Egypt observed, is the native term for the Uvaria aromatica of Lamarck, which is the Piper Æthiopicum of the older Botanists; but in Africa, the Arabic letter cáf is pronounced like a hard g, and in their handwriting is easily mistaken for ghaïr (gh;) hence, Combah might easily be read Ghombah: Combah, or Gombah and Kambah, occur also as names of Provinces in this and the neighbouring kingdom. As Mr. Dupuis's informers were manifestly very imperfectly acquainted with Arabic, and as he himself has made some most extraordinary mistakes, (for example, Magharab-el-wasa for Maghárab-el-asca,) it is not unreasonable to suppose that many deductions on the score of misinterpretation must be made from his accounts, though his power of conversing, even in broken Arabic, with the people from the interior, gave him a very great advantage over Mr. Bowdich.

(Proceedings of the African Association, 1791, 8 vols; Bowdich's Mission to Ashantee, London, 1819, 4to; Dupuis's Journal of a Residence in Ashantee, London, 1824.)

DEGLORY; de, and glory. Dishonoured.

> And with small stars a garland interchast
> Of olive-leaves they bore to crown his head,
> That was before with thorns degloried.
> G. Fletcher. Christ's Triumph after Death.

DEGLUTITION, Fr. degloutir; Lat. deglutire, to swallow; de, and glutire: gluttus, (Gr. γλωττις,) that part of the neck by which the food is transmitted; formed from the sound, glut, glut, which liquor makes when running through a narrow neck or passage. Vossius.

A swallowing.

> So, for instance, the tongue serves not only for tasting, but also to assist the mastication of the meat and deglutition, by turning it about and managing it in the mouth.
> Ray. On the Creation, part ii.

> We cannot easily swallow whilst we gape. This I understand, is owing to the muscles employed in the act of deglutition being so implicated with the muscles of the lower jaw, that, whilst these last are contracted, the former cannot act with freedom.
> Paley. On Natural Theology, ch. ix.

DEGRA'DE, DEGRADA'TION, DEGRA'DEMENT, DEGRA'DINGLY. Fr. disgrader; It. disgradare; Sp. desgraduar, gradu dejicere, to cast down from his rank or degree. Sometimes written Disgrade.

To deject, throw or cast down, sub. from a higher rank or state to a lower; to deprive of honorary rank or title; to disgrace, to dishonour.

DE-GRADE. — DEGRA-DATION.

Els let vs degrade hym, and delyuer him, and let the princes keep him from the people.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 624. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

Disgradinge those bishops and abbots whom the French kinge and emperor had made. Bale. English Votaries, part ii.

The ix. yere aboute Mydlent, a preest named Sir Thomas Bagley, and vicar of a vyllage in Essex, called Mauendēn, a lytell from Walden, was detect of heresy, vpon the whiche he was degrated, & brent in the place of Smithfelde.

Fabyan, Anno 1531.

They coulde not also deny but that forthwith vpon this iugement and hys degradacion, he kneled downe before the byshoppes chauncellour in the presence of all the people, & humbli besought him of absolucion fro the sentence of excommunicacion.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 349. The second Part of the Confutation of Tyndall.

These two [Censores] had power and authority to disgrade a a knight, by taking away his horse, and to put any off the senate, whom they saw live dissolutely and disorderly.

North. Plutarch. Marcus Cato, fol. 296.

And what can we suffer, wherein he hath not gone before us even in the same kind? Was he not degraded when they scornfully put on him a purple robe, a reed into his hand, a thorny crown upon his head, saluting him with, Hail, King of the Jews! and so disrobed him again?

State Trials. Proceedings against Bastwick, Burton, and Prynne.

He bore the diminution very well, as he was a wise man, and an excellent temper; and quickly recover'd so much grace, that he was made Earl of Manchester, and Lord Privy Seal, and enjoy'd that office to his death; whilst he saw many removes, and degradations, in all the other offices of which he had been possess'd.

Clarendon. History of the Civil Wars, vol. i. part i. p. 54.

Not only by their deposing and waging war against him, which besides the danger to his personal life, set him in the farthest opposite point from any vital function of a king, but by their holding him in prison vanquished and yielded into their absolute and despotic power, which brought him to the lowest degradement and incapacity of the regal name.

Milton. The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

When William Sautre (who was the first that was put to death upon the account of heresy) was judged relapse by Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, in a convocation of his province, and thereupon was degraded from priesthood, and left to secular power; a writ was issued to burn him, which in the writ is called the customary punishment, (relating, it is like, to the customs that were beyond sea.)

Burnet. History of the Reformation, book i.

The lifting of a man's self up in his own opinion, has had the credit in former ages to be thought the lowest degradation that human nature could well sink itself to.

Locke. Sec. Vin. of Reasonableness of Christianity.

Moments there frequently must be, when a sinner is sensible of the degradation of his state; when he feels with pain the slavish dependence under which he is brought to fortune and the world, to violent passions and settled habits, and to fears and apprehensions arising from conscious guilt.

Blair. Sermon 10. vol. iv.

The Ecclesiastical censure by which a Clergyman is divested of his Holy Orders is termed DEGRADATION; the ceremonies attendant upon which punishment, consist chiefly in stripping him one by one of his Clerical vestments. Hoffman (ad voc.) has quoted some lines to this purpose from Διόπτρα seu Disputatio Animæ et Corporis.

Ὡσαύτως νόμον ἔχουσι ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις
Ἀρχιερεῖς, Ἐπίσκοποι συν τοις Μητροπολίταις,
Καὶ ὅταν παίσῃ Ἱερεὺς εἰς ἔγκλημα τι μέγα
Ἐν πρώτοις τούτῳ αἴρουσι τὴν στολὴν τῆς ἀξιάς
Καὶ οὕτως αὖθις σχίζουσι τοὺς χιτωνίσκους, ὅι μοι
Καὶ οὕτω τότε τὸν αὐτὸν ὡς μὴ παπᾶν κολάζειν.

In the Romish Church the person to be Degraded is presented to the officiating Priest (Pontifici) appointed to perform this ceremony, robed in his sacerdotal vestments, if he be in Priest's Orders; or with those of Deacon's, if in Deacon's Orders; and so of the other Orders. Then the officiator, in the presence of the secular Judge, to whom the party to be Degraded is to be consigned, publicè abradit cum vitro vel cultello, vel alio hujusmodi, leviter, sine sanguinis effusione, with a piece of glass, or with a pen-knife, publicly scratches (but slightly, so as not to fetch blood) those parts of his hands which had been anointed in the conferring of Orders. After which he divests the criminal, successively, and one by one, of all the insignia or sacred ornaments which he had received at the time of his taking Orders, and finally strips him of his clerical habit, putting on him a lay habit, and publicly telling the secular Judge, who is present, to take him under his jurisdiction if he chooses, since he is thus deposed, Degraded, and divested of authority. (Pontificale Romanum Clementis VIII. jussu editum, Romæ, 1595, folio, p. 628.) This is the general form. In pages 631 to 637 there are given the forms of Degrading the several Orders in the Romish Church, from Archbishops and Bishops down to the very door-keepers. DE DA

The solemn Degradation of a Clergyman, says Burn, (Eccl. Law, ii. 139,) was anciently performed in this manner, as is set forth in the book of the Decretals, vi. 5, 9, 2.

If the offender was a person in inferior Orders, then the Bishop of the Diocese alone, if in higher Orders, as Priest or Deacon, then the Bishop of the Diocese, together with a certain number of other Bishops, sent for the party to come before them. He was then brought in, having on his sacred robes, and having in his hands a book, vessel, or other instrument or ornament appertaining to his Order, as if he were about to officiate in his function. Then the Bishop publicly took away from him, one by one, the said instruments and vestments belonging to his office, saying to this effect: This, and this, we take from thee, and do deprive thee of the honour of the Priesthood; and, finally, in taking away the last sacerdotal vestment, saying thus, "By the authority of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and of us, we do take from thee the clerical habit, and do depose, Degrade, despoil, and deprive thee of all order, benefit, and privilege of the Clergy." Gibson's Codex, 1066.

On the arrival in England of the Decree of Pope Paul IV. which, among other things, commanded Cranmer to be Degraded, Strype says, "They apparelled the Archbishop in all the garments and ornaments of an Archbishop, only in mockery, every thing was of canvas and old clouts. And the crosier was put into his hand. And then he was, piece by piece, stript of all again." * * * When they came to take his crosier, he held it fast, and would not deliver it, but pulled an appeal out of his left sleeve under his wrist, and said, "I appeal unto the next general Council." Strype's Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 375, 376, folio edit.

Geliot, in his Indice Armoriel, gives a curious account of the ceremonies observed in the Degradation from Nobility of Franget, a Gascon Captain, who had surrendered Fontarabia in a cowardly manner, in the year 1523, under the reign of Francis I. Twenty or thirty Chevaliers sans reproche assembled at Lyons to hear the accusation of treason and breach of faith by a King at Arms; and, (although it is not so stated) as we suppose, to try and sentence the criminal. Two scaffolds were then erected: one for the Judges, assisted by Kings, Heralds, and Pursuivants at Arms; and another for the condemned Chevalier, who was armed at all points, and whose shield reversed was suspended on a stake before him. By his side were arrayed twelve Priests in their surplices, who chaunted the vigils of the dead; and at the pause after each Psalm the officers at arms divested the guilty Knight of some piece of his armour, beginning with the helmet, till he was entirely stripped. His shield was then broken into three pieces by a hammer, and the King at Arms poured a basin of hot water on his head. After this the Judges clad in deep mourning habits proceeded to the church. The criminal was let down from the scaffold by ropes fastened under his arms, and being placed on a bier covered with grave clothes, and escorted by the Priests chaunting a mass for the dead, was delivered to the Civil Judge and the executioner. His life, however, eventually was spared, since permission to live under the infamy of Degradation was considered a severer punishment than death itself.

Selden (Titles of Honour, ii. 5) relates the Degradation of Sir Anthony Harding, Earl of Carlisle, in the reign of Edward II. for treason. The award before judgment was, that he should be deceint del espèe et que vous esperouns d'orees soient coupez de talouns. According to the same authority, when Sir Ralph Grey was attainted for treason under Edward IV., the Earl of Worcester, High Constable, addressed him thus before judgment. "Sir Ralph Grey, for thy treason the King had ordained, that thou shouldst have had thy spurs stricken off by the hard heels, (hard by the heels?) by the hand of the Master Cook, who is here ready to do as was promised thee at the same time that he took off thy spurs, and said to thee as is accustomed; and thou be not true to thy Sovereign Lord, he shall smite off thy spurs with his knife hard by the heels;" and so showed him the Master Cook ready to do his office, with his knife. "Moreover, Sir Ralph Grey, the King hath ordained, here thou mayst see, the Kings of Arms and Heralds, and thine own proper Coat of Arms, which they should tear off thy body, and so shouldst thou as well be Degraded of thy Worship, Nobleness, and Armes, as of thy Order of Knighthood." This Degradation, however, was omitted on account of the good deeds of Sir Ralph Grey's grandfather.

The Church also had the right of inflicting temporary Degradation on a Knight, as appears from the following sentence issued by John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, together with the Bishop of Salisbury, as delegates in the year 1285, 13 Edward I., against Sir Osbert Gifford, for stealing two Nuns out of the Abbey of Wilton. He was never to enter a Nunnery, nor to be so much as in the presence of a Nun without an especial license from his Diocesan; he was to go thrice nudus in camisiâ et femoralibus, into Wilton Church, (but not, as Selden gravely adds, before the Nuns,) and there fustigari. So likewise in Salisbury Market and in Shaftesbury Church. Præterea insigniis militaribus interim sit privatus, nec Calcaria deaurata, nec Gladium, nec Sellam militarem aut deauratas faleras habiturus, nec vestes coloratas, sed tantummodo in Russeto, cum agninis pellibus vel ovinis, nec calceamenta nisi vaccina, nec utatur camisiâ postquam prædicto modo fuerit fustigatus. Et hæc omnia sibi injungemus in virtute præstiti juramenti, ut taliter extra militiam agat vitam, donec per triennium steterit personaliter et integrè in Terrâ Sanctâ, nisi infra triennium Dominus Rex Illustris ipsum revocandum dixerit ex gratiâ speciali, (ut supra from Regist. MS. 1; Peckham, Arch. Cant. fol. 119.)

DEGREE, Fr. degré; It. grado; Lat. gradus, a step. It is used by Chaucer literally for step; the step of a stair; a step by which to go up, to ascend.

A step; a step in progress, promotion, advancement; exaltation; as degree in rank; a step, distant or removed; degree in relationship; degree in measurement.

A seruitour þer was, þat serued at þe mete,
He stombled al a chance, & felle on his kne,
þorgh þe toþer schank he ros, & serued in his degre.
R. Brunne, p. 55.

——— Lordes children sholde serven
Bothe God and good men. as here degree askeþ.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 78.

For thei that mynystren wel schulen gete a good degree to himsilff and mych trist in the feith that is in Crist Iesu.
Wiclif. 1 Timothy, ch. iii.

Into that gardin, well wrought
Who so that me coud haue brought
By ladders, or els by degree
It would well haue liked me.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 118.

Round was the shape, in manere of a compas,
Ful of degrees, the hight of sixty pas,
That whan a man was set on o degree
He letted not his felaw for to see.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 1893.

His housing, his array as honestly
To his degree was marked as a king's.
Id. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9901.

For as the philosopher tolde
Of golde and siluer thei ben holde
Two principal extremitees,
To which all other by degrees
Of the metalls ben accordant.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 77.

But sithens it was our dutie to honour a man called to that degree of fortune, I beseech you am I gyltye because I could not gesse before that hee would offende.
Brende. Quintus Curtius, book vi. p. 165.

Take but degree away, vntune that string,
And hearke what discord followes: each thing meetes
In meere oppugnancie. The bounded waters,
Should lift their bosomes higher than the shores,
And make a ſoppe of all this solid globe:
Strength should be lord of imbecility,
And the rude sonne should strike his father dead:
Force should be right, or rather, right and wrong,
(Betwene whose endlesse iarre, Justice recides)
Should loose her names, and so should Justice too.
Shakspeare. Troylus and Cressida, fol. 82.

——— Great indeed
His name, and high was his degree in heav'n;
His count'nance, as the morning starr that guides
The starrie flock, allur'd them, and with lyes
Drew after him the third part of heaven's host.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book v. l. 707.

Sated at length, ere long I might perceave
Strange alteration in me, to degree
Of reason in my inward powers, and speech
Wanted not long, though to this shape retain'd.
Id. Ib. book ix. l. 599.

Since in general there are manifestly in things, various kinds of powers, and very different excellencies and degrees of perfection; it must needs be, that, in the order of causes and effects, the cause must always be more excellent than the effect: And consequently the self-existent being, whatever that be supposed to be, must of necessity (being the original of all things) contain in itself the sum and highest degree of all the perfection of all things. Clarke. On the Attributes, p. 51.

DEGREE. When I consider the vast quantity of ice we saw, and the vicinity of the places to the pole where it is formed, and where the degrees of longitude are very small, I am led to believe that these ice cliffs extend a good way into the sea, in some parts, especially in such as are sheltered from the violence of the winds.
Cook. Second Voyage round the World, book iv. ch. vii.

Dr. Brett has written a Dissertation on Degrees in the University, printed in No. 1, of the Censura Literaria, in which he shows that these Degrees were unknown till Universities were incorporated, and reduced to form in the XIth and XIIth centuries. (Dupin, Cent. XIII. 10.) Gregory IX., whose Pontificate lasted from 1227 to 1241, first distinguished Bachelors, Licentiates, (answering to our Masters,) and Doctors.

A good account of the origin of these honours will be found in the Antiquitates Rostochienses of Seb. Bacmeister, apud Monum. ined. Rer. Germ. per E. J. Westphalen, iii. 781. Robertson, in a note on his History of Charles V. (xxviii. sec. iii. p. 91, E E) states that "Doctors in the different faculties contended with Knights for precedence, and the dispute was terminated in many instances by advancing the former to the dignity of Knighthood.....It was even asserted that a Doctor had a right to that title without creation. Bartolus taught, Doctorem actualiter regentem in Jure Civili per decennium effici Militem ipso facto. Honorè de St. Marie, Diss. 165. This was called Chevalerie des Lectures, and the persons advanced to that dignity Milites Clerici."

Degrees when first conferred were attended with considerable expense, from the magnificence with which it was considered necessary to take them. Wood, in his Hist. et Antiq. Univ. Oxon. ii. 25, states, that in 1298 William de Brooke, a Benedictine of St. Peter's Abbey at Gloucester, took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity at Oxford. He was the first of his Order who had attained that dignity, and he was accompanied by the Abbot and whole Convent of Gloucester, the Abbots of Westminster, Reading, Abingdon, Evesham, and Malmesbury, with 100 Gentlemen and Esquires on horses richly caparisoned. They were entertained sumptuously at Gloucester College. Fosbrooke, in his Encyclopædia of Antiquities, (400) in which the authorities are quoted so much en masse, that it is not always possible to disentangle them, says that in 1324 it was ordered at Toulouse that the Graduate should be attended by only two trumpets and a drum; and that in 1329, dances, banquets, comedies, &c. were prohibited.

Moreri (Graduez) has described the constitution of the University of Paris respecting Degrees.

Under Bachelor we have already detailed the forms of our own Universities regarding that Degree at Cambridge.

A Master of Arts must be B. A. of three years standing.

A Doctor of Divinity must be a Bachelor of Divinity of five, or a Master of Arts* of twelve years standing. The exercises are one act, two opponencies, a clerum, and an English sermon.

A Doctor of Laws must be of five years standing from the degree of LL. B. or a Master of Arts of seven years standing.—The exercises are two acts, and one opponency.

A Doctor of Physic is bound to the same regulations as LL. D.

A Doctor of Music is generally Mus. B. and his exercise is the same.

The following persons are entitled to honorary Degrees, at two years standing:

1. Privy Counsellors. 2. Bishops.
3. Noblemen, { Dukes, Marquisses, Earls, Viscounts, Barons.
4. Sons of Noblemen.
4. Persons related to the King's Majesty by consanguinity, or affinity; provided they be also honourable.
6. The eldest sons of such persons.
7. Baronets, } To the degree of M.A. only.
8. Knights, }

At Oxford, twelve terms are computed from the time of admission to the Bachelor's Degree to that of Master of Arts, one only is kept.

For the Degree of Doctor of Civil Law five years are computed from the admission to that of Bachelor. If taken with the intention of practising in Doctor's Commons, and such intention be affirmed on oath, one of these years is dispensed with.

A Master of Arts may become a Doctor of Civil Law in seven years, a Doctor of Medicine in four, a Doctor of Divinity in eleven.

DEGUELIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Diadelphia, order Decandria, natural order Leguminosæ. Generic character: calyx short, pitcher-shaped, two-lipped; wings and keel two petalled, standard large; pod globose, two-valved, one-seeded; seed round.

One species, D. scandens, a climbing shrub, native of Guiana. Aubl. Guian.

DEGUSTATION, Lat. degustare; de, and gustare, from γευστὸς, and that from γεύ-εσθαι, to taste. A tasting.

If thou have tasted how sweet the Lord is, thou canst not but long for more of him, yea, for all: It is no otherwise even in carnal delights, the degustation whereof is wont to draw on the heart to a more eager appetition; much more in spiritual, the pleasures whereof as they are more pure, so they are of the heavenly-minded with far greater ardency of spirit affected.
Hall. The Soul's Farewell to Earth, vol. iii. fol. 933. sec. 9.

DEHORT, DEHORTA'TION, DEHORTA'TORY. Old Fr. deshenhorter; Lat. dehortari; de, and hort-ari. The ancient Romans, Vossius says, for hortor, wrote horior; and horior, he conceives to be from ορτύν-ω, incito, to incite, encourage.

To warn or admonish, or advise from doing any thing, to dissuade.

Wherefore Jermye wel dehorted and disswaded the peple sayinge: Se that ye beleue not the lying wordes and sermõs of the halfe prechers saying: The temple, the temple of the Lorde is so holy. Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. i.

The places of exhorting, and dehorting are the same which wee vse in perswading and disswading, saving that hee which vseth perswasion, seeketh by arguments to compass his deuise: he that labours to exhort, doth stirre affection.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 64.

Wherof shall serue all the dehortacions and cõmynacyons & threts in Scripture, by which God calleth men from synne and euyl workes, yf the world wer once of the mind that thei believed after Luther, that no manne doth any euill dede hym selfe, but God dothe them himselfe.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 273. The Confutacion of Tyndall's Answer.

* When a Master of Arts takes a Doctor's Degree in any of the three Faculties, he is said to graduate per Saltum, though properly this phrase belongs only to the Degree of D.D.

Exhortation and dehortation, is counsel, accompanied with signs in him that giveth it, of vehement desire to have it followed; or to say it more briefly, counsel vehemently pressed. For he that exhorteth, doth not deduce the consequence of what he adviseth to be done, and tye himself therein to the rigour of true reasoning: but encourages him he counselleth, to action: As he that dehorteth, detereth him from it.

Hobbes. Of Commonwealth, part ii. ch. xxv.

On the contrary part, what cā be a greater dehortation from vice, then to haue laid before ones eyes not only the heynousnesse and enormitie of the offence, but also the miseries, calamities, shame and punishmentes worthely ensewyng vpon the same.

Arth. Golding. Justine, iii. Epis. Ded.

The text you see, is a dehortatory charge to avoid the offence of God. Bishop Hall. Remains, p. 103.

And thus much for the first thing to be considered in the dehortation; namely, the person dehorting, who was Christ himself. Pass we now to the 2. thing to be considered in it, to wit, the thing we are dehorted from, which is covetousness.

South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 426.

For he cometh unto thee, poor and lowly, riding upon an ass, to wean thee from the vain hopes of the heathen, from which the prophets have so often dehorted thy forefathers.

Horne. Works. Discourse 5. vol. iv.

DEHUSK, to strip off the husk, q. v.

——————— Forcastinge that thy neighbour should haue more Wheate (by the dowrie of his wyfe) dehusk'd vpon the flore.

Drant. Horace. Epistle to Numitius.

Admit on flore thou haste in store an hundreth thousande mets
Or corne dehuskede: what cums thereby.

Id. Ib. The first Satire.

DEICIDE, Sp. deicida; Deus, God, and cædere, to kill.

Then mock thy knowledge, and confound thy pride,
Explaining how perfection suffer'd pain
Almighty languished, and Eternal died:
How by her patient victor death was slain;
And earth profan'd, yet bless'd with deicide.

Prior. I am that I am. On Ode.

DEICTICALLY, Gr. δεικτικῶς, from δείκ-ειν, to show, to point out.

And that gives you a farther reason, (if what was said before to your second quære were not sufficient,) that our Saviour's prediction was not conditional, but categorically enunciative, verily I say unto you that one of you shall or will betray me, and he that dippeth, at that time when Christ spake it, deictically, i. e. Judas, is that person.

Hammond. Works. Third Letter of Prescience, vol. i. fol. 703.

And yes more deictically by enumeration of all particulars concern'd in it: the sea gave up its dead, and death and Hades delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works.

Id. Of Hell Torments, fol. 713.

DEJE'CT, v. DEJE'CT, adj. DEJE'CTEDLY, DEJE'CTEDNESS, DEJE'CTION. Fr. dejecter; Lat. dejicere, ctum, to cast down; (de, and jacere, to cast or throw.) To cast or throw down; and thus, to humble or humiliate, to depress, to sink, to debase, to dispirit, to dishearten.

From the moste hyghe heauen, than the whiche nothynge can be higher, Christ deiected himself euen vnto the helles, than the which nothyng can be lower. Udall. Ephesians, ch. iii.

This deiection and humiliacion might not the kynge knowe, beinge in his weasy securite and arrogant pryde.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel. The fourth Chapter.

When she whom I a long time haue affected,
Amongst the flowers went forth to take the aire;
They being proud of such a gueste's repaire,
Though by her garments diuers times deiected,
To gaze on her sgaine themselves erected.

Stirling. Avrora, song 7.

Her followers such, as meerly friendless stood,
Sunk and dejected by the Spenser's pride,
Who bore the taints of treason in their blood,
And for revenge would leave no ways untry'd.

Drayton. The Baron's Wars, book iii.

What can be a more deject spirit in man, than to lay his hands under every one's horses feet, to do him service, as thou dost?

Beaumont and Fletcher. The Martial Maid.

——————— Had you born yourselves
Dejectedly, and base, no slavery
Had been too easy for you; but such is
The power of noble valour, that we love it
Even in our enemies.

Massinger. The Virgin Martyr, act i. sc. 1.

With what scorn and insultation doth he look upon my dejectedneese? the very language of his eye is no other then contempt.

Hall. Selfe Conferences. Soliloquy 34. vol. iii. fol. 439.

What's the reason the consciences of wicked men drag them before God, and they come with so much diffidence, dejectedness, and jealousie? Why, it is because they are conscious to themselves of guilt that lies upon them.

Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 470.

'Tis he that takes away, who can repay you:
This grief to other rods doth open lay you
He binds your grief to patience, not dejection.
Who bears the first not well, provokes a new correction.

P. Fletcher. Elisa.

——————— Shall a few loose troops, untrain'd,
But in a customary ostentation,
Presented as a sacrifice to your valours,
Cause a dejection in you?

Massinger. The Maid of Honour, act ii. sc. 3.

When our souls are dejected, distressed, tormented with the remembrance of our former sins, he saith to us, as he did to the man in the Gospel, be of good chear, my son, thy sins are all pardoned. Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 70.

The one he emboldens with a manly assurance to look, speak, act, or plead before the faces of a numerous assembly; the other he dazzles out of countenance into a sleepish dejectedness.

Spectator, No. 250.

In which words we have represented to us, the unparallel'd example of courage and patience under sufferings, in our Lord and Saviour; and the great influence that it ought to have on all those who are called by his name, that they would not dishonour so excellent a pattern of enduring sufferings, by weakness or dejection of mind. Stillingfleet. Sermon 6. vol. i.

I have had no dignities; thou hast withheld them, and I have not thought them even worthy of a wish. Didst thou see me sad and dejected on these accounts?

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History. Preface.

DEJECTION, in Astrology, is the loss of influence of Planets when they are in their Detriment, that is, when they are in opposition to others which check or counteract them.

DEJERATION, dejerare; de, and jurare, to swear. A solemn swearing.

Doubtless with many tears and dejerations, he labours to clear his intentions to her person.

Hall. Cont. Haman Hanged.

DE'IFY, DE'IFICAL, DE'IFICATE, DEIFICA'TION, DE'IFIER, DE'IFORM, DEIFO'RMITY, DE'ISM, DE'IST, DE'ISTICAL, DE'ITY, DE'ITATE. Deus, God, and fieri, to be made or become. Fr. deifier; Sp. deificar; It. deificare; Low Lat. deificare, in numerum deorum ascribere. Minshew. In Deos referre, consecrare. Vossius, de Vitiis. To rank or class among the Gods; to treat as if a God. Deist; one who believes that there is a God. Deity; the God-head; also, applied to the person—God.

DEIFY.

These elementes ben creatures,
So ben these heauenly figures.
Wherof maie wel be iustified,
That thei maie not be deified.
Gower. Conf. Am. book v. fol. 88.

So whan that Jupiter of Crete
Was kỳnge, a wife vnto hym mete,
The douhter of Cybele he toke,
And that was Juno, saith the boke
Of his deificacion.
Id. Ib. book v. fol. 90.

Than whan thou goest thy body fro,
Free in the aire thou shalt vp go,
And leauen all humanitie,
And purely liue in deitie.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 142.

Thou didst reherse ensamples of the deifyng of Hercules, and Bacchus. Thinkest thou that theye were made Goddes vppon drinke and by the decree of one dynner?
Brende. Quintus Curtius, book viii. fol. 223.

Eik sal thou raise aboue the sterrit sky,
The manfull Eneas, and him deify.
Douglas. Eneados, book i. fol. 21.

The ancient Catholique fathers were not afrayd to call this supper, some of them, the salue of immortality, and soveraigne preseruatiue against death other. a deificall communion: other, the sweet dainties of our Saviour, &c.
Homilies. On the Sacrament, part i.

He yelde his mede, that lord in deyite
That as one God reygneth in persones thre.
Fabyan, Anno 1273.

Now change the tenor of your joyous layes,
With which ye vse your loues to deifie,
And blazon forth an earthly beauties praise,
Aboue the compasse of the arched skie.
Spenser. The Teares of the Muses.

Cicero also tells us, that the meaning of their thus deifying these things of nature, was only to signifie, that they acknowledged the force of all things to be divine, and to be governed by God; and that whatsoever brought any great vitility to mankind, was not such without the divine goodness.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 530.

Yet is their personation and deification meer fiction and phancy; however the first occasion thereof sprung, from this theological opinion or persuasion, that God who is in all things, and is the cause of all things, ought to be worshiped in all things, especially he being himself invisible. Id. Ib. fol. 531.

Which opinion is really nothing else but the deifying of the Devil, or Prince of evil spirits, making him a corrival with God, and entitling him to a right of receiving divine honour and worship. Id. Ib.

One would have hoped, that the memory of so signal an interposition of heaven [the Flood] against the first deifiers of men, should have given an effectual check to the practice for some considerable time in the succeeding world.
Coventry. Phil. to Hyd. conv. 3.

Onely souls deiform intellective
Unto that height of happinesse can get;
Yet immortalitie with other souls may sit.
More. On the Soul, part ii. book i. can. 2. st. 47.

But if the final consummation
Of all things make the creature deiform,
As Plato's school doth phrase it; there is none
That thence need fear to come to any harm.
Id. Ib. part iii. can. 4. st. 25.

If we see him as he is, all this glory must descend to us and become ours: for we can no other wayes see God (as I said before) but by becoming deiform, by being changed into the same glory.
Taylor. Sermons, part iv. fol. 71.

Thus the soul's numerous plurality
I have prov'd, and show'd she is not very God;
But yet a decent deiformity
Hath given her.
More. On the Soul, part iii. st. 27.

A country maiden, then amongst the swains, D
A shepherdess, she kept upon the plains;
Yet no disguise her deity could smother, D
So far in beauty she excelled other.
Drayton. The Man in the Moon.

One person and one Christ, who is God incarnate, a man deitate, as Gregory Nazianzen saith, without mutation.
Archbishop Cranmer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 350.

Is it not strange, that a rational man should adore leeks and garlick, and shed penitential tears at the smell of a deified onion? Yet so did the Ægyptians, once the famed masters of all arts and learning. South. Sermons, vol. i. p. 78.

An idol may be undeified by many accidental causes. Marriage, in particular, is a kind of counter-apotheosis, or a deification inverted. When a man becomes familiar with his Goddess, she quickly sinks into a woman. Spectator, No. 73.

If my supposition be true, then the consequence which I have assumed in my poem may be also true; namely, that deism, or the principles of natural worship, are only the faint remnants or dying flames of revealed religion in the posterity of Noah.
Dryden. Religio Laici. Preface.

Almost all the things that are said wisely and truly by modern deists, are plainly borrowed from that revelation, which they refuse to embrace; and without which, they could never have been able to have said the same things.
Clarke. On Natural and Revealed Religion.

This great poet and philosopher, [Simonides] the more he contemplated the nature of the Deity, found that he waded but the more out of his depth; and that he lost himself in the thought, instead of finding an end to it. Spectator, No. 531.

They worshipped God in his works, in all things, and deified the several parts of nature: they worshipped him under emblems, symbols, sensible representations, and images.
Jortin. On the Christian Religion, disc. 7.

It was an article of the common creed amongst the Pagans, that the souls of deified men were taken up into heaven, advanced to a state of divine dominion there, and ranked with the immortal Gods. Herein their deification did properly consist.
Farmer. On Miracles.

But you are the first who ever swore that he was an infidel, concluding your deistical creed with—so help me God! I pray that God may help you: that he may through the influence of his Holy Spirit, bring you to a right mind; convert you to the religion of his Son, whom, out of his abundant love to mankind, he sent into the world, that all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.
Watson. Apology for the Bible, fol. 341.

I seem, for my own part, to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of very young children, than in any thing in the world.
Paley. Moral Philosophy, book ii. ch. v.

These are some of the doctrines which have unhappily helped to propagate atheism or deism, and have made many a man say to himself, "if this be Christianity, let my soul be with the philosophers." Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

DE'IGN, DE'IGNFUL, DE'IGNFULLY, DE'IGNOUS, DE'IGNOUSLY. } Fr. daigner; It. degnare; Lat. dignari, dignum æstimare, to think or esteem worthy. Vossius thinks that dignus, or, as the ancient Romans wrote it, Dicnus, comes from Gr. δίκ-η, that is, jus; ut dignus sit, cui aliquid tribui æquum est.

To think or esteem worthy or deserving; to think or esteem worthy or becoming; to vouchsafe, to condescend.

Deignous is used by Chaucer as—thinking or esteeming too worthy or deserving; valuing too highly; and thus, equivalent to—disdainful.

Vor so muche he tolde of himself & of is grete mixte, þat him ne deinede nozt to ligge in þe castel by nixte.
R. Gloucester, p. 557.

Boste & deignouse pride & ille avisement
Mishapnes oftentide, & does many be schent.
R. Brunne, p. 289.

EIGN. — EKAN.

Rŷgt so sothlŷ sciences dwelleþ in a mannes soule
And doþ hym to be deÿnous. and deem þat beth nat lerede.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 276.

What man (qd he) was euer thus at ease
As I? on which the fairest, and the best
That euer I seie, deinethe her to rest.
Chaucer. The third Booke of Troilus, fol. 173.

Touching thy letter thou art wise ynough
I wot thou nilt it deigneliche endite.
Id. Ib. book ii. fol. 163.

A thefe he was forsoth, of corn and mele,
And that a slie, and usant for to stele.
His name was hoten deinous Simekin.
Id. The Reves Tale, v. 3939.

Ye ben of port so daungerous
Unto this louer, and dainous
To graunt him nothing but a kisse.
Id. Romant of the Rose, fol. 133.

And sure I feare, vnlesse your lordship deigne,
To traine him yet into some better trade,
It will be long before he hit the veine,
Whereby he may a richer man be made.
Gascoigne. Hearbes. Woodmanship.

And with that worde on me she gaue a glome
With browes bente, and gan on me to stare
Full daynously, and fro me she dyd fare
Leuynge me stondynge as a mased man.
Skelton. Prologue to the bouge of Courte.

She deignes not my good will, but doth reproue,
And of my rural musick holdeth scorne.
Spenser. Shepheards Calendar. Januarie.

But when againe thou dost extend thy rigour,
And wilt not daigne to grace me with thy sight,
Thou kil'st my comfort, and so spoil'st my might
That scarce my corps retaines the vitall vigour.
Stirling. Avrora. Sonnet 35.

Yet tempred so her deignfull lookes alway,
That outward scorne shew'd store of grace within.
Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book iv.

MOTH. Harlot; so
Called from one Harlotha, concubine
To deignous Wilhelme, hight the conqueror.
Cartwright. The Ordinary, act iii: sc. 1.

But if a prince shall deign to be familiar, and to converse with those upon whom he might trample, shall his condescension therefore unking him? And his familiarity rob him of his royalty? The case is the same with Christ.
South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 802.

Yet the governor was so imprudent and arrogant, that he despised all these reiterated overtures, and did not deign even to return the least answer to them.
Anson. Voyage round the World, book ii. ch. vi.

DEKAN, a Persian modification of the Hindù word Dak'hin, itself derived from the Sanscrît Dakshina, which signifies "the South," is used by the Hindù writers, as the name of the whole country south of the Nerbadà (or Nermadà;) but when the Moghuls had extended their conquests beyond that river, it was applied exclusively to the territory between the Nerbadà and Krîshna, their southern boundary.

Under Aurang-zîb, the first of the Moghul Emperors who completely established his authority in the Peninsula, the Dekan was divided into six Súbahs or Provinces: (see Defteri Asufiyyah, or Public Register of the Empire, MSS.; and Waring's History of the Mahrattahs, 271.) 1. Khándésh Burhan-púr, and 2. Berár-Elich-púr, on the North; 3. Aurang-ábád, and 4. Haïder-ábád, in the centre; 5. Béjá-púr, 6. Mohammed-ábád, and 7. Bíder, on the South.

The woody, mountainous tract of Gondwánah, and the fertile province of Orísah, though subject to the Moghul, and properly belonging to the Dekan, were not included in it by the Musulmáns.

DEKAN.

These Provinces, as being the most remote from the seat of Government, were among the first torn from the Empire in the period of anarchy and confusion which followed the death of Aurang-zîb. The western part of them was seized by the Mahrattah Chiefs, the real or pretended descendants of native Hindù Princes, the original possessors of the soil; the eastern, by the Nezzámu'l mulk or Superintendant of the Empire, the Viceroy appointed by the Moghul. Some districts (Serkárs) of the latter on the eastern coast were alternately possessed by the French and English, in the wars of which the Peninsula was the theatre; and Orísah, which had always been annexed to Bengal, followed the fortunes of that Province. Gondwánah, little accessible from the intricacy of its forests and the ferocious character of its inhabitants, was never explored, and held only in a nominal subjection to the Court of Dehlí.

The whole of these countries have now for upwards of twenty years been united by a strict alliance or a direct incorporation with the British territories, and have therefore become much better known to our countrymen than at any preceding period.

The Dekan is now subdivided into the following Provinces: 1. Orísah; 2. Gondwánah; 3. Khándésh; 4. Berár; 5. Serkárs, (Northern Circars;) 6. Haïder-ábád; 7. Aurang-ábád; 8. Béjá-púr; 9. Bíder: and as the Province of Bálá G'hát to the south of the Krîshna has been added to the dominions of the Nezzám, it is in some maps marked as a part of the Dekan. An account of each of these divisions will be found, according to the plan usually followed in this work, under its proper head; but as the little Province of Bíder was omitted, by an oversight, in the place at which it ought to have come alphabetically, it will be proper to insert it here, in order to complete this portion of Indian Geography.

Bíder.

The Súbah or Province of Bíder, which has nearly the shape of a crescent, and now forms a part of the dominions of the Nezzám, lies between 17° and 20° north, 76° and 80° east, and is bounded by the rivers Vardà and Krîshna on the north and south; having Berár on the north-west, Aurang-ábád on the west, a small portion of Béjá-púr and two-thirds of Haïder-ábád on the south and east, with Gondwánah on the north-east, adjoining to Berár. It is traversed by the Gódáverí and the Manjerà, and many smaller streams tributaries to them and to the rivers on the confines; while chains of low hills, diverging from the heights parallel with the course of the river on its northern frontier, intersect the Province in every direction. Its soil is in general productive; but, as in other Provinces under a Mohammedan Government, its population, and consequently its produce, is in a languishing condition. The Hindûs in this Province are six times as numerous as the Mohammedans, notwithstanding it has been subject to the Musulmáns for nearly 500 years. It was for the greater part of the XVIth century the seat of a petty but independent Dynasty, called Berîd-shâhí, from the Amír Berîd, the Minister, and genuine Maire du Palais or "Peshvà," to the two last Bahmaní Sultáns. The City of Bíder itself, and a few districts round it, formed the whole territory of these Princes, who in the third generation were dispossessed by their more powerful neighbours. (Ferishtah's Hist. of the Dekan, book iii. sec. 6.) This, with the rest of the Dekan, was ab-

DEKAN. sorbed in the vast Empire of Aurang-zíb in the latter half of the XVIIth, and severed from it by the Nezámu'l mulk in the beginning of the last century.

The Súbah of Bíder (called Mohammed-ábád by the Musulmáns) contains seven Districts (Serkárs) and seventy-seven Townships (Mahalls or Perganahs,) rated as follows:

Serkár	Perganahs.	Rúpíyahs.
1. Bíder or Mohammed-ábád	8 ..	938,855
2. Fíróz-gar'h, or Yádgír	1 ..	134,365
3. Nándír	44 ..	3,846,687
4. Akal-cót	7 ..	479,017
5. Kaliyàn	2 ..	270,003
6. Rám-gír	1 ..	782,844
7. Muzaffar-nagar, or Bali-gír	14 ..	1,206,680
Total....	77 ..	7,657,451 = £957,000.

"This estimate was copied," says Mr. Scott Waring, (237,) "from the Mahrattah Records, shortly after the campaign of my Lord Cornwallis:" but in the copies of the Defteri Asufiyyah consulted by Father Tieffenthaler, (Bernoulli's Besch. von Hindústán, i. 354,) Bíder is only rated at 372,974,970 dáms=4,242,732 rúpíyahs.

This Súbah has probably been enlarged in the late changes of territory in the Peninsula; for in Mr. Hamilton's list of the Serkárs, (Hindostan, ii. 119,) we have instead of Fíróz-gar'h, Rám-gír and Muzaffarnagar, Kalbergah, Nal-durg, and Pát'hrì, of which the two first are assigned to the Súbah of Béjá-púr in the Defter, (248.)

1. The District of Nándír is traversed by the Gódáverí, and its principal Town, bearing the same name, is on the north side of that river in 19° 3′ north and 77° 38′ east. It appears to have formed a part of the Súbah of Berár in the time of Akbár, and is, perhaps, the place erroneously written 'Mandeer in Gladwin's Translation of the Ayeen Akbery, (ii. 236.) It is little known, but probably is rich and fertile, on account of the abundance of water which it enjoys.

2. Pát'hrì was one of the Serkárs of Berár in the time of Akbár; it then contained eighteen Perganahs, and yielded a revenue of 80,705,954 dáms, (201,764 rupees, 34 dáms,) with fiefs (suyúrghál) to the value of 11,580,954 dáms, (289,523 rupees, 34 dáms;) its principal Town, bearing the same name, is in 19° 19′ north and 77° 13′ east.

3. Bíder (spelt Bédor by Tieffenthaler,) is bounded on the north and east by the Manjerà River; it is a fertile and populous District, the inhabitants of which carry on a considerable trade. Its Capital, (also the Metropolis, (Huvéllí,) of the Súbah,) is in 17° 49′ north and 77° 46′ east, is a fortified town, containing some traces of its former splendour when it was the residence of its native Princes, and frequented on account of its manufactures and jewellery, particularly tutenague inlaid with silver. Mohammed-ábád, the modern Town, was founded by Ahmed Sháh Bahmaní, near the former site of Bíder, in the early part of the XVth century.

4. Kalbergah, in 17° 89′ north and 76° 56′ east, the Capital of a District bearing the same name, was for a long time the residence of the Sovereigns of this country, and one of the largest cities in India. It was possessed by Hindù Princes before the Musulmáns wrested it from them at the close of the XIIIth century, and its name often occurs in the histories of that period, as does likewise that of Nal-durg, the fortress of Nada, one of Heroes of Hindù Romance; now the Capital of a district near the south-western extremity of the Province. It stands in 17° 44′ north and 76° 23′ east.

Hamilton's Hindostan, ii. 118; Bernoulli's Beschreibung von Hindústán, Berlin, 1785, 4to, vol. i. 257, 354; Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery, London, 1800, 8vo, ii. 59, 236; Scott Waring's Hist. of the Mahrattahs, London, 1810, 4to, 249; Defteri Asufiyyah, in MSS.

DEKING, to cause to be no longer king; to deprive of a kingdom. South uses unking; see under the verb DEIGN above.

Edward being thus dekinged, the embassie rode ioyfully backe to London to the parliament, with the resigned ensigns, and dispatch of their employment.

Speed. Edward III. book ix. ch. xii. sec. 75.

DELAGOA,* or more properly DALAGOA BAY, also called Bahia do Espírito Santo, (Bay of the Holy Ghost,) seems to have been first visited by João de Quirós, who was driven into it by storms in the early part of the XVIth century, but it was surveyed and laid down for the first time by Lorenço Marquez in 1545. (Barros, lib. ix. c. 6, lib. x. c. 1.) It is situated on the eastern coast of Africa, nearly midway between the Cape of Good Hope and Mozambic. It extends about sixty geographical miles from north to south, and twenty from east to west. Its eastern extremity is Cape St. Mary's, or Unyáca, (Unhaca,) in 25° 38′ north and 35° 15′ east, and its entrance is beset with shoals which leave a passage not more that five miles broad. The Cape (Ponta de Sta Maria) is a rocky point of land separated by a narrow channel from a small island bearing the same name. Three large rivers flow into this Bay, the Manica, or Rio do Espírito Santo, the English River, or Da Lagoa,† and the Machavanna. Of these the first and northernmost is the largest, but a bar of sand at its mouth is passable by boats only, and the Portuguese fort at its entrance has long been abandoned. The English River has also a bar at its mouth; but there is a depth of fifteen feet upon it at low water, and a safe anchorage two miles higher up. It is navigable by vessels drawing twelve feet, for upwards of forty miles. The Dutch had a factory on it in the beginning of the last century, which was destroyed by English pirates; and the short-lived Austrian East India Company afterwards made a small settlement on the south side of the river; but the Portuguese, to whom the place was of no sort of use, took umbrage, and the settlement was abandoned. It was till lately frequented only by South Sea whalers, who catch many fish in the Bay; Párs'is from Bombay, who exchange

* This name, which has been distorted into Dalrou, Delgoa, and Algoa, signifies Marsh-Bay, and being applicable to most harbours bounded by a flat coast, was given by the Portuguese to many other Bays, and particularly to one in 34° 10′ north and 25° 15′ east called Zwartkops Riviers Bay, Blackhead River's Bay, by the Dutch.

† D'Anville has given this name to a river north of the Bay, and left that which is between the Manica and Machavanna nameless; in Linschotin's Map, however, it has the name of Da Lagoa given to it by our navigators.

European and Indian goods for ivory, ambergris, and gold-dust; and a single Portuguese ship annually from Mosambic, sometimes carrying back slaves in return; but in 1823, a large tract of land near Inyác (Unyáca of the Portuguese) was ceded to the British Government by the natives. The Machavanna is navigable for about 90 geographical miles, by boats drawing six feet of water, and falls into the sea about twenty-five miles to the north of English River.

The soil, at least near the river, is a rich black mould, producing large crops of rice or maiz, (Sorghum,) which are sown in December and January. From April to October the droughts prevail, when the rainy season sets in to the north of the equinoctial line. Sugar-cane abounds, and all the Tropical productions might be easily raised. The animals are the same as found in the country of the Béchwánas, (or Bushwanas,) but there are no beasts of burden except oxen. Excellent fish, and sometimes turtles, are furnished by the sea and rivers; and there is much reason to hope that the colony will soon be in a prosperous condition.

The inhabitants are harmless and good-natured, but crafty and much inclined to fraud in their dealings. Those further from the shore have the reputation of being cruel and treacherous, but probably without reason. Their peculiar make, features, and complexion distinguish them as much from the Negroes and the Arabs, as from the Hottentots and Bosjesmans; and Dr. Lichtenstein, a very competent judge, says (Reisen, i. 293) that he is convinced as well from personal observation as from a comparison of the various accounts, ancient and modern, of this part of Africa, that all the tribes on the eastern coast between Kiloa and the Cape Colony are branches derived from the same stock. This opinion is also confirmed by a less disputable evidence, that of their languages and customs, which are connected by a close affinity. The Wesleyan Missionaries, who can hardly be suspected of stealing from the Jesuit Godinho, and perhaps never heard of his hero, their brother Missionary, Silveira, though a Saint and Martyr, describe the Inyácas almost in the very words which he applies to the Botongas, their northern neighbours. They are nearly naked, say both these authorities, (Wesleyan Miss. Society Report, 1823; and Godigni, Vita Gonzali Sylveiræ, Col. Agrip. 1616, p. 74,) have no idea of religion whatever, yet practise circumcision, and are much addicted to witchcraft. Godinho adds some particulars respecting their dread of touching a corpse, and the privacy of their interments, which strongly resemble the singular practices of the Káfirs, or rather Kósas, with regard to the dead and dying. (Lichtenstein, Reisen im südlichem Africa, i. 420.)

Many words in Mr. White's Vocabulary, are exactly the same as the corresponding terms of the Kósa language, given by Dr. Lichtenstein, (i. 635;) and others bear just such a resemblance as may be expected in somewhat remote dialects of the same language; while the frequent recurrence of f and v, letters which the Béchwánas can hardly pronounce, shows that the Inyácas are nearer in origin as well as in position to the Kósas.

The country to the south of the Bay is called Mápúta, and has about 20,000 inhabitants; the peninsula and island of Inyác, have about 10,000 tributary to Mápúta, which, together with Panyéli, is tributary to Tembi, and that State, including all its subject territories, may contain about 50,000 souls.

It appears from Mr. Burchell's excellent map of Southern Africa, that Massáo (or Mashão) is nearly in 26° 35′ north and 25° 40′ east, and Karikhàn, the furthest place reached by Mr. Campbell, is about 1° north and 1° 30′ east of that place, so that he was only about 7° of longitude or 400 miles from the coast. This will perhaps account for the articles of European manufacture which he sometimes met with, though his informants seemed certainly to have some knowledge of the Portuguese settlement at Mozambic. (Campbell, Travels in Africa, ii. 356.)

(White, Voyage to Colombo and Da Lagoa Bay, in 1798, London, 1800; Milburn, Oriental Commerce, i. 56.)

DELA'PSE, DELA'PSION. } Delabi, delapsus; de, and labi, to fall. Fallen away from.

Which Anne deriv'd alone, the right before all other,
Of the delapsed crown, from Philip her fair mother.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 29.

If we should grant and suppose these reflections of beams upon the superficies of the moon, to be made by way of equal angles, there is no impossibility in the matter, but that the same rays being carried so great a way, should have their frictions, fluxions, and delapsions; that thereby the light should be confused and shine the more. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 954.

DELA'TE, DELA'TION, DELA'TOR. } Deferre, delatum; (de, and ferre, to bear or carry.) To bear, carry or bring; (literally, as in Lord Bacon,) and met. with a subaudition,—of information, accusation; and thus, consequentially, to inform, to accuse.

To bear, to convey, to conduct.

Delacyon, in Lord Berners, is—delay: deferring or delaying. See to DEFER. In Sir Thomas More, Delating seems equivalent to Collating; conferring or bringing together.

Dilate was written not uncommonly Delate, by older writers, as in the Quotations from Goodwin and Mountague. "To delate or speak at large of any thing; see to DILATE." Minshew.

Dilation, on the other hand, in Shakspeare, (first folio,) appears to be of the same import as Delation in Wotton and Spotiswood; in them, it is—information, accusation: in Shakspeare, close delation,—is secret information, intimation; and thus, varying very little from the expression in the quarto,—"Close denotements." See DENOTE.

Christ shal at the last restreyn & destroy his ydelle Antechrist with the spirit of his holy mouth, repayring and delating his church again & gathering thereinto as wel the remenāt of the Jewes, as all other sectes.
Sir Thomas More. Works, fol. 288. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

And after this Iudgement there was no delacyon of sufferaunce nor mercy, but incōtynent he was drawen throughout London, and then set on a scaffolde.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. ch. xxiii.

To try exactly the time wherein sound is delated, let a man stand in a steeple, and have with him a taper; and let some veil be put before the taper; and let another man stand in a field a mile off. Then let him in the steeple strike the bell; and in the same instant withdraw the vaile; and so let him in the field tell by his pulse what distance of time there is between the light seene, and the sound heard: for it is certain that the delation of light is in an instant.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 2. sec. 209.

DELATE.

Sad from thy sight so soon to be remou'd,
She so her grief delates,
O fauor'd by the fates,
Aboue the happiest states,
Who art of one so worthie well belou'd.
Stirling. Avrora, song 9.

His warlike wife Semiramis,
Her husband being dead
And sonne in nonage, faining him
Long ruled in his stead:
Delating in a male's attyre
The empire new begonne.
Warner. Albion's England, book i. ch. i.

For her [the Church of Rome] rage extends to all, laity as well as clergy; forreign clergy as well as domestick, their own people and strangers, the open dissentiants and the secretly suspected; those that are delated, and those whom they can inquire of.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 465. The second Part of the Dissuasive from Popery, book i. part ii.

For the abscission of the church is not to be us'd but after all other remedies: when the crime is delated or notorious, and the person called, when he hath been admonish'd and reprov'd, and called to repentance, if after all he refuses and rebels, then he is to be cut off, else not.
Id. Rule of Conscience, fol. 617. Of the Power of the Church in Canons and Censures.

Soon after his flight, one Henry Forrest was delated for saying that Master Patrick Hamilton died a martyr, and thereupon was brought to S. Andrews.
Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, book ii. Anno 1527.

By which he both illustrates and expounds his meaning in ver. 5. (Ps. xlix.) to be to utter his own blessed condition at his death, ver. 15, and to that purpose it is, he further delates upon the death of wicked men in the rest of the psalm: and which is indeed a kind of summary of what in the former meditation I have prest.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. fol. 617. An Unregenerate Man's Guiltiness, book xiii. ch. ix.

The gentlemen's case was much pitied, Maius his case especially. Hamilton, who made the delation, lived after this in a continual fear, and abhorred of all men.
Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, book vi. Anno 1684.

Therefore these stops of thine, fright me the more:
For such things in a false disloyall knaue
Are tricks of custome: but in a man that's iust,
They're close dilations, working from the heart,
That passion cannot rule.
Shakspeare. Othello, fol. 323.

There is among the partitions of this government, a very awfull magistracy under title of Inquisitori di Stato; to which are commonly deputed three gentlemen of the gravest and severest natures, who receive all secret delations in matter of practice against the republick, and then refer the same, as they shall judge the consequence thereof, to the decemviral councel, being the supreamest tribunal in criminal enquiries; of which body they are usually themselves. Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 307.

What I will own is mine, what is cast upon me is my adversaries: and if I be by deduction fetcht into such errour, the fault is not in my faith, but in my logick; my brain may erre, my heart doth not. Away then ye cruel tortors of opinions, dilators of errors, delaters of your bretheren, incendiaries of the church, haters of peace.
Hall. Works, book iii. fol. 44. Christian Moderation.

Whosoever was found pendulous and brangling in his religion, was brought by a sergeant, call'd familiar, before the said councel of inquisition; his accuser or delator stands behind a piece of tapestry, to see whether he be the party, and if he be, then they put divers subtle and entrapping interrogatories to him; and whether he confess any thing or no, he is sent to prison.
Howell. Letter 42. book i. sec. 5.

Inquiries were not so much as made: but as men were delated, they were marked down for such a fine: and all was transacted in a secret committee.
Burnet. Own Times, Anno 1662.

The delators, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished, under the former reigns, againe became formidable, as soon as they discovered that the emperor [Commodus] was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the senate.
Gibbon. Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. iv.

DELAWARE, one of the original thirteen Confederate States of North America, is situated between 38° 27′ and 39° 50′ of north latitude, and between 74° 58′ and 75° 42′ of west longitude from Greenwich. Its length from north to south is ninety-four miles, and the mean breadth twenty-two, the area being 2068 square miles or 1,323,520 acres. Delaware is bounded on the north by the State of Pennsylvania, on the east by the Delaware River and Bay and by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the south and west by the State of Maryland.

Delaware is divided into three Counties, which contained in 1820 the following population:

Newcastle County	27,899
Kent County	20,793
Sussex County	24,057
Total	72,749

The following Table shows the population of Delaware at each of the four national enumerations:

	1790.	1800.	1810.	1820.
Whites	46,308	49,852	55,361	55,282
Slaves	8,887	6,143	4,177	4,509
Free Blacks	3,899	8,278	13,136	12,958
Total	59,094	64,273	72,674	72,749

The first European settlers in the territory which now composes the State of Delaware were Swedes and Fins. Originally few in number, and successively reduced by the Dutch and English, the adventurers from the north have left scanty memorials of their existence as a distinct colony. In 1626, Gustavus Adolphus induced many of the Swedish Nobility to form a company for colonizing this part of America, and the country on both sides of the Delaware was styled by them on their arrival Nova Suecia. The growing prosperity of the infant Swedish colony alarmed the jealousy of their Dutch neighbours in the adjacent states, and after some years of hostility the whole territory submitted in 1655 to the celebrated Peter Stuyvesant. The chief persons of the colony were sent to Holland, but the commoners were allowed to remain.

The Dutch did not long enjoy their conquest. In 1664 Charles II. granted to his brother, the Duke of York, the whole country between the Connecticut and the Delaware rivers, and in September of that year the whole of the Dutch possessions in that part of North America were ceded to the British arms.

The capture of New York by the Dutch, in 1673, revived their authority on the banks of the Delaware for a brief period; but by the treaty of the following year the whole County was restored to England, and a final period put to the Dutch Government, and until 1682 the territory of the present State of Delaware was under the jurisdiction of New York.

The 24th of October, 1682, is memorable for the landing of William Penn at Newcastle in this State, when he proceeded to take possession of the County; and the three lower Counties of Delaware, as they were then called, were annexed to the State of Pennsylvania. Under the new proprietor, both the Dutch and Swedes became naturalized and held public offices.

For the subsequent twenty years the Representatives of the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania met in one legislature. Afterwards a separation of the Houses of Assembly took place; both Provinces, however, remaining under one Governor. In 1760 the boundaries of Delaware were finally settled, and have since remained uncontested.

Delaware remained under the government of the proprietors of Pennsylvania until 1775, though the dependence was merely nominal. In April of this year, Richard Penn, then proprietor of Pennsylvania, resigned his jurisdiction over the three lower Counties; and the territory taking the name of Delaware, became, in 1776, a free and independent State; a title which she earned during the revolutionary war, by more than a share of the dangers, losses, and sufferings endured by her sister Provinces.

Wilmington, the largest town in this State, is situated between Brandywine and Christiana Creeks, near the junction with the Delaware on the right bank; it is regularly laid out on the south-west side of a considerable elevation. On Christiana Creek, in the suburbs of Wilmington, is the finest collection of flour mills in the United States. The population in 1820 was 5268. Latitude 39° 44′ north and longitude 75° 28′ west of Greenwich.

Dover, the seat of Government, is about forty miles south of Wilmington, five miles from the mouth of Jones's Creek, which discharges into Delaware Bay. Latitude 89° 19′ north and longitude 75° 27′ west.

Newcastle, on the right bank of the Delaware, a few miles south of Wilmington, carries on a considerable trade with Philadelphia.

Lewistown, near Cape Henlopen, on the south-west entrance of Delaware Bay, is remarkable for its extensive salt-works lately established there.

The northern part of Delaware is undulating, the rest of the State is generally level and low. Large tracts of land in the spring and early in the summer are overspread with stagnant water, which renders them unhealthy and unfit for agriculture. The summit of the land in the peninsula between Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, commences in the great Cypress Swamp in the southern part of the State, and runs parallel to the west coast of Delaware Bay, marked in its progress by a chain of swamps, from which the waters descend on each side to the two great estuaries.

For a breadth of ten miles from the coast the soil is rich and productive, thence to the above-mentioned swamps it is light, sandy, and barren. Grain is the chief produce of the country. The lands in the southern county are favourable for grazing cattle.

The principal streams are the Brandywine and Christiana Creeks, near Wilmington. They afford a number of excellent sites for mills and manufacturing establishments. The principal creeks which run from the State of Delaware into the bay and ocean, commencing at the north, are, Appoquinimink, Duck Creek, Jones's River, Mispillion, Broadhill, and Indian River. The Nanticoke rises in the south-west, and flows through Maryland into Chesapeake Bay.

The climate of Delaware is mild, but from its vicinity to the ocean subject to violent changes; this circumstance contributes to soften the rigors of their winters, rendering them moist and moderate, particularly in the southern part.

The amount of shipping in 1815 was 9590 tons, principally, if not wholly engaged in the coasting trade. The value of the exports in 1820 was 19,498 dollars, mostly grain. DELAWARE.

Religion. The Presbyterians are the most numerous religious denomination. Several years since there were twenty-four congregations of Presbyterians, of Episcopalians fourteen, of Friends eight, of Baptists seven, and the Methodists, in the middle and southern parts, were and continue very numerous.

Government. The powers of administration in the State of Delaware, as in the Constitution of the other States, are distinctly divided into the executive, legislative, and judicial departments. The first are vested in a Governor, who is elected triennially by the people, being ineligible three years in six. He appoints to all Offices not provided for by the Constitution, and has power to reprieve and pardon, except in cases of impeachment. The legislative power is exercised by a Senate elected triennially, and an annual House of Representatives. Each County sends seven Representatives and three Senators. The Governor and all Civil officers are liable to impeachment by the House of Representatives, and are tried by the Senate. All elections are by ballot, and every white man of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the State two years and paid taxes, is entitled to vote. The judicial power of the State is vested in a Court of Chancery, a Supreme Court, and Courts of Oyer and Terminer, a Court of Common Pleas, an Orphan's Court, a Register's Court, and a Court of Quarter Sessions for each County, in Justices of the Peace, and in such other Courts as the legislature, two-thirds concurring, may from time to time establish. The Chancellor and superior Judges hold their Offices, quamdiù se benè gesserint. Besides these Courts there is a Supreme Court of Errors and Appeals, composed of the Chancellor and Judges of the Supreme Court and Common Pleas. See Seybert, Statistics; American Atlas; Official Documents of American Congress, &c.

Delaware Bay is a large estuary separating the State of Delaware from that of New Jersey. The embouchure of the Bay lies between Cape May and Cape Henlopen, the navigable channel being nearest to the latter, in latitude 38° 48′ north and longitude 74° 65′ west from Greenwich. The Bay is about twenty miles wide between the Capes of Delaware, as the above promontories are usually termed, and runs in a triangular form and a north-west direction to Stony Point, on the New Jersey shore, where they are mingled with the waters of Delaware River. This stream rises in the State of New York, in about latitude 43° north and longitude 74° west. After passing the 42° of latitude the course of the Delaware is nearly south, dividing the State of Pennsylvania from New York and New Jersey, until it touches Delaware. The length of its course to the head of Delaware Bay is about 300 miles. It is navigable for ships of the line forty miles to Philadelphia, and for sloops thirty-five miles further, to the head of tide water at the falls of Trenton. On the banks of the Delaware coal fields have lately been discovered. The rapids above Trenton prevent good navigation above that town, but in rainy seasons canoes come down from the upper country.

DELAY

DELA'Y, v.
DELA'Y, s.
DELA'YER, DELA'YFUL,
DELA'YING,
DELA'YMENT,
DELA'YOUS,
DELA'Y-MAKING.

Fr. delayer; It. dilatare; Sp. dilatar; from dilatum, (Menage,) used as the past participle of differre, to put or bear away or apart, to put off.

To put off or postpone, to procrastinate, to prolong or protract; to stop, detain or retard; to pause, to linger.

As the Fr. delayer, so the English to delay, is (by some old writers) used as—to allay (q. v.) or soften, or alleviate. See the Examples from Spenser and Holland.

Perfore ỳ ne rede in no maner þis nede lengor delaye.
R. Gloucester, p. 156.

Somme feynede a delaỳ & somme al out wiþ seỳde.
Id. p. 421.

Sotheli Felix dilaiede hem, and knew moost certeynli of the weie, & seide, whanne Lisias the tribune schal come doun I schal heere ghou. Wiclif. The Dedes of Apostles, ch. xxiv.

Therefore whanne thei camen togidre hider, withouten ony delai in the daie suynge I sat for domeaman and commaundide the man to be brouhte. Id. Ib. ch. xxv.

Anon without more delaie
Withouten daunger or affraie
I become his man anone.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 125.

And when the time is so befall,
That Troie was destroid, and brent,
He made no delagement,
But goeth hym home in all hie.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 64.

Wherfore couertly he delayed his busines, to the entente to see the ende of yᵗ matter; howbeit, by letters and messagers he reteyned styll the duke in loue and fauoure.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. ch. lii.

I can no mo delayes deuise,
But welcome payne, let pleasure passe.
Gascoigne. Flowers. The Lullabie of a Lover.

Among the Romayns Quintus Fabius for this qualitie is soueraignely extolled amonge historiens: and for that cause he is often times called of them Fabius cūctator, that is to say, the tarrier or delayer.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Gouernour, book i. ch. xxiii.

For he wil vndoubtedli heare the praiers of his seruantes, when opportunitee of time shal bee, and the deleiyng thereof shall turne to the benefite of the Godly. Udall. Luke, ch. xviii.

As for the leafe of the hearb, [amethyst] it hath no fresh and lively hew, but resembleth a wineless weak wine, as one may say, that either drinketh flat and hath lost the colour, or else is much delayed with water. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 560.

So this proude Pharisie had an answere to delaie his pride.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 1574. Maister Latimer's Reply to a Sermon of a Frier in Cambridge.

So you, great Lord, that with your counsell sway
The burden of this kingdome mightily,
With like delights sometimes may eke delay
The rugged brow of carefull policie.
Spenser. To Sir Christopher Hatton.

Calme was the day, and through the trembling ayre,
Sweet-breathing Zephyrus did softly play
A gentle spirit, that lightly did delay
Hot Titan's beames, which then did glyster faire.
Id. Prothalamion.

How be it that is of moche gretter resorte of people, and therewith veray delayous; in soo moche, that as I have herde credyble persones say, some one mater hath hangyd there, in disputeon, ouer xx. yeres. Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 153.

But belike he was disposed to declare, if need were, what he was able to do in the law, in shifting off yᵉ matter by subtil delatories & friuolous cauilling about the law.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 1194. Bonar's Friuolous Shifts.

For his shippe-works faine delatory wants, and by winter be past, he partly comming, will (feare not) bee perfectly reclaymed.
Warner. Albion's England. Addition to Book II.

Then come thou man of earth, and see the way
That neuer yet was seene of Faeries sonne,
That neuer leads the trauailer astray;
But, after labours long, and sad delay,
Brings them to ioyous rest and endlesse blisse.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 10.

——— Which impli'd
Subjection, but requir'd with gentle sway,
And by her yielded, by him best receiv'd,
Yielded with coy submission, modest pride,
And sweet reluctant amorous delay.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book iv. l. 311.

God commanded them [the Israelites] at his bringing them out of Egypt to inuade the Canaanites, and promised them strength to ouercome them, and to possess the land, but they refused to go up; afterwards, when he bid them not, they would needs go up, and then they miscarried in the attempt: the application is easie, and terrible to the delayer or refuser.
Hammond. Works. Of a Late or Death Bed Repentance, vol. i. fol. 283.

Let us put away by that fortitude which is fit, the shamefull reproaches fastened upon our associates, which as I beheld (with much doubting and delay-making though it were) I yeelded to take upon me the name of Cæsar.
Holland. Ammianus. Julianus, fol. 73.

Whereupon Reimond on the next morrow, setting apart and giuing ouer all wedding pastimes, mustereth all his souldiers, and without anie delaienges marcheth towards the enemies.
Holinshed. Conquest of Ireland, book ii. ch. iii.

——— And one of them,
Whose pride, his youth had made the more extreme,
Said; now the many-wooer-honoured queene,
Will surely satiate her delayfull splene,
And one of vs, in instant nuptials take.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book iv. fol. 68.

Notwithstanding sinful men break his laws, and trample on them before his face; they "resist, and grieve, and quench his spirit;" yet he delays the execution of his judgment, that his "long-suffering may lead them to repentance."
Bates. On the Forgiveness of Sins, serm. 1.

[The rabble] growing impatient of any further delay, immediately broke open the doors of the prison, and divers of them rushed into the chamber where the two brothers [De Wit] were.
Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 204.

The wise man alarms the sluggard with approaching poverty, and his expressions are very applicable to the delayers of repentance: death comes like a traveller, gradually by silent steps; and, as an armed man, will irresistibly arrest them.
Bates. Sermons on Various Subjects, serm. 9.

These are they who keep no appointments, who are seldom true to their hour, who make their friends wait for them on all occasions, who often create uneasiness to all the company, and put a whole family out of order. What an unbecoming behaviour is this! What an ill aspect it bears! especially if these delayers are in any degree inferior, or the younger parts of a house.
Watts. Works. Sermon 9. vol. i.

DELEBLE, delere; delebilis, quod deleri potest; which may be erased, rubbed out. Tooke considers the A. S. dilg-ian, (of the same meaning,) to be the root of the Latin.

Various is the use thereof [black lead.]

1. For painters (besides some mixture thereof in making lead colours,) to draw the pictures of their pictures; viz. those shadowy lines made only to be unmade again.

2. For pens, so useful for scholars to note the remarkables they read, with an impression easily deleble without prejudice to the book. Fuller. Worthies. Cumberland.

DELE'CTABLE, DELE'CTABLY, DELECTA'TION. } Fr. and Sp. delectable; It. delectevole. The Latin delectare, Gesner says, is illicere et attrahere; compounded of de, and lactare, from lacere, to draw: of uncertain origin. Used, actively,

Able to attract, to allure, to entice; to hold out pleasing allurements or enticements; to please, to gratify.

I wol not long holde you in fable
Of all this gardin delectable.
Chaucer. The Romaunt of the Rose, fol. 123.

Philosophy songen softely and delectably the forseaid thynge, heping y^e^ dignity of her chere, & the weight of her words.
Id. The fourth Booke of Boecius, fol. 230.

Beth wel adviced of vaine delectacion
At your beginning think on terminacion.
Id. Certaine Balades, fol. 341.

Wo is me for the my brother Jonathas: delectable to me was thou excedynge. Bible, Anno 1551. 2 Kings, ch. I.

Therefore have I delectacion in infirmities, in rebukes, in nede, in persecucions, in anguishe, for Christ's sake.
Id. Ib. 2 Corinthians.

I view'd every plot; spent some delightful hours
In every garden, full of new-born flowers,
Delicious banks, and delectable bowers.
Quarles. To P. Fletcher, the Spenser of this Age.

And [Henry] therefore calling his lords vato London in an assembly tickled their eares with these delectable and smooth words.
Speed. Henry I. book ix. ch. iv. sec. 19.

And therefore, if any two men desire the same thing, which nevertheless they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies; and in the way to their end (which is principally their own conversation, and sometimes their delectation only) endeavour to destroy or subdue one another. Hobbes. Of Man, ch. xiii.

Sin is founded in bono jucundo, something that is delectable to the carnal nature: it is the universal character of carnal men, "they are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God."
Bates. Sermons on Various Subjects, serm. 2.

May we not delectably consider him as there stretching forth his arms of kindness, with them to embrace the world, and to receive all mankind under the wings of his protection.
Barrow. Sermon 32. vol. i.

Would we discharge all our duties without any reluctancy or regret, with much satisfaction and pleasure? love will certainly dispose us thereto; for it always acteth freely and cheerfully, without any compulsion or straining; it is ever accompanied with delectation. Id. Ib. vol. i.

Call, too, Demodocus, the bard divine,
To share my banquet, whom the Gods have blest
With pow'rs of song delectable, what theme
Soe'er his anfmated fancy choose.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book viii.

DE'LEGATE, v. DE'LEGATE, n. DE'LEGATE, adj DELEGA'TION, DE'LEGACY. } Fr. deleguer; Sp. delegar; It. and Lat. delegare; (de, and legare, from lege, when it denotes to send any one, under a certain law or rule of action, (certâ lege.) Vossius.

"Fr. deleguer; to assign, commit or appoint into an office, charge or commission." Cotgrave.

This government was by immediate substitution delegated to the Apostles by Christ himself, in traditione clavium, &c.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 41. Episcopacy Asserted.

I know the king expecteth we should say no more, than I do like this sentence, or, I do not like it. And that you know, Sir Daniel Dun, is the manner of the delegates and not to go farther.
State Trials. Case of the Countess of Essex.

That no jurisdiction was in the Ephesine presbyters, except a delegate, and subordinate, appears beyond all exception, by Saint Paul's first Epistle to Timothy.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 81. Episcopacy Asserted.

He presently makes delegation to William Bishop of London, Eustace of Ely, and Malgere of Worcester, that they should, with monitory advice, offer persuasion to the king of conformity to the Romish behest; if he persisted in constancy, they should denounce England under an interdict.
Drayton. Poly-olbion. Selden's Illustrations to Song 17.

They are great judges, a court of the last resort, they are great counsellers of state, and not only for the present, but as lawmakers, counsellers for the time to come; and this not by delegacy and commission, but by birth and inheritance.
State Trials. Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, &c.

Or else before any suit begin, the plaintiffe shall have his complaint approved by a set delegacy to that purpose; if it be of moment he shall be suffered, as before, to proceed, if otherwise they shall determine.
Burton. Democritus to the Reader.

The bishops being generally addicted to the former superstition, it was thought necessary to keep them under so arbitrary a power as that subjected them to; for they hereby held their bishopricks only during the king's pleasure, and were to exercise them as his delegates in his name, and by his authority.
Burnet. History of Reformation, Anno 1547.

Then Dr. Lewin spake, and said, that he would be glad that Mr. Cartwright should understand, that he was greatly deceived in that he called this oath, the oath ex officio; whereas it is by express words derived from the authority of the prince, by a delegate power unto them.
Strype. Life of Whitgift, Anno 1591.

Every one is at the disposure of his own will, when those who had by the delegation of the society, the declaring of the publick will, are excluded from it, and others usurp the place, who have no such authority or delegation.
Locke. On Civil Government, book ii. ch. xix.

For although God allowed capital punishment to be inflicted for the crime of lese majesty, on the person of the offender, by the delegated administration of the law; yet concerning his family or posterity, he reserved the inquisition of the crime to himself, and expressly forbid the magistrate to meddle with it, in the common course of justice.
Warburton. Divine Legation of Moses Dem. book iv. sec. 5.

This change from an immediate state of procuration and delegation to a course of acting as from original power, is the way in which all the popular magistracies in the world have been perverted from their purposes.
Burke. On the Cause of the Present Discontents.

DELE'TE, DELE'TION, DELE'TORY. } See DELEBLE, above. Lat. delere, etum, to erase or eradicate. J. Taylor more frequently writes deletery than deletory. See Great Exemplar, 140 and 162.

We owe our lives, limbs, fortunes, all we have to our dear country; delete this principle out of men's hearts, and you dissolve, yea ruin all civil society.
State Trials. Trial of Colonel Fiennes.

I stand ready with a pencil in one hand, and a sponge in the other, to add, alter, insert, expunge, enlarge, and delete, according to better information.
Fuller. General Worthies, ch. xxv.

The Scriptures, therefore, are the great repository and the great security of faith. They are also the great and only deletery of heresies. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book ii. ch. iii.

Yet, unless this proceed so far as to a total deletion of the sin, to the extirpation of every vicious habit, God is not glorified by our repentance, or we secure in our eternal interest.
Id. Sermon 5. part ii.

When the great extermination of the Jewish nation and their total deletion from being God's people, was foretold by Christ, and decreed by God; yet they had the 'Ανοχὴ of forty years, in which they were perpetually called to repentance.
Id. Sermon 12. part ii.

DELETE. — DELHI.

As it [confession] was most certainly intended as a deletory of sin, and might do its first intention, if it were equally manag'd; so now certainly it gives confidence to many men to sin, and to most men to neglect the greater and more effective parts of essential repentance.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 315. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. sec. 2.

And at the last day, "as many as have sinned without the law, as delivered to the Jews, shall be judged and perish, not according to the law of Moses," Rom. ii. but the law of nature that obliged them to do good, and restrain themselves from evil; of which the counterpart was not totally deleted in their hearts.
Bates. Eternal Judgment, ch. ii.

DELETE'RIAL, DELETE'RIOUS, DELE'TERY. } Gr. δηλ-εῖν, to hurt or injure. Hurtful, injurious, mischievous; and thus, extended to—poisonous, deadly.

Now that deliterious it [the Basilisk] may be at some distance and distructive without corporal contraction, what uncertainty soever there be in the effect, there is no high improbability in the relation. Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. vii.

Piso (who learned divers of their detestable secrets from the Brasilians) relates, that some of them are so skilful in the cursed art of tempering and allaying their poisons, that they will often hinder them from disclosing their deleterial nature for so long a time, that the subtile murderers do, as unexpectedly as fatally execute their malice or revenge.
Boyle. Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5. ch. xvii.

And as for ranunculus, that plant being reckoned among poisonous ones, and among these that raise blisters, it will be easily granted that it hath, as other poisons, an occult, deleterial faculty.
Id. Origin of Qualities and Forms.

Disease, nor doctor epidemick
Though stor'd with deletery med'cines,
(Which whosoever took is dead since,)
E'er sent so vast a colony
To both the under worlds as he.
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 2.

In some places, those plants which are entirely poisonous at home, lose their deleterious quality by being carried abroad: there are serpents in Macedonia so harmless as to be used as playthings for children. Goldsmith. The Citizen of the World, let. 90.

DELF, Goth. dalf, fovea, a pit. A. S. delf-an; Dutch, delv-en, to dig or delve. The verb is also written Delf or Dalf. See DELVE.

A ditch, a quarry, a mine; any thing delved or dug out.

The rock also and quarry in Carystia, it is not long since it gave over to bring forth certain bals or bottoms of soft stone, which they use to spin and draw into thread, in manner of flax; but now all this is quite gone, and hardly within the said delf shall a man meet with some few hairy threads of that matter, running here and there among the hard stones digged out from thence. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 1093.

Brim full of all those precious and exquisite commodities
Which any land or sea doth breed, or out of rivers spring:
Which in deep mines by delfe are found,
or havens by vessels bring. Id. Ib. fol. 517.

But if there be, yet could not such mines, without great pains and charges, if at all, be wrought; the delfs would be so flown with waters, (it being impossible to make any addits or sough to drain them,) that no gins or machines could suffice to lay and keep them dry. Ray. On the Creation, part ii.

DELHI.

DELHI, DIHLI, or D'HILLI, the name of a Province and a City once the Capital of Hindústán. The Province bearing this name is bounded by Láhór on the north and west, by Ajmír on the west and south, on the latter also by Málwah and Alla-ábád, and on the east by Aud'h, (Oude.)

Boundaries

Extent.

In the time of Akbár it measured according to Abú'l Fazl, (Ayeen Akbery, ii. 85,) 165 cós (330 miles) one way, and 140 (280 miles) another, was divided into eight Serkárs, (Hundreds,) and 232 Perganahs, (Districts,) and the amount of its revenue was 601,615,555 dáms, (about £1,880,000.)

The Serkárs into which this Súbah (Province) was then divided, and the number of mahalls or perganahs contained in each, respectively, were as follows:

1 Dihlí ..... 48.	5. Saháran-púr, or Sáran-púr ..... 36.
2. Badávan or Badáyún 13.	6. Réwárí ..... 12.
3. Kamáún or Kamáyún ..... 21.	7. Hísár Fírózeh .... 27.
4. Samb'hal ..... 47.	8. Ser-hind ..... 33.

The greatest extent of the Province of Dihlí from north to south is about 200 geographical miles, and it is about 150 from east to west in the widest part, but it varies much in breadth. Excepting on the north-western side, it is hilly and uneven, being traversed by two parallel ranges of hills, running from south-southwest to north-northeast, between Jaya-pura and the Jamunà; the first and northernmost of these ranges is inhabited by Gújars, the second by Méwátís. Besides the Ganges and Jamunà, which traverse this Province in its greatest length; it is watered by several smaller streams, some flowing from the north-western hills, such as the Gag'har or Gang'har, and Márkandah, which flow into the Saraswatí and the Chittang, which passed near Hísár Fírózeh, and was lost in the sands about fifty miles to the south-west of that town. It is now, however, to be traced no further than J'hínd, and in the dry season not so far. The great sandy desert in which the waters of all the last mentioned streams are absorbed, forms the western boundary of this Province, and has been rapidly encroaching on the cultivable soil, since the diminution of its population, and the poverty and mismanagement of its petty sovereigns have prevented the canals from being kept open, or other means used to promote improvement of their territories. Near Najaf-ábád and in some other places there are j'hils or shallow lakes.

Rivers.

The Sábí, Kásúntí, and D'háhán, marked as rivers in the map, are merely nálás, or torrents, which have no water except during the rains; and it is difficult to discover even the site of the celebrated canal called Sháh-nehr (King's River) and Nehri Bihisht (River of Paradise.)

Soil and Population.

In the central districts to the north of Dihlí there is much wood; and the whole tract between Sónpat'h, J'hínd, and Kaït'hal forms one vast forest. The soil is here level and fertile, but thinly inhabited. Beyond the Gag'har the ground rises, the soil is heavy, and the country more populous. The natives are here Sik'hs. A district lying between Kaït'hal and Kárnal, and containing eight perganahs, is called Nardak, and inhabited by a predatory tribe, named Rangars, who sometimes assemble and make inroad upon their more peaceful neighbours.

Since this Province has formed a part of the British dependencies in India, it has been subdivided in the following manner:

DELHI.

I. The assigned Territories.
II. Róhil-k'hand :
1. District of Morád-ábád.
2. District of Bareïlí.
3. District of Sháh Jehán-púr.
III. Saháran-púr :
1. North Saháran-púr.
2. South Saháran-púr.
IV. Haryáná.
V. Patyálá and other petty Sik'h States.

Assigned Territory.

I. The first of these divisions is the Territory consisting of eighteen Perganahs on the west side of the Jamunà (Jumnà) to the north and south-west of Dihlí, and including that city which has been assigned for the maintenance of the Royal household, since the expulsion of the Mahrattahs in 1803. Some of these districts belonged to the Súbah of Agrah, according to the former division of the Empire. The revenue of the southern part of this territory, which in 1806 amounted only to 432,432 rupees (£54,000.) per annum, in 1811 produced 1,256,505, (£150,000.) and left a large surplus after the charges to which it was appropriated had been defrayed.

Dihlí, or more properly D'hilli, in latitude 28° 36′ north and longitude 77° 10′ east, long the Metropolis of the Moghul Empire, and once covering an area of nearly twenty miles every way, is placed on the right bank of the Jamunà, in a hilly, but rather barren country. It was one of the largest and most flourishing Capitals in India long before the Mohammedan invasion, and was then called Indraprest'ha, (Indarpat) (Hill-side) from the declivity on which it was built. The fort of Ráják Pit'hórà (Prït'hiví Ráí) was inhabited by Cutbu'd-dín and Shensu'd-dín at the commencement of the XIIIth century, having been erected by Prït'hiví, one of the last Hindù Sovereigns, about half a century before. It was enlarged and adorned by most of the Moghuls; and in 1631 Sháh Jehán founded an entirely new city on the western bank of the river, which he named after himself, Sháh Jehánábád, (Sháh Jehán's Abode.) It is about seven miles in circumference, built upon two rocky hills, called Jajalà and Bejalà pahár, and surrounded on three sides by a wall of brick and stone, but without artillery. It has seven gates, and near that which leads to Ajmír there is a spacious Madrasah (College) built by Ghází-ed-dín Khán, but now unoccupied. The Palaces of Camaru'd-dín Khán, Alí Merdán, Gházíu'd-dín, and Sefdar Jang; those of Sàádet Khán, and the unfortunate Dárá Shekóh; the Jámî Masjíd, or Great Mosque, the building of which took up six years, and required ten lacs of rupees, (£125,000.;) the Mosque of Róshana'd-daúleh, whence that monster Nádir Sháh looked on while the inhabitants were massacred by his troops in cold blood; and the gardens of Cudiyyah Beïgum, mother of Mohammed Sháh, formed toward the close of the XVIIth century, are only a few of the public buildings which still render Dihlí one of the most remarkable cities in Asia; its streets, however, with only two exceptions, are narrow and winding, for none of the Asiatic nations, except the Chinese, have any notion of the comforts and advantages arising from attention to cleanliness, regularity, and airiness in their towns. The Bázárs are well supplied, and the Chándní chaúk (Moonlight market) is the most brilliant among them. The Palace of Sháh Jehán is on the bank of the Jamunà, about a mile in circumference, and surrounded by a wall of red stone. Adjoining to it is the ruined fortress of Selim-gar'h, and six or seven miles to the north of the city is an enclosure surrounded by a high brick wall, nearly as large as the area of the Palace, which once contained the garden of Shalih-már, and a country seat of the Moghul, which Bernier says (Voyage, ii. 75) was véritablement une belle et royale maison de plaisance. The Díván Khánah, or Hall of Audience, had almost all fallen in, when Colonel Francklin visited the place in 1793, but the gardens still contained many fine trees of very large size; and the walls of the Haram many of their former decorations. "The prospect to the southward of Shalih-már, as far as the eye can reach," says Colonel Francklin, (As. Res. iv. 431,) "is covered with the remains of extensive gardens, pavilions, mosques, and burial-places, all desolate, and in ruins. The environs of this once magnificent and celebrated city appear now nothing more than a shapeless heap of ruins; and the country round about is equally forlorn."

DELHI.

Canal of Alí Merdán Khán.

That part of Alí Merdán Khán's Canal which traverses the suburb called Moghul-párah, was cleared by order of the British Government in 1810. Its whole length from the neighbourhood of Karnál, where it issues from the Jamunà, to Dihlí, is more than 100 miles. It was still open at the time of the Afghán invasion in 1763, but has since been filled up by the accumulation of sand, which has threatened to overwhelm the upper districts of this Province, the population of which has been diminished by the devastations which it suffered from the Persian, Afghán, and Mahrattah invasions, and the endless feuds of the petty Chieftains by whom it is governed.

Antiquity of Delhi.

The population of Dihlí has never been accurately ascertained, but is probably under 200,000 souls. The notion of its being the Metropolis of India, is so deeply impressed on the minds of the natives, that many independent States have claimed a right to be considered as subjects of the British Government, in consequence of Great Britain being mistress of this city, which affords, as may be remarked, a strong proof of the great antiquity of Dihlí, and of the length of time during which it has been the seat of Monarchy in Hindústán.

Productions.

On the banks of the Jamunà, the most fertile land in the neighbourhood, wheat, rice, millet, (Sorghum or Panicum,) are cultivated, and indigo and cottons are still mannfactured in and about the city; shawls, fruit, and horses are imported from Kábul and Kashmír; black and red cornelians, pírózáhs, (turquoise stones,) and bidrí (tutenag) huccah bottoms are generally to be found in the bázárs.

Rewarre.

Réwárí, in 28° 8′ north and 76° 30′ east, was in the time of Akbár the Capital of a District (Serkár) measuring 1,155,011 bíg'hás (each 120 feet square) and 10 biswahs, and produced a revenue estimated at 6,301,465 rupees. (Ayeen Akbery, ii. 255.) In 1805, however, it had suffered so much from protracted warfare and misgovernment, that its chief township was not expected to yield more than 140,000 rupees, though rated by Abú'l Fazl at 298,921. The town of Réwárí is a considerable depôt for the commerce between Dihlí and the western territories, and is protected by three battalions of infantry, stationed in cantonments three miles distant from it.

Panniput.

Pánípat or Pání-pati, (Lord of Water,) in 29° 19′

DELHI.

north and 76° 54′ east, is about four miles in circumference, and has some remains of the brick wall by which it was anciently enclosed. Its trade, formerly very considerable, but now almost entirely ruined by the wars and anarchy which so long desolated all the Upper India, consisted principally in salt, grain, cotton, and coarse sugar. The Tomb of Sherífu'd-dín, Abú Alí, a canonized Calender, or Mohammedan Monk, brings crowds of pilgrims to this place. The hair which grows in the place of a lock cut off and suspended as an offering at the shrine of this Saint, cannot be cropped again except in this holy sanctuary; and the reigning Moghul, Akbár II. has long been desirous of visiting it for the purpose of divesting his Royal head of one of these troublesome tresses, consecrated, in his infancy, by his father, Sháh Aálem; but the expense and trouble which such a pilgrimage would occasion, had prevented the Emperor from gratifying his wishes when the report, whence this anecdote is taken, was drawn up.

Two of the most memorable battles recorded in the modern history of Hindústán, were fought in the neighbourhood of Pánipat. The first terminated the reign of the Pat'hán Dynasty, by the defeat and death of Ibráhím Lódí, whose army was completely routed by Sultán Bábur, one of the family of Tímúr, in 1525. The second drove the Mahrattahs out of Dihlí, and for a time restored the supreme power to the Mohammedans. Ahmed Sháh Abdálí, the Sovereign of the Durráni Afgháns, attacked Sadá-siva, the B'háú or Commander of the Mahrattahs, and completely discomfitted them after a contest which lasted from daybreak till noon, on the 7th of January, 1761. The Afgháns had 80,000, and the Mahrattahs 70,000 regular troops, and there were crowds of irregular forces on each side.

Curnaul.

Karnál, in 29° 38′ north and 76° 46′ east, was a place of considerable trade, as long as the Canal of Alí Merdán Khán was kept open; for upon it the productiveness of the neighbouring country in a great measure depends.

Kuttub-minar.

The Cutb Minár, about nine miles south-west by south from Dihlí, is a singular monument of antiquity. It resembles the frustum of a large cone resting upon a seven and twenty sided polygon. Like the minarets of Turkish Mosques, it is encircled at intervals by balconies, of which there are four; the first at 90, the second at 140, the third at 180, the fourth at 203 feet. A winding staircase leads to its summit, which is covered with a cupola of red granite, 242 feet from the ground. It stands near the tomb of the founder of the Pat'hán Dynasty, Cutbu'd-dín Ibeg, who reigned five years, and was killed by an accident in A. H. 607, (A. D. 1210.) This Minár (Minaret) was destined to adorn a Mosque which that Emperor began, but did not live to finish. (As. Res. iv. 305.)

Lawt of Feeroze Shaw.

A more remarkable monument, however, is the Lát or Staff of Fírúz Sháh close to the City of Dihlí. It appears to have been confounded by Bernier (ii. 75) with the building last mentioned, though differing in its dimensions and origin. It is a tapering column rising from the centre of a building of three stories, which conceals its base. This is called the Shikárgáh or hunting-box of Fírúz Sháh, and formed, probably, a part of the town of Firúz-ábád, founded by that Prince in A. H. 755, (A. D. 1354.) (Dow's Transl. of Ferishtah, i. 327.) The Lát is a shaft formed from one block of a reddish stone, twelve feet four inches in circumference at the place where it rises above the flat roof of the building, and thirty-seven feet in height from the same level to its summit. One third only of the whole is visible according to Amín Rází (in the Heft Iclím;) and there are inscriptions engraved round it in characters "which," the same writer adds, "the most intelligent of all religions have been unable to explain." Of these inexplicable characters an accurate copy may be found in the Asiatic Researches, (vii. 175,) and it appears that there are similar inscriptions on an ancient column at Allah-ábád. The whole number of those on the Lát are six, five in the unknown, and one in the Déva-nágarí letter and Sanscrit language. This last, which has been translated by Mr. Colebroke, shows that the column is a memorial of the victories of Vísal Déó, King of Sámb'har (Sákamb'hari, in 26° 50′ north and 75° 10′ east,) erected in the year 1220 of the era of Vikramá-dityà, (A. D. 1163,) only two centuries before the reign of Fíruz.

II. Róhil-k'hand, or the Róhílla territory, derives its name from the Róhílla Afgháns, by whom it was gradually subdued in the early part of the last century. It is called in Sanscrit Kat'hér, and extends from the G'hát or Pass of Lál-dáng, in 29° 50′ north and 78° 13′ east,) at the foot of the Kamáún hills, along the bank of the Ganges to a point opposite to Farrukhábád, in 27° 24′ north and 79° 27′ east. It has nearly a triangular form, and is bounded on the north and east by the Almórá and Kamáún hills, on the west by the Ganges, and on the south by the Kingdom of Aud'h, (Oude.) Part of the Súbahs of Agrah and Dihlí, according to Abú'l Fazl's division of the Empire, is comprehended within this portion of the latter Province as it is now fixed. Its mean length may be estimated at 180 miles, and its greatest breadth at half that distance. The soil, for the most part a rich black mould, with here and there patches of red earth mixed with sand, is uncommonly fertile, being principally alluvial earth washed down from the north-eastern hills; and the whole tract is one vast plain stretching from the mountains to the Ganges, which separates it from the peninsula called the Dú-áb, (i. e. Two Waters) of that river and the Jamunà. The western branch of the G'hág'hrà or Sarjú washes its north-eastern angle, and the Rám-gangà and Dúwah Garrah traverse it in all its length. The first rises twenty-five miles south-west of Almórá and entering Róhil-k'hand by the Kálig'hát, joins the Ganges near Kanauj after having received the waters of many tributary streams. It is navigable for a considerable distance. The second passes by the town of Pilib'hít, and just below Sháh Jehán-púr receives the Gambara, and carries the united waters into the Rám-gangà near its confluence with the Ganges. Three rivers from the same hills, the Sárdá, Karnál, and Kurigálá, which all cross the District of Khaïrá-gar'h, wash down gold mixed with their sand. Numerous canals and reservoirs also contribute to distribute the waters of these and many other streams over the whole face of the country.

The fertility of the soil, and its great commercial facility by means of water-carriage, rendered this territory an object of much attention in the earlier periods of the Moghul Empire, and several Sovereigns of the Pat'hán Dynasty held their Courts at Badáún, one of its Principalities.

Sugar, and cotton, raw and manufactured, are the staple commodities of this country; a considerable trade is also carried on with the inhabitants of the hills on the north and east, who import borax, bees' wax, gums and drugs, musk, cow-tails, copper, and iron. In the woods at the foot of the hills, the Mimosa catechu (in Sanscrit, K'hádira) is very abundant, and its extract, called Kat'h, the Terra Japonica of our druggists, is a considerable article of trade, being chewed by the natives with their betel and chúnam.

Productions. These forests also furnish much valuable timber, such as pines, sometimes ninety feet long, sísús, (Dalbergia Sísú,) túns, (Cedrela Tuna,) and sábs, (Shorca robusta,) which are floated down the rivers, especially the Garrah and Pilib'hít, where a considerable trade in wood is carried on. In the neighbourhood of that town elephants abound, and a Dócróghah (Superintendant) was stationed there by Asufu'd-daulah, Nabob of Aud'h, to regulate the taking of them and exact the proportion (one-fourth of the whole) claimed by the Sovereign.

This extensive portion of the Province of Dihlí is now subdivided into the Districts or Jurisdictions of Morád-ábád, Bareïlí, and Sháh Jehán-púr.

Moraud-abud. 1. Morád-ábád, the northern and westernmost of these districts, is separated by the Almórá mountains from Gar'hwál, and bounded on the south and east by the District of Bareïlí, on the west the Ganges separates it from the District of Saháran-púr. In 1808 its lands were thus estimated: cultivable, 3,803,870 bíg'hás, unfit for tillage, 727,860, and 1,195,640 held rent-free; but the total area, according to a more accurate admeasurement, amounts to 6,800,000 bíg'hás. The land marked as unfit for cultivation affords excellent pasturage.

The perganahs (townships) near the hills are very productive, but unhealthy on account of the abundance of wood and water, while those midway between the Ganges and the hills have a mixed sandy soil, and depend for their produce upon a favourable season. Near the river they have better crops, but are liable to be injured by inundations.

duc- Sugar, cotton, and wheat, are raised in large quantities; but the Pat'háns are more a pastoral than an agricultural people; and, in 1808, tillage was not carried on to the extent which was desirable. Jóár (Andropogon and Bicolor sorghum) and bájrá (Panicum spicatum) are the kinds of grain most used by the peasantry.

ulation This District contained twenty-six Towns and 9430 villages in 1808, and its population was then estimated at 1,421,000 souls. It was in a very flourishing state under the Pat'hán Government; but was entirely ruined by the Mahrattah invasion and the mal-administration of the agents of the Nabob of Aud'h. In 1801 it was transferred to the British Government, and three years afterwards was formed into a separate jurisdiction.

l Revenue. The Jamá, or revenue, assessed on the lands, which in 1808-9 amounted to 2,397,599 rupees, (£299,687.) had gradually risen to 2,546,599 (£318,324.) in 1814-15, a plain indication of its improvement; and as many of the exemptions claimed and allowed till investigated, would certainly on examination prove to be frauds, the revenue has no doubt been since that period still farther increased without any additional burden on the people.

anditti. Most formidable bands of robbers long infested this District, and kept the inhabitants in a continual state of alarm; but the vigilance of the British Magistrates had, in 1814, nearly succeeded in exterminating them, and they were gradually conciliated by the judicious management of Mr. Seton, who suggested the granting allowances in money and land to their leaders; and thus, at a small expense, secured the assistance and support of those very men who before were the scourge of the country. These hereditary plunderers were almost entirely Játs, Ahírs, (herdsmen,) and Méwátís, from the north-western frontiers, stimulated by a savage love of plunder, the distress to which their forefathers had been reduced by the excesses of the Mahrattahs, and the immemorial animosities existing between them and the Gujars, (or Gurjars,) another Ráj-put tribe. They were headed by some of the poorer zemíndárs, (landholders,) whose estates had been ruined by the invading armies, or by the extortions of the Nabob of Aud'h's agents.

The principal Cities in this Jurisdiction, are Nájíb-ábád, Nagínah, Rám-púr, Samb'hal, Morád-ábád, and Dárá-nagar.

Najeeba-baud. Najíb-ábád, in 29° 37′ north and 73° 12′ east, was built by Najíbu'd-daúlah, so often mentioned in the History of Sháh Aálam. It is situated in a low swampy country, and is therefore unhealthy; but is well and regularly built, and was once the great emporium for the trade from the north and west of Hindústán.

Naggeena. Nagínah, in 29° 27′ north and 78° 20′ east, contains a population of 18,000 souls.

Raum-poor Rám-púr, (i. e. Rám's town,) in 28° 50′ north and 78° 54′ east, is the Capital of a Já-gír, or feudal territory, long independent, but subsequently annexed in fee to the Súbah-dárí of Aud'h. The city is on the left bank of the Kósilà, one of the most considerable tributaries of the Rám-gangà. At the death of Faïzu'llah Khán, this city contained 10,000 inhabitants; but subsequent misrule has nearly ruined it. The Pashtú (Afghán) language is still much in use in this part of Róhilk'hand.

Rám-púr was secured to Faïzu'llah Khán, a Pat'hán (or Afghán) Chief, at the peace of Lál-dáng, in 1774. It then produced a revenue of 30 lacs (3,000,000) of rupees, or nearly £375,000. After the death of that Chief, in 1794, his son and successor was assassinated by another of his sons, who was on that account attacked by the Nabob of Aud'h with the aid of a British force, and defeated in the dearly purchased victory of Bareïlí, in which his European allies lost no less than fourteen officers and 600 men. The treasures of Faïzu'llah Khán, amounting to 332,000 gold mohurs =4,814,000 rupees, or more than £600,000., were soon afterwards delivered up to the Nabob, (Asufu'd-daúlah,) who presented the British army with eleven lacs, (£127,000.) An estate (já-gír) with a revenue of ten lacs (about £120,000.) was reserved for the legitimate heir of Faïzu'llah, then a minor; but his revenues were embezzled by his guardians during his minority, and in 1816 his own dissipation, the rapacity of his prime-Minister, and the turbulence of his Chiefs, had reduced his subjects to extreme misery, and rendered them dangerous neighbours to the inhabitants of the adjoining territories.

Sumbul. Samb'hal, in 28° 37′ north and 78° 29′ east, was the Capital of a District (Serkár) bearing the same name, according to the Moghul division of the Súbah (Province) of Dihlí. It yielded a revenue of 3,322,448 dams, (=8306 rupees,) and these Serkárs contained

DELHI. forty-seven mahals or perganahs, measured 4,047,193 big'hás and two biswahs, and yielded a revenue of 66,341,431 dáms, (= 1,408,535 rupees, =£180,000. nearly,) with Suyurghál, or feudal tenures, assessed at 2,892,394 dáms, (72,309 rupees.)

Morad-abad. Morád-ábád, in 28° 51′ north and 78° 42′ east, is the residence of the Magistrate and Collector. It was formerly a place of considerable importance, and possessed a Mint.

Daraunugger. Dárá-nagar, in 29° 17′ north and 78° 10′ east, was named after Dárá Shekúh, the unfortunate son of Sháh Jehán, as Morád-ábád was probably after his brother, Morád Baksh.

Loll-dong. Lál-dáng (Red-peak) is one of the most celebrated g'háts or passes in Hindústán. It is a deep valley lying in 29° 50′ north and 78° 13′east, and formed by a rivulet which separates the Province of Dihlí from Gar'hwál, or Srí-nagar. It was to this place that the troops of the Nabob of Aud'h, supported by their British auxiliaries, pursued the remnant of the Róhíllahs, after the decisive battle of Kutírá, in 1774; and immediately afterwards concluded the treaty of peace by which all the Róhil-k'hand, except Rám-púr, was given up to the Nabob.

Barayly. 2. The District or Jurisdiction of Bareïlí, like Morád-ábád, is bounded on the east by the Kamáún Hills, on the south by the District of Sháh Jehán-púr and the territories reserved to Aud'h, on the west by the Ganges, and on the north by Morád-ábád. It formed a part of the Serkár of Badáún, in the Moghul division of the Province. It is well cultivated, except near the hills, where there is much wood. Grain, sugar, and timber are the principal articles of raw produce; salt and cloths of a good quality the chief manufactures.

Productions.

Character of the natives. The principal Towns are, the Capital, Bareïlí, Pili'bhít, Chandaúsí, and Badáún. The inhabitants are, with few exceptions, a warlike race of Mohammedans, discontented because they are inactive and attract no attention. For attachment to their leaders they are almost unrivalled, but deeply rooted habits of insubordination unfit them for any service where discipline is required. The Róhíllah Afgháns are a tall, handsome race of men, fair and well-featured in comparison of the Hindús. The latter, though nearly equal in numbers, have been grievously oppressed ever since the Pat'háns (Afgháns) made themselves masters of their country. The population is very considerable, but its real amount has never been ascertained.

Revenue. In November, 1801, this District, from which that of Sháh Jehán-púr had not then been separated, was ceded to the East India Company by the Nabob of Aud'h. In 1808 the Jamá, or assessment on the land, amounted to only 1,492,640 rupees, (£150,000.;) but in 1813 it had risen to more than thirty-two lacs (£320,000.) and would have yielded more than thirty-four and a half (£345,000.) had not the landholders neglected the cultivation of their estates in order to obtain more favourable terms. The vast extent of this District, and the refractory character of the great landholders, rendered it necessary to subdivide it, as the duties of the Collector were soon found to be more than one person could execute.

The western part of the District therefore was formed into the Collectorship of Bareïlí; the eastern into that of Sháh Jehán-púr. The official business of the Collectors in this part of the Company's territories, is among the most arduous which their civil servants have to perform. To realize claims which have been suffered to lie dormant through fraud or negligence, and still more to recover arrears where the proprietors are always disposed to settle the account by recourse to arms, and where no purchasers can be found if the estate be put up to sale, requires no ordinary firmness and vigilance. The Magistrates, likewise, have no less arduous a task; robbery and murder by individual and collected plunderers, cannot but be common in a country surrounded by half-civilized tribes, ill-organized Governments, and vast tracts of forests; not to mention the hereditary habits of at least one-half of the population, whose forefathers were trained to the desultory and predatory warfare of the Pat'háns. Agriculture is almost the only peaceful pursuit of the Róhíllahs; they have scarcely any foreign trade, and they are therefore more backward in the arts of civilized life than almost any of the other inhabitants of Northern Hindústán. All these circumstances combine to give employment to the Judge of the Bareïlí District, and fill the prisons with criminals. In 1815 there were no less than 1700 in that division under sentence of hard labour. Numerous as the Officers of Justice are, they are still insufficient; and under such an accumulation of counteracting circumstances, it is no wonder if their exertions have not been crowned with success, and the police of the District have not attained the requisite efficiency.

The City of Bareïlí, in 28° 23′ north and 79° 16′ east, supposed to contain a population of 70,000 souls, has a large irregularly built citadel, remarkable neither for strength nor elegance. Its principal sources of opulence are a manufacture of brass ewers, and the produce of the surrounding country; particularly the latter, as the neighbouring lands are well watered. The customs received at Bareïlí in 1812 amounted to 45,000 rupees (£4500.;) and in 1813 they had risen to 165,000. Háfiz Rahmet Khán, the celebrated Róhíllah Chieftain, killed at the battle of Katírá in 1774, made Bareïlí his Capital, and was buried there. It is now the residence of the Collector and the Judge of a Court of Circuit and Appeal, to whose jurisdiction the following Districts occupying an area of more than 18,000 square miles are subordinate: 1. Khán-púr, 2. Farrukh-ábád, 3. Itáwà, 4. Agrah, 5. Alí-gar'h, 6. Mérat, 7. Saháran-púr, 8. Morád-ábád, 9. Bareïlí. In the time of Akbár it was included in the Serkár of Badáún, and assessed at 312,636 rupees, (£31,268.)

Pilib'hít, in 28° 42′ north and 79° 42′ east, a place of much trade under Háfiz Rahmet, was almost ruined under the agents of the Nabob of Aud'h, but has since recovered a good deal of its former prosperity.

Bisaúlí, in 28° 19′ north and 78° 46′ east, (in Sanscrít, Visávalí,) though a Town of considerable importance under the Moghuls and Róhíllahs, is now in a very depressed condition.

Chandaúsí, in 28° 26′ north and 78° 38′ east, was formerly the great salt-mart of the Province.

3. The District or Jurisdiction of Sháh Jehán-púr, forming the southern and eastern division of the Collectorship of Bareïlí, lies between that Town, the Kamáún Hills, the western branch of the G'hagrà, and the confines of Aud'h; and contains eighteen Perganahs. In several of them, as Púran-púr, Kaïrígar'h, DELHI. Kutár, and Powání, there are large tracts of waste land, once richly cultivated; they began, however, to be again rendered productive soon after the cession of the Province to the East India Company, and have, probably, before this, contributed materially to increase the revenue.

ity of Jeaun-poor. Sháh Jehán-púr, the Capital of this District, is situated in 27° 52′ north and 79° 41′ east, and is said to be more wealthy and nearly as populous as Bareïlí. Its inhabitants probably amount to 50,000 souls. In 1808 it yielded a revenue of 812,059 rupees, (£81,205.) and in 1817, 1,335,265, (£133,526.) with every prospect of a rapid and permanent increase.

udayoon. Badáún, or Badáyún, (in Sanscrit, Badávan,) was the chief Town of a District (Serkár) according to the Moghul registers, and was assessed at 183,939 rupees. The Serkár measured 8,093,850 big'hás and 10 biswahs, and yielded a revenue of 867,926 rupees, exclusive of the feudal rents (Suyúrghál) amounting to 457,181 dáms, (11,429 rupees.) It first fell under the sway of the Mohammedans in A. D. 1203, but has long since lost all its former splendour and prosperity.

hyreeur. Khaïrígar'h is a Perganah separated from the rest of the District by the Kálí, a branch of the G'haghrà. Its Capital, bearing the same name, is in 28° 19′ north and 80° 47′ east. The whole tract is almost an uninterrupted forest of sál-trees, (Shorca robusta,) and though nominally assessed at 6000 rupees, has never yielded a single ana to Government. Its climate is peculiarly fatal to strangers; and before the reduction of Népál it was continually harassed by the mountaineers dependant on that power. At the conclusion of the Népálese war it was ceded to the King of Aud'h, together with the Tariyání, or border country, between his own territories and those of Népál, in repayment of one of the karóri (10,000,000) of rupees lent to the East India Company.

Sehauruhpoor. III. The Serkár of Saháran-púr, with the rest of the Mahrattah conquests in the Peninsula (Dó-ab) of the Jamunà and Ganges, was subjected to Great Britain on the final dissolution of the Mahrattah confederacy in 1803; and in 1804 it was subdivided into the two Districts of North and South Saháran-púr or Mérat.

North Sehaurunpoor. 1. North Saháran-púr is enclosed by the Kamáún Hills on the north, Mérat on the south, and the Ganges and Jamunà on the east and west. In the time of Akbár it contained thirty-six Townships, (Mahalls or Perganahs,) measured 3,530,370 big'hás and 3 biswahs, (= 21,364,458 square feet,) and paid 87,839,359 dáms (2,195,984 rupees) into the Treasury, besides 4,991,485 dáms on account of the feudal tenures, (Suyúrghál.) Though perfectly flat, the level is too high above the surface of the rivers to be liable to inundation. The hills on the north-east rise abruptly, and are the natural boundary of the vast plain formed by the Ganges and its tributary streams in their progress towards the ocean. In this rich compost of alluvial matter, grain, sugar, cotton, indigo, and almost any article of vegetable produce, may be raised with the greatest facility, and in most abundant crops; but the Civil wars by which Hindústán was desolated before and after the death of Aúreng-zíb, and still more the incredible excesses committed by the invading armies of Nádir Sháh, the Afgháns, and the Mahrattahs, had gone far towards reducing this paradise into a wilderness, when it became part of the British dominions in 1803. The heat in this part of India is intense in summer, while the cold in winter is severe, from the proximity of the Alpine summits of Himálaya. DELHI.

Revenue. The assessment (jáma) on the lands in this District, amounting to 1,419,314 rupees, (£150,000.) in 1809, had risen to 1,893,743 (nearly £190,000.) in 1812, and was augmented by the amount of four lacs and a half, (£55,000.) in the following year, by the death of Rájá Diyál Sing'h, who held his estate for life at a very low rent. In the same year, on the decease of Rájá Diyál Sing'h, another estate fell in, which, in 1815, was let for 96,495 rupees; so that the whole assessment in that year could not fall short of £300,000. Considerable tracts of land were, however, still waste; and the canal made by Zábitah Khán had long been entirely obstructed, so that the Province still possessed resources which would tend greatly to augment its revenue.

Saharunpoor. Saháran-púr, the residence of the Judge and Magistrate, is in 29° 56′ north and 77° 26′ east. According to Abú'l Fazl, (Ayeen Akbery, ii. 254,) it was assessed at 173,788 rupees. The average number of criminals confined in the prison there, in 1813, was 268.

Hurridwar. Hari-dwár, (the Gate of Hari, i. e. Vishnu,) is situated near the Ganges, where it first enters the plains of Hindústán, in 29° 57′ north and 78° 8′ 30″ east. It is also called Har-dwára (from Hara or Siva) and Gangá-dwára, being the place where the Ganges (Gangà) passes through the last range of hills. The Town is a single street fifteen feet wide, and about a quarter of a mile long; and is, at certain seasons, much frequented on account of its mélá, or fair, which is held at the Vernal equinox. During the whole period that the Sun is passing from Pisces into Aries, the Hindùs believe it to be an act of meritorious devotion to bathe in the sacred stream, especially in places consecrated by the exploits of any of their Deities. Such is the Hará-eà païrì, or foot of Mehá-déva, (Siva,) at the northern extremity of Hari-dwára, where there is a Temple dedicated to Siva, rising from the bed of the river, and ag'hát, or passage down the water's edge for the use of the pilgrims, who on this occasion repair in thousands and tens of thousands from every quarter of Hindústán; and, like the Musulmáns in the holy month at Mekkah, combine the advancement of their temporal with that of their spiritual interests, by entering into the business of the fair, as well as expiating their sins in the waters of the Ganges. On every twelfth year, when Jupiter is in Aquarius, the fair is termed Cumb'ha Mélá, (Pot-fair,) and celebrated with extraordinary festivities.

Festival of Coomb maila. The bathing begins when the Sun enters Aries, which now takes place, according to the Hindù computation, early in April; and such are the multitudes collected by this festival, that not less than 2,500,000 were assembled when General Hardwicke attended it in 1796, (As. Res. vi. 312;) and Captain Raper, who was present at the subsequent one, in 1808, observes, (As. Res. vi. 453,) that "if we estimate the number at two millions of souls, we shall probably fall short of the reality." The village of Hari-dwár thus becomes the great emporium for the northern and southern parts of India, and the adjoining countries east and west. The bankers in all the great commercial cities send their agents to the fair, and almost all the sales or purchases are made by means of hundís, or bills of exchange, negociable in any part of Hindústán; on which transactions, as may be supposed, enormous DELHI. profits are realized. The want of a convenient bezesteïn, where the goods could be lodged and exhibited, was then severely felt, and has, perhaps, been since remedied. Horses, mules, camels, kakkar, (a kind of tobacco,) antimony, asafœtida, dried fruits, (as apricots, prunes, almonds, pistachio-nuts, pomegranates, raisins, and figs,) from Afghánistán to the north of India; shawls, and other woollen manufactures, (dútus and pattús,) from Kashmír and Amrit-sar; spotted turbands, (chírás,) looking-glasses, toys, brass and ivory manufactures from Jay-púr; shields from Róhilk'hand, Lak'hnau, (Lucknow,) and Silhet; bows and arrows from Muttán and the Dú-áb; rock-salt from Láhór; calicoes (báftahs) and piece goods from Rahn in the Penj-áb; camels and coarse flannels (loïs) from Márwár; castor-oil nuts, (kharuá, ricinus, or palma Christi,) cocoa-nuts, sarcenets, muslins, and woollen cloths, from the Company's territories, of which the coarsest sorts only find any sale; may be mentioned as some of the commodities carried to the fair of Hari-dwâr.

The cattle brought by the northern caravans, (cáfilahs,) answer the two purposes of conveying merchandise and passengers; by which they are rendered profitable on the road, and being sold to advantage, secure a double return. Two passengers are accommodated in a sort of wooden pannier, on each side of a camel; and the charge for a seat, during a journey from Márwár, near Cape Comorin, a distance of more than 2000 miles, is nine rupees, or eighteen shillings! Amrit-sar, in 31° 45′ north and 74° 50′ east, is the place of rendezvous at the end of February, whence the cáfilahs proceed through the Sik'h country to the Satlej; after crossing which, they enter the British territory, and are no longer exposed to the attacks of banditti, as in the preceding part of their progress. It is very observable, that while the Mahrattahs, a Hindù power, were in possession of Hari-dwár, a kind of poll-tax was levied on the pilgrims as they went to bathe; this has been entirely abolished by the British authorities; but, odd as it may seem, it is doubtful whether this has proved to be a popular measure; for the impediments occasioned by the former oppressive system, were considered as greatly enhancing the merits of the pilgrimage. Many of the pilgrims merely stay one night, departing as soon as they have performed their ablutions. Happily the neighbouring countries are among the most productive in the world, or the multitudes assembled at these fairs extraordinary, would certainly create a famine.

"The horses and cattle are dispersed," says Captain Raper, (As. Res. xi. 454,) "indiscriminately all over the fair, which is held in the bed of the river, at this season nearly dry. After the first of April, the influx of people is so great, that few vacant spots are to be found in the vicinity of the market; huts and temporary habitations are observed to rise in every direction; and from a barren deserted bed of sand, the whole surface is seen in motion. It is curious to observe the different casts of countenance in the various tribes who are here assembled; and the contrast of character would furnish an excellent subject for the pencil of a Hogarth. The most conspicuous personages are the Fakírs, of whom there are several sects; but the principal are the Gósáéns or Sanyásís, the Baïrágís, the Jógís, and the Udásís." The first are the most numerous; and under the Mahrattah Government were powerful enough, not only to levy a duty on their own account, but also to regulate the police during the fair. At the Cumb'h-mélá of 1760, two brothers, who had embraced the opposite tenets of the two first Orders, and were accidently brought together by this festival, reproached each other, whenever they met, with so much bitterness and rancour, that their mutual recriminations attracted universal notice, and from a private, it became a public quarrel. From words, the adherents of the opposite factions came to blows; and fairly fought it out on the last day of bathing. After a long and bloody contest, fortune declared for the Gósáéns; 18,000 Baïrágís are said to have been left dead on the field, and their adversaries, with the genuine intolerance of fanaticism, from that day debarred them the privilege of washing away their sins at the Mélá, till the more equitable decisions of British rulers secured an equality of rights to the contending factions. Although their despotic sway is over, they still occupy the best situations at the fair. "On the ridge of the bank, on each side of the road, grass huts and small bangalàs (sheds) are erected, in front of which are high chabútrahs, (platforms,) in imitation of forts and bastions, with embrasures, &c. On these they repose with all the pride of conscious superiority and independence. Many of them profess a total disregard for all worldly concerns, and appear completely in a state of nature." (Id. 455.)

"The fair," Captain Raper adds, (in 1808,) "concluded without any trouble or disturbance, to the great surprise and satisfaction of numbers, who were accustomed to consider bloodshed and murder inseparable from the Cumb'h-mélá;" and in fact, on the next recurrence of the festival, (11 April, 1820,) the eagerness of the Sanyásís and Baïrágís to gain precedence of each other in bathing, occasioned such a violent rush at the head of the steps leading down to the water, that the Sipáhís stationed there were carried down with the throng, and the foremost so closely crowded together as to be deprived of the use of their limbs, were forced in one mass against the rocks which narrow the passage at the water's edge. Four hundred and thirty persons were thus crushed or stifled to death, and more would have infallibly perished, had not a company been marched up to arrest the progress of the multitude, as soon as the officer in command was apprised of the catastrophe. (Asiatic Journal, x. 488.) The readiness with which the Sipáhís on that occasion forgot their superstitious prejudices, in their zeal to save the lives of the sufferers, is a gratifying proof of the triumph of nature over fanaticism.

On the first Cumb'h-mélá after the place became subject to the British Government, the police very properly forbad the use of any weapons during the fair; guards were posted at all the different avenues, to receive the arms of the pilgrims, and gave a ticket in return, securing their restitution, after the fair was over. "This arrangement," says Captain Raper, (462,) "had the desired effect; for the utmost tranquillity prevailed; and from the content and satisfaction that were expressed by all ranks of people on this occasion, we may anticipate the praises that will be carried hence to all parts of Hindústán, on the mild system of the British Government."

"No particular ceremony," he remarks, (457,) "is observed at the bathing," which consists in a simple

DELHI. immersion; and as the water is not above four feet deep, even the women plunge in without hesitation, and both sexes intermix indiscriminately. The fatherless and widows have their heads shorn, after performing this ablution, and strew their hair in some public path, in order to draw an augury from the animal that first treads upon it.

Slaves were formerly brought hither by the Guk'hálís, and sold at the rate of from 10 to 150 rupees, (£1. to £15.) Camels from Láhór can be purchased for 75, (£7. 10s.) and horses for 200, (£15.) The bargain is made by touching the joints of the fingers, held under a cloth to prevent observation, and not a word is uttered by either party.

erat, South harun- or.

2. Mérat, or South Saháran-púr, the adjoining division of the Province of Dihlí, is bounded on the west by the territory assigned for the maintenance of the Emperor and the domains of Sik'h Chiefs, on the south by Aligar'h, and on the east by Morád-ábád. It was not separated from the northern division of the Province till long after the occupation of the country by the British functionaries, and it labours under several disadvantages peculiarly unfavourable to the establishment of an efficient police: namely, the small proportion of land completely cleared of wood; the proximity of the Bégum Somrú's territory at Sírd'hanà, which by treaty is exempted from the jurisdiction of the British Magistrates; and the hereditary feuds between the Játs and Gújars, two Ráj-pút tribes, to which most of the villagers belong. Rapine, murder, and perjury, are deemed no crimes by these half-savage people, when any injury committed by one of the tribes which they hold in abhorrence is to be avenged; and the facilities of escape are such as render it often extremely difficult to bring offenders to justice. In 1813, the average number of prisoners in the district jail was 403.

erut.

The principal Towns, are Mérat, Sírd'hanà, Kataúlí and Hastiná-púr. Mérat'h, in 28° 58′ north and 77° 38′ east, was a place of strength and importance before the Mohammedan invasion, in the XIth century. (Dow's Hist. i. 57.) It was ruined by Tímúr in 1399, but afterwards was rebuilt; and in 1809 it was selected as the best station for the principal military establishment in the upper Provinces, and the residence of the provincial Magistrate. Under the Moghul Emperors it was a perganah of the Serkár of Dihlí, and was assessed at 102,299 rupees, (£10,230.) and in 1812, its Custom-house duties alone amounted to 376,000 (£37,600.;) a circumstance worth notice, as the insecurity of the roads in this District have been a great check to commercial intercourse.

una.

Sírd'hanà or Sard'hánah, in 29° 12′ north and 77° 31′ east, is well known as the residence of the celebrated Bégum Somrú, the widow of a German adventurer, who, after various fortunes, obtained this territory, and left it in possession of his widow, a woman gifted with a masculine resolution and understanding, which enabled her to preserve her territory entire, while the surrounding States were continually changing their masters. Her husband was a native of the Electorate of Triers, named Walter Reinhard, and of low origin. He went at an early age to India, in the French service, under some assumed name, which the Indians changed into Somrú or Samarú. He afterwards entered a Swiss corps, at Calcutta; but deserted in less than three weeks, and served as a private in the cavalry of Sefdar Jang, father of Shujáú'd-daúlah. He next entered the service of an Armenian, the favourite of Kásim Alí, Nabob of Bengal, and was employed in the massacre of the English prisoners at Patnà. After continually changing masters, he at length died in the service of Najaf Khán, in 1778. That Chief gave him the command of his troops, disciplined in the European manner, and also a body of Moghul cavalry, assigning as a jáï-dád, or fief, for their support, the perganah of Sírd'hanà. His wife, who was of a needy, but distinguished Moghul family, is said to have turned Christian by the persuasion of her husband; whose character and conduct, however, give little colour to such a report. Sháh Aálam honoured this heroine with the title Zínu'n-nisà, i. e. "the ornament of the sex:" and Najaf Khán continued to her the jáï-dád and the command of the troops. DELHI.

Her little territory is about twenty miles long and twelve broad, and enjoys a temperate climate, being cooled by breezes from the northern mountains. "An unremitting attention to the cultivation of the lands," says Col. Francklin, (Life of Shah Awlum, 150,) "a mild and upright administration, and care for the welfare of the inhabitants, has enabled this small tract to vie with the most cultivated parts of Hindústán, and to yield a revenue of ten lacs of rupees per annum."

The Bégum Somrú. The Bégum Somrú is a small woman, with a fair complexion; and in 1798, was about forty-five years of age. She frequently admits to her table European officers of the higher ranks, where they are waited upon by female attendants, chiefly Christians; a very remarkable circumstance, and strongly corroborating the report mentioned above. In other respects she adheres rigidly to the customs of the country. She contrived, as before observed, to have her territory exempted from the jurisdiction of the rest of the Province, to the great inconvenience of the Police Magistrates, and obstruction of justice. The larger part of her treasure, which is considerable, is invested in the Company's funds, and she usually resides at Dihlí, where she has opportunities of ingratiating herself with the Emperor. The internal management of her territory was noticed in the official report from this district in 1816, as being highly deserving of praise.

K'hátaúlí. K'hátaúlí, in 29° 15′ north and 78° 45′ east, was rated at 90,614 rupees in the time of Akbár.

Hastinau-poor, or Hustna-nuggur. Hastiná-púr or Hastiná-nagar, on a branch of the Ganges, formerly its principal bed, in 29° 9′ north and 77° 55′ east, retains nothing of its ancient splendor, except one small Temple; the rest of the supposed site of the City is covered with gigantic ant-hills, raised by termites, and those subterranean architects have perhaps given birth to some of the Hindù fables.

Hurriana. IV. A large district on the eastern side of the Province is called Haryáná from Hariyá Green, on account of its verdure, which contrasts strongly with the dreariness of the neighbouring desert. It is bounded by the country of the B'háts and Sik'hs on the north; by the assigned Territories, the Perganah of Nárnaú, and the Shikáwatí country on the east and south; and by Bikánir, the B'hátís, and the sand plains of Ajmír on the south and west. In the time of Akbár it was included in the Serkár of Hisár Fírózeh, was then well cultivated, and in a much more flourishing state than now. It is sometimes called the Little DELHI. Balúchistán, and contains the following Perganahs or Townships; rated in the Tacsími Jamâ (Register of the Revenues) of Abú'l Fazl, as below:

	Dáms.		Dáms.
Hánsí.....	5,434,438.	Tóshám	1,068,548.
Hísár.....	4,039,895.	Agróhá	857,357.
Mahim	4,958,613.	Jemál-púr ..	4,277,461.
Barwálah ..	1,097,807.	Rohtak.....	8,599,270.

B'hehal and Bírí do not appear in the Ayeen Akbery.

By much the greater part of the District is a dead flat, free from wood, but deficient in water, which is not to be procured, except at a great depth below the surface of the ground; and though there are ponds enough to supply the inhabitants and cattle with water, no artificial means of irrigation have been used since the celebrated canal from the Jámunà to Hísár Fírózeh was choked up. The principal and almost the only routes between the northern and southern divisions of Hindústán, to the west of the Jamunà, pass through this territory; the command of it is, therefore, of considerable importance to any power which has dominions in the central parts of India.

The exports and imports alone are sufficient to indicate the actual condition of this Territory; for the former are merely horses, cattle, and butter, (g'hí;) the latter, arms, coarse cloths, salt, sugar, and spices.

Character of the inhabitants. The inhabitants have, in fact, been long thrown back into the pastoral state, while their habits, naturally ferocious and predatory, and the continual warfare in which their neighbours were engaged, were alike unfavourable to commerce and its concomitant civilisation. The eastern districts are inhabited principally by Játs, the western by Rangars, (Rang-urs, i. e. turncoats,) or Mohammedan renegadoes from the Hindù faith; both are Ráj-pút tribes, and therefore, by inheritance, fighting men. While the Moghul Empire was in a prosperous state, this District was well cultivated and highly productive. On the partition of the Empire by the Mahrattahs it was allotted to Sínd'hiyà, who could never succeed in reducing its inhabitants to obedience. It was ceded to Great Britain, with other parts of his territories, by the treaty of Sarjí Anjerigám, and immediately afterwards granted as a compensation for effectual aid to B'hambú Khán, son of Zábitah, and brother of the infamous Gholám Cádir, so often mentioned in the modern history of India. The turbulent and refractory spirit of the inhabitants however was such, that neither this Chief nor three others to whom it was transferred successively, could enforce their regulations, or prevent their new subjects from plundering their old ones.

Abdu'ssamíd Khán, another friendly Chieftain, whose resolution, activity, and influence were supposed to give him a better chance of establishing his dominion than had fallen to the lot of any of his predecessors, was the next person to whom a grant of this District was made; his success, however, was no better than that of his predecessors; and about 1809, the whole having been resumed by the British Government, a very judicious plan was adopted, by which the territory has ever since enjoyed a tranquillity unknown almost for centuries before. The Zemíndárs, Aámils, (Collectors,) and farmers already established, were treated as friends, not as foes; and considered as interested in the maintenance of good order within their respective districts, and therefore fit persons to act in subservience to the local Magistrate. They were so well pleased with this confidence on the part of their rulers, that even under the pressure of a very bad season and a serious scarcity, a provisional settlement for the revenue was made without difficulty; and Haryáná, with the exception of Fat'h-ábád, (which properly belongs to Ajmír,) was assessed on the following terms:

For 1813, at 223,676 rupees; 1814, at 308,826; 1815, at 339,360, (nearly £34,000.)

Hánsí, Hísár, Rohtak, and B'hawání, are the principal Towns, but there are many populous villages: the inhabitants of which are almost exclusively herdsmen.

Hánsí or Hánsya Hisár, (i. e. Hánsí Castle,) in 28° 54′ north and 75° 39′ east, on the Canal of Fírúz Sháh, is now much reduced in its population, which the area enclosed by the walls shows to have been very considerable formerly. To the north of the town, on the top of a small hill, scarped and enclosed by a ditch, there is a fort which was considered by the natives as almost impregnable. This place was first captured by the Mohammedans in the beginning of the XIth century; and towards the close of the XVIIIth became the Capital of an ephemeral Principality, formed by an adventurer, named George Thomas, of whose life Col. Francklin published a Narrative.

Hísár Fírózeh, the ancient Capital of the country, in 28° 57′ north and 75° 24′ east, was founded by Sultán Fírúz in the XIIIth century. Under Akbár it paid 4,039,895 dáms into the Treasury, and the Serkár, to which it gave a name, contained twenty-seven Townships, (Perganahs,) and yielded a revenue of 55,004,905 dáms, with feudal payments amounting to 1,406,519. Its remains are scattered over a large area, and those of the palace are still discernable. Close to it there is an iron pillar, rather less than that at Dihlí, called the Lát of Fírúz Sháh.

Rohtak, one of the best cultivated and least turbulent Perganahs, is said to have yielded 800,000 rupees, (£80,000.) annually to M. Perron. Its principal Town, in 28° 40′ north and 76° 20′ east, is now little better than a heap of ruins.

B'hawání, in 28° 37′ north and 75° 40′ east, is principally remarkable on account of the sturdy resistance made by its inhabitants against all the attempts of the native Chiefs to reduce them to obedience. Nijábet Alí Khán, to whom it had been assigned in 1805, gladly transferred it back to the East India Company in 1809, on receiving 6000 rupees, (£600.) as a compensation, for he had never been able to realize a farthing of revenue from it; nor could the British Government obtain possession of the town till after it had been stormed by a military force. An amnesty was proclaimed immediately after the surrender of the place, and the surviving inhabitants immediately leased their lands for 10,300 rupees per annum; which, with the customs levied on merchandise, yielded an annual revenue of 12,800 rupees, (£1280.) more than double the sum paid to Nyábah Alí.

V. The whole of the north-western portion of the Province of Dihlí is occupied by petty Sik'h (Seik) Chieftains, under the protection of the British Government. They are left entirely to their own discretion as to the internal management of their territories, but are prevented by the British force stationed at Lúd'hyánah, on the Satlej, from encroaching on each other, or becoming a prey to Ranjít Sing'h, the powerful Rájà of Láhór; in consequence of which they had risen, when visited by Sir David Ochterlony in 1814, to a state of comparative prosperity and tranquillity, strongly contrasted with the turbulence and misrule which had previously checked every thing like improvement in their country. In this division of the Province, the principal Towns, many of them Capitals of separate States, are Lúd'hyáná, Sir-hind, Ambálá, T'hánésar, J'hind, Kaït'hal, and Patyálá.

DELHI. — DELI BASHI.

Lúd'hyáná, on the southern bank of a branch of the Satlej, in 30° 49′ north and 75° 48′ east, was chosen in 1808 as the principal military station on the Sik'h frontier, and fortified so as to render it a post of considerable strength. Its climate is far from agreeable, for the neighbourhood of the mountains renders the cold in winter as severe as the heat is oppressive in summer. It yielded a revenue of 57,366 rupees in the time of Akbár, and had then a brick fort on the banks of the river.

Sir-hind, (or Sihrind as it is sometimes written,) in 30° 35′ north and 76° 19′ east, was anciently one of the most noted cities in India. In the flourishing periods of the Moghul Empire it was the Huyeïlí or Capital of the Serkár, bearing the same name, formed a double Perganah, and paid 302,066 rupees into the Imperial treasury. The southern part of its territory, which is destitute of water, was much improved by the canals cut by Firúz III. in the middle of the XIVth century. Some fine tanks and extensive mango-groves are almost the only objects near it which now recall the memory of its former prosperity. It has never recovered from the ravages of a merciless fanatic, the Baïrágí, Bandá, who in 1707 levelled all its public buildings with the ground. (As. Res. xi. 233, 250.)

Ambálá, in 30° 19′ north and 76° 44′ east, a place of sufficient magnitude to pay 104,952 rupees as its assessment in the reign of Akbár, though unnoticed by Sir J. Malcolm, in his account of the Sik'hs, (As. Res. xi.) is however marked in our latest maps, as the Capital of this District.

T'hánésar, or Thánéswar, in 29° 55′ north and 76° 48′ east, is mentioned by Abú'l Fazl, (Ayeen Akbery, ii. 88,) as a town on the banks of the Saraswatí, a river held in great veneration by the Hindùs. In its neighbourhood is the Kúr-k'hét (Kuru-kshétra, i. e. Pool of the Kuru's,) and on the adjoining plains, the battles celebrated in the Maháb'hárata are believed to have been fought. It was, till lately, the second town in the District of Sir-hind. The Saraswatí rises in the hills north-east of Sir-hind, and running to the south-west is lost in the sands of Ráj-pútáná. It was probably more considerable in ancient times, and is frequently mentioned in the Mythological Poems of the Hindùs.

J'hind or J'hínd, in 29° 6′ north and 76° 5′ east, is a small town, about three quarters of a mile long, and half a mile broad; built of brick, surrounded by a wall, and having an old brick fort, which was strong enough to resist the attack of the adventurer Thomas. J'hind is the north-western part of the extensive forest (jangal) which commences in the Perganah of Sów-pat, and though fertile is very imperfectly cultivated.

Kaït'hal or Kaïnt'hal, in 29° 37′ north and 76° 9′ east, is much larger than J'hind. A solid brick wall, with a deep ditch, and a fort of some strength within the enclosure, secure it against any ordinary attack; and a large tank together with a shallow lake (j'híl) on the eastern side of the town supply it with water.

Patyálá, (from Patyálaya, the Chieftain's abode,) in 30° 16′ north and 76° 22′ east, was, a short time ago, the Capital of the most powerful among the Sik'h Chiefs to the south of the Satlej. It is protected by a mud wall, and has a square citadel in the centre of the town, which is inhabited by the Rájà. Sáhíb Sing'h, mentioned by Sir John Malcolm, (As. Res. xi. 250,) died in a state of insanity in 1813, and was succeeded by his son, Karím Sing'h, who immediatiely set about reforming the abuses occasioned by his father's derangement; and was strengthened by the addition of Baghát, one of the Bárah t'hákuriyà, (twelve Lordships,) on the expulsion of the Gurk'hális from the hills between the Satlej and Jamunà in 1815. The fort of Jagat-gar'h, within the limits of that Lordship, but previously possessed by a different Chieftain, was also annexed to Patyálá, and the Rájà, Karím Sing'h, paid 130,000 rupees (£13,000.) in consideration of these important augmentations of his territory.

Jeend.

Kytul.

Puttala.

See Hamilton's East India Gazetteer; Hamilton's Hindostan, i.; Rennell's Memoir of a Map of India; Ayeen Akbery, by Gladwin, ii. 8vo ed. London, 1800; Thieffenthaler's Beschreibung von Hindustan, Berlin, 1785, i.; Asiatic Researches, London, 8vo ed.; Voyages de George Forster, par Langlès, Paris, 1802, tom. iii.; Dow's Ferishtah, i. 4to ed. London, 1770; Francklin's Life of Shah Aulum, London, 1798.

DELI BASHI, i. e. Head of the Delís, is the title of the Commander of a corps of irregular cavalry attached to the Turkish army. The Delís, (Mad-caps,) and Gónnul-lús, (Stout-hearted,) Serden-gechdís, (Enfans Perdus,) and Ján-bázjs, (Life-sporters,) are some of the corps de voltigeurs attendant on the main army in a campaign. They are all volunteers, sometimes on foot, more frequently mounted; usually receiving no pay, but depending wholly for their subsistence on devastation and plunder. These corps are all termed Mosellem or Free, being subject to little discipline, and consequently, often as great a scourge to their own as to the enemy's country. The Delís and Gónnul-lús were first raised in Asia Minor, in the latter half of the XVIIth century. They are embodied only in time of war, and when in the field they receive pay either from the Sultán, or from the Begler-beg by whom they are levied. In the time of Ricaut, the Grand Vizier's guard was a corps from 100 to 400 Delís, all Bosniacs or Albanians, receiving from twelve to fifteen aspers per diem. A lance, sword, and axe were their ordinary weapons; some also added a pair of pistols. They were much attached to the celebrated Kúprúlí and his family, and, at that time, an effectual check upon the Janissaries.

Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, lib. iii.

DELHI. — DELI BASHI.

DELI BASHI. — DELIBER.

ch. ix.; Von Hammer, Osmanischen Reich Staatsfassung, Wien, 1815, ii. 235—241.

DE'LIBATE, } Delibare, delibatum; de, and libare,
DELIBA'TION. } Gr. λείβ-ειν, stillare, fundere, to pour.

The first wine poured, and then tasted; the first pouring or effusion, or tasting, was called a libation.

It is used met. for an effusion.

When he has travelled, and delibated the French and the Spanish. Marmion. Antiquary.

The same must he likewise affirm concerning all other souls, as those of men and demons, that they are either all of them the substance of God himself, together with that of the evil demon, or else certain delibations from both (if any one could understand it,) blended and confounded together.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 216.

Of these Σεβόμενοι there is elsewhere mention in the Acts of the Apostles more than once; but what they were our commentators do not so fully inform us; nor can it be understood without some delibation of Jewish antiquity.
Mede. Works. On Texts of Scripture, book i. disc. 3.

The principles of motion and vegetation in living bodies seem to be delibations from the invisible fire or spirit of the universe.
Berkley. Siris.

DELI'BER, } Fr. deliberer; Sp. deliberar;
DELI'BERATE, v. } It. and Lat. deliberare, liberè
DELI'BERATE, adj. } de aliquâ re cogitare. Min-
DELI'BERATELY, } shew. Deliberat, cui libertas
DELI'BERATENESS, } eligendi est aliquid ex duobus.
DELIBERA'TION, } He deliberates, who has the DELI'BERATIVE, adj. } liberty of choosing one from DELI'BERATIVE, n. } several; where that liberty is DELI'BERATIVELY, } not, there is no deliberation.
DELIBERA'TORS. } Vossius. And Cicero, *incidit*ur enim omnis* deliberatio, si intelligitur non posse fieri, aut si necessitas affertur. De Orat. L. ii. 336.

To choose, to select, to elect; to advise, to think, to consider; to reflect with a view to choice or selection; to examine which is best, which to be preferred; to examine with caution, discretion, hesitation, wariness; with temper, calmness, coolness, slowness.

Than Dame Prudence, when she sey the good will of hire husbond, delibered unto hire, and toke avis in hire self, thinking how she might bring this nede into goode ende.
Chaucer. The Tale of Melibeus, vol. ii. p. 120.

And let him eftsones examine and rollen his thoughts, by good deliberation, or that he deme.
Id. The third Booke of Boecius, fol. 228.

When I this supplicacion,
With good deliberacion,
In suche a wise as ye nowe witte,
Had after myn entente writte.
Gower. Conf. Am. book viii.

In counsell geuinge, in delibering, in decerning thinges delybred, in thinges decreed spedely to be finished, in espyinge an apte occasion, who were more ingeniouse and clearer witted then Philip and Alexander? Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. viii.

For thys cause they deliberated to constrayne theym to fighte by sea ymmediatly as they shulde see their aduauntage, and so embarqued there men and causedde theym to tarye there certene dayes. Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 187.

For I am sure whan he had preached so in so many places, he had not done it of a sodayne aduēture, but of a deliberate purpose. Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 214. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

My Lord Steward answered, that there was no other meaning nor intent, and that he should be heard deliberately.
State Trials. Trial of the Earl of Arundel.

An oration deliberative, is a meane, whereby we doe perswade, entreate, or rebuke, exhorte, or dehorte, commende, or comforte any man. Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 29.

Wherof when the king of England was aduertised, he delibered to goe vnto them in his owne person to remooue them from this siege. Stow. Henry V. Anno 1417.

Every spontaneous action is not therefore voluntary, for voluntary presupposes some precedent deliberation, that is to say, some consideration and meditation of what is likely to follow, both upon the doing, and abstaining from the action deliberated of.
Hobbes. Works, fol. 470. Of Liberty and Necessity.

At whose deliberate and unusual birth,
The heavens were said to council to retire,
And, in aspects of happiness and mirth,
Breath'd him a spirit insatiably t' aspire.
Drayton. The Barons' Wars, book i.

She gave no other answer, but that she must deliberately determine of so great a matter, and that she neither could nor would confirm it, but by the advice of the nobility of Scotland.
Camden. Elizabeth, Anno 1561.

It [Mount Edgecombe] was built by Sir Richard Edgecombe, Knight; take his character from one [Carew] who very well knew him, "Mildness, stoutness, diffidence and wisdom, deliberateness of undertakings, and sufficiency of effecting, made in him a more blazing mixture of virtue."
Fuller. Worthies. Cornwall.

For the feet of those that evangelize peace, are never so beautiful as when they come softly, choosing the fairest way with a calm deliberation.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 8. sec. 3.

In deliberatives the point is, what is good, and what is evill, and of good what is greater, and of evil what is lesse.
Bacon. Essays. Of the Colours of Good and Evil. A Fragment.

And all deliberatives of state seem to depend much upon the event of Brisach, which I use to call the German Helena, long woed, but for ought I hear yet, an imperial virgin.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 490.

——— The corps of half her senate
Manure the fields of Thessaly, while we Sit here, deliberating in cold debates,
If we should sacrifice our lives to honour,
Or wear them out in servitude and chains.
Addison. Cato, act ii. sc. 1.

O, 'tis the coldest youth upon a charge,
The most deliberate fighter! if he ventures
(As in Illyria once they say he did
To storm a town) 'tis when he cannot chuse,
When all the world have fixed their eyes upon him;
And then he lives on that for seven years after,
But, at a close revenge he never fails.
Dryden. All for Love, act ii.

As to time and deliberation about the act of sin. If there be a real surprize, i. e. that the person is not aware, or hath not time to consider what he is to do, he that hath a mind well resolved, may be betrayed into what he would never have done, if he had time to deliberate about it.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 11. vol. ii.

Though, when men discard the Gospel out of a zeal to preserve the moral law of reason and nature, they may seem to act with great regard to virtue and holiness, yet they do manifestly reject the authority of God, and deliberately refuse that obedience, which reason teaches to be due to the great lawgiver of the world.
Sherlock. Discourse 46.

What the principle of self preservation is with respect to ourselves, the same is charity with respect to our neighbour: and the more real and vigorous this principle is, the more easily, and with the less deliberation, does it exert the acts of love and beneficence towards our fellow creatures. Id. Discourse 38.

The people, by their representatives and grandees, were intrusted with a deliberative power in making laws; the king with the controul of his negative.
Burke. On the Cause of the Present Discontents.

So far as we can judge by the style of the Saxon laws, none but the thanes or nobility, were considered as necessary constituent parts of this assembly, at least whilst it acted deliberatively.
Id. An Abridgement of English History, book ii. ch. vii.

I would not, indeed refer a prince for maxims of equity and government to Puffendorf and Grotius; the dull and unfeeling deliberators of questions on which a good heart and understanding can intuitively decide; but to his own heart, to his own enlightened reason, to the page of Scripture, and to the volumes of authenticated history. V. Knox. Essay 133.

DE'LICACY, DE'LICATE, DE'LICATELY, DE'LICATENESS, DE'LICATES, DE'LICES, DE'LICIATE, DE'LICIOUS, DE'LICIOUSLY, DE'LICIOUSNESS. Fr. delicatesse; Sp. delicadeza; It. delicatezza; Eng. delicacy. Fr. delicat; Sp. delicado; It. delicato; Eng. delicate; Lat. delicatus, from deliciæ, (de, and lacere, to draw, to attract.) See DELECTABLE. Delicate is—

Attractive, alluring, enticing, tempting, holding out pleasing inducements, allurements or temptations;—pleasing, gratifying.

Opposed to plain, common, coarse, vulgar.—Carried to excess,—nice, dainty, tender, soft, effeminate, luxurious.

Delicious; Fr. delicieux; Low Lat. deliciosus; full of, abounding in delicacies or delights, highly pleasing or gratifying to the mind or senses.

Hyt ys ney vyf ger, þat we abbyþ ylyued in such vyce,
Vor we nadde nogt to done, and in suche delyce.
R. Gloucester, p. 195.

þenk þat Dives for hus delicat lyf to þe Devel went.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 142.

And drynke nat over delicatliche, ne to dupe neiþer.
Id. Ib. p. 96.

For sche that is lyuynge in delices is deed.
Wiclif. 1 Timothy, ch. v.

He Rome brente for his delicacie.
Chaucer. The Monkes Tale, v. 14397.

And adde this also, that euery weleful man, hath a full delicate feling: so that but if all thyngs befallen at his own wil, he is impacient, or is not vsed to haue anone aduersity, anon he is throwen adoune for euery little thyng.
Id. The second Booke of Boecius, fol. 217.

But certes he, that haunteth swiche delices,
Is ded, whilé that he liveth in tho vices.
Id. The Pardoneres Tale, v. 12481.

Certainly (qd I) than, these ben faire thyngs, and anointed with honey swetnesse of rhetorike and musike, and onely while they ben herd and sowne in eeres, they ben delicious.
Id. The second Booke of Boecius, fol. 217.

Som clerkes holden that felicitee
Stant in delit, and therefore certain he
This noble January, with all his might
In honest wise as longeth to a knight,
Shope him to liven ful deliciously.
Id. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9899.

Many men there ben, that with ecres openly sprad so much swalowen y^t deliciousnesse of iestes and of rime, by queint knitting coloures, that of y^e goodnesse or of the badnesse of the sentence, take they little heede or else none.
Id. The Prologue of the Testament of Loue, fol. 285.

Of the seconde glotonie
Which cleped is delicacie,
Wherof ye spake here to fore,
Beseche I wolde you therfore.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 131.

And he was eke so delicate
Of his clothyng that euery daie
Of purpre and bysse he made hym gaie,
And ete and dranke therto his fyll,
After the lustes of his wyll:
As he, whiche all stoode in delice,
And take none hede of thilke vice.
Id. Ib. book xvi. fol. 131.

Yet wolde his herte on other fall,
And thinke hem more delicious,
Than he hath in his owne hous.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 132.

All kinde of spices and delectable fruites, both for delicacie and health, are there in such abundence, as hitherto they haue bene thought to haue beene bred no where else but there.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Temperature of Regions, vol. iii. fol. 49.

And he sayth also, if we would consider what excellence and dignity is in the nature of man, we shold vnderstand, how great shame it is to wast it away riotously, and to leade the life delicately and deliciously: and howe honest it is to liue chastly, soberly, sadly, and measurably.
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, E. 8.

The Bactrians bee the most hardyest people amongst those naciõs—vnciuil men, and much abhorring from the delicatenes of the Persians. Brende. Quintus Curtius, book iv. fol. 66.

I will in these firste wordes saie, that in the firste ages men were more esteemed by their meke customs, and delicateues, than they were after reproued by their grosse and rude vnderstandynges. Golden Boke. Prologue, B. ii.

I am not now in Fraunce, to iudge the wine,
With sauery sauce those delicates to fele,
Nor yet in Spain, where one must him incline,
Rather than to be, outwardly to seme.
Wyat. The Courtier's Life.

But they will say if they had not so great possessions, they could not kepe so many seruantes and so many dogges, so many horses, as 40, or 50, & maintayne so great pompe, and pride, and liue so deliciously, what heresye fynde you in this?
Barnes. Workes, fol. 210. His Articles condemned by Popishe Byshoppes.

Whyle thou were aliue, no kinde of wine could please thee for being cloid with them, so great was the deliciousnes of thy mouth, neither wouldest thou al the while so much as geue a litell water to Lazarus being thirstie. Udall. Luke, ch. xvi.

Our delicacies are growne capitall,
And even our sports are dangers! what we call
Friendship is now mask'd hatred! justice fled,
And shamefastnesse together.
Ben Jonson. Under-woods. An Epistle to a Friend.

The most judicial and worthy spirits of this land are not so delicate, or will owe so much to their ear, as to rest upon the outside of words, and be entertained with sound.
Daniel. Defence of Rhyme.

And what needs that (quoth he) cannot Pompey recover and liue, if Lucullus were not a waster and a delicate giuen to belly-cheare? Holland. Plutarch, fol. 361.

And to conclude, the shepherd's homely curds,
His cold thinne drinke out of his leather bottle,
His wonted sheepe, vnder a fresh tree shade,
All which secure, and sweetly he enioyes,
Is farre beyond a prince's delicates.
Shakspeare. Henry VI. Third Part, fol. 156.

GUZ. Yes, we will feast, my queen, my empress, saint,
Shalt taste no delicates, but what are drest
With costlier spices than the Arabian bird
Sweetens her funeral bed with.
Ford. The Lady's Trial, act ii. sc. 1.

He was of full stature, tall and personable, in countenance amiable, a white face, and withal somewhat ruddie, delicatelie in each limb featured. Holinshed. Ireland, Anno 1535.

When Flora is disposed to deliciate with her minions, the rose is her Adonis. Partheneia Sacra, (1633,) p. 18.

The third sort is reddish blacke of colour, in quantitie comparable to the phesant and no lesse delicious in taste and sauor at the table, our countrie men call them wild cocks, and their cheafe sustenance is by wheat. Holinshed. Scotland, ch. viii.

They are like Dives, whose portion was in this life, who went in fine linnen and fared deliciously every day.
Taylor. Sermon 9. part ii.

DELICACY. — DELIGHT.

Tell me therefore, O soul! didst thou ever see the glory and riches that there is in a promise? wert thou ever ravished with the infinite sweetness and deliciousness that thou suckest from them. Hopkins. Sermons, p. 548.

Their wanton appetites not only feed
With delicates of leaves and marshy weed,
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land,
And minister the blade, with bounteous hand.
Dryden. Virgil. Georgics, book iii.

What a pleasant thing it is to account that fasting, which the unmortified epicures of old accounted their most delicious feasting, viz. fish and wine. Stillingfleet. Sermon 2. vol. ii.

One who is constantly doing good, and always walking in all the commandments of God blameless, he may justly be termed a spiritual Dives, one that fares deliciously every day, his soul being continually transported with the contemplation of God's perfections, and his heart delighted in obeying his commands.
Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 144.

There is no getting them [the nests of certain eastern birds] without much trouble and danger, by the help of boats and poles: upon which account, as well as that of their deliciousness, they are very dear in the East Indies themselves.
Boyle. On the Final Causes of Natural Things.

An air of robustness and strength is very prejudicial to beauty. An appearance of delicacy, and even of fragility, is almost essential to it. Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful, sec. 16.

It is the delicate myrtle, it is the orange, it is the almond, it is the jasmine, it is the vine, which we look on as vegetable beauties. Id. Ib.

The just balance between the republican and monarchical part of our constitution is really, in itself, so extremely delicate and uncertain, that, when joined to men's passions and prejudices it is impossible but different opinions must arise concerning it, even among persons of the best understanding.
Hume. Essay 8. The Parties of Great Britain.

Why mourns Apicius thus? Why runs his eye,
Heedless, o'er delicates, which from the sky Might call down Jove. Churchill. The Times.

I could have led you through delicious walks, and picked off, for your amusement in our rambles, a thousand notions which I hung upon every thorn, as I passed, thirty years ago.
Hurd. Life of Warburton.

By his own dauntless heart and matchless strength,
Makes inroad on the flocks, that he may fare
Deliciously at cost of mortal man,
So Peleus' son all pity from his breast
Hath driv'n, and shame, man's blessing or his curse.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book xxiv.

There is in the things of God, to those who practise them, a deliciousness that makes us love them, and that love admits us into God's cabinet, and strangely clarifies the understanding by the purification of the heart.
V. Knox. Christian Philosophy, sec. 6.

DELICT, Lat. delinquere, delictum; to leave undone, sc. that which ought to be done; and thus, consequently, and positively,

A wrong doer, an offender. See DELINQUENT.

And according to the merit thereof, either deliver him by a degradation to the secular justice, or banish him the kingdom, according to the quality of the delict.
Howell. Letter 13. book i. sec. 3.

DELI'GHT, v.
DELI'GHT, n.
DELI'GHTOUS,
DELI'GHTER,
DELI'GHTABLE,
DELI'GHTFUL,
DELI'GHTFULLY,
DELI'GHTFULNESS,
DELI'GHTINGLY,
DELI'GHTLESS,
DELI'GHTSOME.

Fr. delecter; Sp. delectar; It. dilettare; Lat. delectare; de, and lactare, from lacere, to draw, to attract. See DELECTABLE, and DELICACY.

To please greatly; to gratify in a great degree; to fill with highly pleasing sensations.

With hem was so gret delyt, þat bitwene hem þere
Bi gete was þe beste body, þat euer was in þis londe,
Kyng Arthure þe noble mon. R. Gloucester, p. 159.

For þy dred delitable drynke.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 14.

In many places were nightingales,
Alpes, finches, and wodwales,
That in her swete song deliten,
In thilke places as they habiten.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, p. 199.

We live in poverte, and in abstinence,
And borel folk in richesse and dispence
Of mete and drinke, and in her foule delit.
Id. The Sompnoures Tale, v. 7457.

The small birds singen clere
Her blisfull swete song pitous
And in this seson delitous.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 116.

And many a spice delitable
To eaten whan men rise fro table.
Id. Ib. fol. 122.

A still water for the nones
Renned vpon the small stones,
Whiche hight of Lethes the riuer,
Under that hille in suche maner
There is, whiche yeueth great appetite
To slepe, and thus full of delite
Slepe hath his hous.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 80.

Thus in the deede deliteth God as farforth as we do it, either to serue our neighbour with all, as I haue sayd, or to tame the flesh that we may fulfill the commaundement from the bottom of the heart.
Tyndall. Workes, fol. 154. The Obedience of a Christian Man.

Wherfore to ieste
Is my delyght
Of this cowarde knyght.
Skelton. Duke of Albany and the Scotte.

The stately pompe of princes and their peires,
Did seeme to swimme in flouddes of beaten golde,
The wonton world of yong delightful yeeres
Was not vnlyke a heauen for to behoulde.
Gascoigne. Flowers. Memoir.

This countrey seemed very goodly and delightsome to all of vs, in regard of the greennesse and beautie thereof, and we iudged it to be very populous within the land.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Francis Volla, vol. iii. fol. 399.

From whence he tooke his well deserued name:
He had in armes abroad wonne muchell fame
And fil'd farre lands with glory of his might,
Plaine, faithfull, true, and enemy of shame,
And euer lov'd to fight for ladies right,
But in vaine glorious fraies he little did delight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 6.

O dear and dainty nymph, most gorgeously array'd
Of all the Driades known, the most delicious maid,
With all delights adorn'd, that any way beseem
A sylvan. Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 23.

High lifted vp were many lofty towres,
And goodly galleries faire over-laid,
Full of faire windowes and delightful bowers.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 4.

No more all that our eyes can see of her (though when we have seen her, what else they shall ever see is but dry stubble after clover grass) is to be matched with the flock of unspeakable virtues, held up delightfully in that best builded fold.
Sidney. Arcadia, book i.

FLO. The queen is all for revels; her high heart,
Unladen from the heaviness of state,
Bestows itself upon delightfulness.
Machin. The Dumb Knight, act iv. sc. 1.

To this the answer is easie, that Mangone is not innocent; and though he did not consent clearly and delightingly to Seguiri's death, yet rather than die himself he was willing the other should.
Taylor. Rule of Conscience. Rule 7. book iv. ch. i.

IGHT. — E- LATE.

Most pleasant it is at first, to such as are melancholy given, to lie in bed whole days, and keep their chambers, to walk alone in some solitary grove, betwixt wood and water, by a brooke side to meditate upon some delightsome and pleasant subject, which shall affect them most. Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, fol. 88.

With the sweet sound of this harmonious lay,
About the keel delighted dolphins play;
Too sure a sign of sea's ensuing rage,
Which must anon this royal troop engage.
Waller. On his Majesty's Escape.

For, as all warlike nations take delight
To hear how their brave ancestors could fight,
You have advanc'd to wonder their renown,
And no less virtuously improv'd your own.
Id. To a Person of Honour.

We should concerning our author consider, whether he be not a particular enemy, or disaffected to him; whether he be not ill-humoured, or a delighter in telling bad stories.
Barrow. Sermon 17. vol. i.

Because it [deportment] is a nurse of peace, and greatly contributes to the delightfulness of society, [it] hath been always much commended, and hath obtained a conspicuous place in the honourable rank of vertues, under the titles of courtesie, comity, and affability. Id. Sermon 29. vol. i.

And winter oft at eve resumes the breeze,
Chills the pale moon, and bids his driving sleets,
Deform the day delightless.
Thomson. Seasons. Spring.

The wise man here asserts the ways of wisdom, to be not only the ways of pleasantness, but likewise the paths of peace; that is, they are quiet and peaceable, as well as pleasant and delightsome to the soul. Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 100.

On hill and dale, on meadow, field, and grove,
Cloth'd in soft mingling shades from light to dark,
The wandering eye delighted roves untir'd.
Dodsley. Agriculture, can. 1.

He might as well preach this lesson [that all mirth and pleasure should be banished out of the world] to the winds as to men, who can see in all around them evident marks of God's having bountifully furnished them with various delights to refresh and divert their weary and fatigued minds.
Pearce. Sermon 7. vol. iii.

The situation was delightful. In front was the sea, and the ships at anchor; behind, and on each side, were plantations, in which were some of the richest productions of Nature.
Cook. Second Voyage round the World, book ii. ch. i.

How can you more profitably, or more delightfully employ your Sunday leisure, than in the performance of such duties as these; in demonstrating your piety and gratitude to God, by diffusing joy and comfort to every part you can reach of that creation, which was the work of his hands, and from which he rested on the seventh day? Porteus. Sermon 9. vol. i.

DELI'NEATE, DELI'NEATE, adj. DELINEA'TION, } Lat. delineare, atum; de, and lineare; lineam ducere, to draw a line.

DELI'NEATING, DELI'NEATOR, DELI'NEAMENT. } To draw a line or outline; to describe, to depicture, to sketch a picture.

If we do but consider this fabrick with minds unpossest of an affected madness, we will easily grant, that it was some skilful Archeus who delineated those comely proportions, and hath exprest such exactly geometrical elegancies in its compositions.
Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. v.

Wherefore it is of great import to behold the fates and affaires destinate to one age or time drawne, as it were, and delineate in one table.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book ii. ch. viii.

The principall amongst these three, is the wisdome and soundnesse of direction, that is, a delineation and demonstration of a right and easy way to accomplish any enterprize.
Id. Ib. book ii. The Proheme.

Show how that bird, how well that flow'r was done;
How this part shadow'd, and how that did rise,
This top was clouded, how that trail was spun,
The landscape, mixture, and delineatings,
And in that art a thousand curious things.
Drayton. The Barons' Wars, book vi.

DE-LINEATE. — DELI-QUIUM.

Then by all the wide world's acknowledgment,
The sunne's a type of that eternall light
Which we call God, a fair delineament
Of that which good in Plato's school is hight.
More. On the Soul, part ii. book iii. can. 3. st. 11.

Inferior art the landscape may design,
And paint the purple evening in the line:
Her [Satire's] daring thought essays a higher plan;
Her hand delineates passion, pictures man.
Brown. Essay on Satire, part ii.

Dugdale from some of these illuminations has given cuts of two remarkable combats or tournaments performed in the 15th year of King Henry VI. in which the designs are far from unworthy of a better age; and the customs and habits delineated with great accuracy.
Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. i. p. 70.

We, in the writings of the Evangelists, have a complete summary of his triennial preaching; we have, joined with the detail of many of his miracles, the delineation of his character, and the history of his wonderful life of piety and love.
Horsley. Sermon 26. vol. ii.

When we compare this great man's [Bacon's] writings with some of the weaknesses of his life, we are tempted to exclaim, with a modern delineator of characters, "Alas, poor human nature." V. Knox. Essay 52.

DELI'NQUENT, n. DELI'NQUENT, adj. DELI'NQUENCY. } Fr. delinquent; It. and Sp. delinquente; Lat. delinquens, present participle of delinquere; de, and linquere, to leave. Delinquere propriè est præ-termittere quod non oportet præterire; to leave undone, that which ought to be done.

And thus, positively, Doing wrong, offending; a wrong doer, an offender.

How wretched is that state, how full of woe!
When those that should preserve do overthrow!
When they rule us, and o'er them money reigns,
Who still cry "Give," and always gape for gains!
But on those judges lies a heavy curse,
That measure crimes by the delinquent's purse.
Brome. Satire on the Rebellion.

He that politicly intendeth good to a common weal, may be called a just man, but he that practiseth either for his own profit, or any other sinister ends, may be well termed a delinquent person. State Trials. Trial of the Earl Strafford.

It [the doctrine of præexistence] supposeth the descent into these bodies to be a culpable lapse from an higher and better state of life, and this to be a state of incarceration for former delinquencies. Glanville. Præexistence of Souls, ch. iv.

Col. Gell. who was a great servant of the Countess, informed Maj. Gen. Harrison, that the Lord Edward Howard, being a Member of Parliament, and one of the committee at Haberdashers' Hall, had taken divers bribes for the excusing delinquents from sequestration, and easing them in their compositions.
Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. i. p. 289.

DE'LIQUATE, DELI'QUIUM. } De, and liquere, to melt, to dissolve.

Whether this ebullition be caused by a nitro-sulphureous ferment lodg'd especially in the left ventricle of the heart, which, mingling with the blood, excites such an ebullition, as we see made by the mixture of some chymical liquors, viz. oil of vitriol, and deliquated salt of tartar; or by the vital flame warming and boiling the blood. Ray. On the Creation, part i.

I caused an unusual brine to be made, by suffering sea-salt to deliquate in the moist air.
Boyle. Experiments Touching the Spring of Air, vol. iii. p. 202. exp. 12.

I also put some of this liquor, that came by deliquium from the noctiluca, upon some filings of copper.
Ib. Experiments about Burning other Bodies with Noctiluca, vol. iv. p. 490.

DELIQUIUM, from the same source as Delict and Delinquent, q. v.

A defect or deficiency, a failing, a fainting.

DELI-QUIUM. Deliquium is used by Chymists as if from deliquere, to melt. See DELIQUATE.

DELI-RATION.

All idolizing worms, that thus could crowd
And urge their sun into thy cloud;
Forcing his sometimes eclips'd face to be
A long deliquium to the light of thee.
Crashaw. On the Glorious Epiphany of our Lord God.

If he be locked in a close roome, he is afraid of being stifled for want of aire, and still carries bisket, aqua vitæ, or some strong waters about him, for fear of deliquiums, or being sick.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, fol. 181.

In short, their conscience was not stark dead, but under a kind of spiritual apoplexy, or deliquium.
South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 464.

DELIRA'TION, DELI'RIOUS, DELI'RIOUSNESS, DELI'RIUM } Lat. delirare. Vossius decides for the etymology given in the Quotation from Pliny: that lira, originally signified, sulcus, a furrow; and that hence, met. he is said, delirare, who wanders from the right line of reason: quasi sulco et lira rationis evagatur.

A wandering, erring or straying from a right mind or understanding; raving, speaking or talking idly.

In some places, where the manner of the countrey doth require, this is performed with a tined or toothed harrow, or else with a broad planke fastened unto the plough taile, which dooth hide and cover the seed newly sowne: and in this manner to rake or harrow, is called in Latine licare [lirare,] from whence came first the word delicare, [delirare,] which is to leave bare balkes uncovered, and by a metaphore and borrowed speech, to rave and speak idly. Holland. Plinie, vol. i. fol. 579.

To make which the more evident, we shall briefly represent a syllabus or catalogue of the many atheistick hallucinations or delirations concerning it.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 848.

That you may rightly understand this my assertion (before acquaint you with the reasons which induce me thereunto,) you must know that the masters of physick tell us of two kinds of deliration or alienation of the understanding.
Mede. Works. On Texts of Scripture, book i. disc. 5

COR. Delirium this is call'd, which is mere dotage,
Sprung from ambition first, and singularity,
Self-love and blind opinion of true merit.
Ford. The Lover's Melancholy, act iii. sc. 3.

An ignorant man must not have leave so much as to meditate on God without a guide; for he is mad, say the philosophers, and then every thought of his will be a kind of delirium or phrensy.
Hammond. Works. Sermon 10. vol. iv.

——— But if on bed
Delirious-flung, sleep from his pillow flies,
All night he tosses, nor the balmy power
In any posture finds.
Thomson. Spring.

Then, tho' we do think, yet we think wildly and extravagantly, and inconsistently, even to that degree, that we call it deliriousness or frenzy. Sharp. Sermon 3. vol. iii.

For sorry dust and ashes to pride itself in his own emptiness and vanity; for a silly worm to think himself a giant, because he hath got a little larger hole or house to creep into than his fellow worms have; must needs argue a strange delirium and frenzy in them that do so. Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 98.

Their fancies first delirious grew,
And scenes ideal took for true.
Green. The Spleen.

So spake Telemachus. Then Pallas struck
The suitors with delirium; wide they stretch'd
Their jaws with unspontaneous laughter loud;
Their meat dripp'd blood; tears fill'd their eyes, and dire
Presages of approaching wo, their hearts.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book xx.

DELI'VER, v. DELI'VER, adj. DELI'VERLY, DELI'VERNESS, DELI'VERANCE, DELI'VERER, DELI'VERY. } Fr. delivrer; It. deliverare; Sp. Di delivrar, delibrar; Lat. liberare; liberum facere, in libertatem reducere; to free or make free, to restore to freedom or liberty.

To free from: sc. from confinement or custody or slavery; and thus, to rescue, to release from the power or possession of an enemy; to release or surrender from our own: and thus, to give up or resign; to give up from one holder or possessor to another; and thus, simply, to give up, throw up, cast away.

To deliver from the mouth, i. e. to utter, to speak.

In our old Writers, Deliver, deliverly, deliverness, are used as applied to liberty of action, freedom of motion, unrestrained, unincumbered; and thus, to—

Activity, agility or nimbleness.

Þe kyng delyuerede þat folk out of seruage,
And Brut deliuerede þe kyng out of hys ostage.
R. Gloucester, p. 13.

Þe kyng þo myd gode herte delyuery het anon,
Boþe quene and hyssop Id. p. 340.

God delyuerde Athelstan of many hard affaires.
R. Brunne, p. 32.

Þe godes þat be fonden on my londe o chance,
Tille him I am not bounden to mak deliuerance.
Id. p. 158.

——— þe kynge cride to Abraam mercy
And deliuerede hym hus wif.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 215.

——— Crist is us name
Þat shal delyuery ous som day.
Id. p. 319.

If thou art Crist, seye to us, and he seide to hem, if I seye to you ye schulen not beleue to me. And if I axe, ye schulen not answere to me, neither ye schulen delyuere me.
Wiclif. Luk, ch. xxii.

Deliver us out of all this busy drede,
And take a wif, for highe Goddes sake.
Chaucer. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8010.

Of his stature he was of even lengthe,
And wonderly deliver and grete of strengthe.
Id. The Prologue, v. 84.

Lo when thou wer imprisoned how fast they hied in help of thy deliuerãce. Id. The Testament of Loue, fol. 292.

The fox answered, in faith it shal be don:
And as he spake the word, al sodenly
The cok brake from his mouth deliverly
And high upon a tree he flew anon.
Id. The Nonnes Preestes Tale, v. 15422.

Certes, the goodes of the body ben hele of body, strength, deliverneese, beautee, gentrie, franchise.
Id. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 318.

The tyme sette of kinde is come,
This lady hath hir chambre nome,
And of a sonne borne full;
Wherof that she was loyfull.
She was deliuered saufe and soone.
Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 33.

And cried was, that thei shulde come
Unto the game all and some
Of hem that ben deliuer and wight,
To do suche maistrie as thei might.
Id. Ib. book viii. fol. 178.

The nere this hil was vpon chance
To take his deliverance,
The more vnboxomly he cride.
Id. Ib. book vii. fol. 163.

But then Sir Mathewe sayd, fayre nephue, sythe ye be here with suche a puyssaance, it behoueth you to delyuer this countre DELIVER of a certayne Bretons and Frenchemen, who kepeth well a xii. fortresses bytwene this and Bayone.

Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. ch. 338.

Wherfore they charged this frere to go into Fraūce, and delyuered hym instructions of the effecte that he shulde saye and do.
Id. Ib. ch. 193.

The whiche thre small shyppes escaped by theyr delyuer saylynge. Fabyan, Anno 1338.

The temperate may soone dispose his members to their reste,
And ryse agayne delyuerly, to labour quicke and preste.
Drant. Horace. The second Satyre.

This, for his delyuernesse and swiftenesse, was surnamed Herefote, in whose begynnynge stryfe was amonge the lordes.
Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 208.

Therefore euery orator should earnestly labour to file his tongue, that his words may slide with ease, and that in his deliuerance he may haue such grace, as the sound of a lute, or any such instrument doth giue. Wilson. Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 3.

And he sayde: the Lord is my rocke, my castel, and my deliuerer, God is my strength, and in him wyll I truste.
Bible, Anno 1551. 2 Kings, ch. xxii.

Henry Piercy, late of Tinmouth, in the county of Northumberland, Knt. was indicted in the term of Easter, in the 14th year of her Majesty's reign, for that he, with divers others, did conspire for the delivering of the Queen of Scots out of the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury.
State Trials. Inquisition upon the death of the Earl of Northumberland.

And because without deliuerie of those countries, he persewed that truce could not be obtained, he agreed, to the relese and deliueraunce of theim.
Hall. Henry VI. The twenty-ninth Yere.

Whom hardly he from flying forward staid
Til he these words to him deliuer might;
Sir Knight, aread who hath ye thus arraid,
And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight,
For, neuer knight I saw in such misseeming plight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 9.

—— Gentle dame, reward enough I weene
For many labours more, then I haue found,
This, that in safety now I haue you seene,
And meane of your deliuerance haue beene.
Id. Ib. book iii. can. 12.

But fortune try'd at length with my afflictions,
Some ships of Maltha met the Ottoman fleet,
Charg'd them, and boarded them, and gave me freedom:
With my deliverers I serv'd.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Fair Maid of the Inn, act iv. sc. 5.

Excommunications, as in the Apostles' times they were deliverings over to Satan, so now shall be deliverings over to a foreign enemy, or the people's rage.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 124. Episcopacy Asserted, sec. 36.

Moreover, as they are twins of an illegitimate and scandalous conception, their delivery is commonly after such a manner, as that of Pharez and Zara, where he that put his hand first into the world, came entyrely last into it.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 12. sec. 1.

The greatest part of men make such a bargain for the delivery-up of themselves as Thama did with Juda; instead of a kid, the necessary provisions of human life, they are contented to do it for rings and bracelets. Cowley. Essay 1. Of Liberty.

Plato, after having delivered very noble and almost divine truths concerning the nature and attributes of the Supreme God, weakly advises men to worship likewise inferiour Gods, Dæmons, and Spirits. Clarke. On the Attributes, p. 293.

It ought to encourage us to pray for mercy, for our God is the same, as able and as willing to deliver now as then: wherefore we say, have mercy upon us.
Comber, vol. i. fol. 325. part ii. sec. 5. sec. 8.

As for the presbyterians, they were so apprehensive of the fury of the commonwealth party, that they thought it a deliverance to be rescued out of their hands.
Burnet. Own Times, vol. i. book i. p. 81.

In the 15 v. we read that there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city. A worthy service indeed, and certainly we may expect that some honourable recompence should follow it; a deliverer of his country, and that in such distress could not but be advanced. DELIVER — DELPHAX
South. Sermons, vol. i. p. 177.

The investitures of bishops and abbots, which had been originally given by the delivery of the pastoral ring and staff, by the king of England, were after some opposition wrung out of their hands.
Burnet. History of Reformation, vol. i. book i. p. 20.

As all worldly enjoyment is uncertain, and unexpected deliverances from evil sometimes happen, a considerate mind even when joy is predominant, will not be wholly exempt from fear; and in the deepest affliction, a pious mind will not be without hope of deliverance, or at least of consolation.
Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, vol. i. part i. ch. ii. sec. 5.

These benefits do also determine and model the special forms and expressions of worship, paid to God the Father: He is also to be worshipped because he is God, but he is to be worshipped in this or in that form of address, that is, as a deliverer or Saviour, &c. because he rescued and saved his people.
Watts. Works, vol. vi. p. 402.

He was simple, modest and scrupulous; so scrupulous, that it gave a peculiar slowness to his delivery: he never uttered his opinion hastily, nor hastily assented to others.
Walpole. Catalogue of Engravers, vol. v. p. 270.

DELL, Dutch and Ger. delle. Locus declivis. Spenser writes Delve, q. dell. See DELVE.

Soone after the begynnynge of the cytie, there hapned to be a great erthe quaue, and after there remayned a greatte dell or dytte without botume.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book ii. ch. ix.

No more the company of fresh fair maids
And wanton shepherds be to me delightful,
Nor the shrill pleasing sound of merry pipes
Under some shady dell, when the cool wind
Plays on the leaves.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Faithful Shepherdess, act i. sc. 1.

This evening as I whistl'd out my dog,
To drive my straggling flock, and pitch'd my fold,
I saw him dropping sweat, o'er-laboured, stiff,
Make faintly as he could, to yonder dell.
Dryden. The British Worthy, act ii.

Then let me rove some wild and heathy scene,
Or find some ruin midst its dreary dells,
Whose walls more awful nod
By thy religious gleams.
Collins. Ode to Evening.

DELPHAX, in Zoology, a genus of Hemipterous insects, belonging to the family Cicadidæ.

Generic character. Antennæ inserted in a nich under the eyes, a little longer than the head, the first joint shorter than the second.

The genus as thus characterised by Latreille, does not correspond with the genus as established by Fabricius, but it comprehends some of its species. Latreille, in his Précis de Caract. Génér. des Ins., proposed this genus under the name of Asiracus. The Delphaces have great affinity to the Fulgoræ, or Lantern Flies. Their wings are usually very short; Latreille cited several species, amongst which are the following, found in Europe:

1. D. flavescens, Latr.
2. D. marginatus, Latr.

Very little is known of the manners of the species of this genus; they are most probably very similar to the other Cicadæ.

DELPHI.

DELPHI. DELPHI, one of the wealthiest and most celebrated Cities of Ancient Greece, was placed at a considerable height above the sea on the declivity of Mount Parnassus, in the little State of Phocis. "Its most ancient name," says the Scholiast on Homer, (Il. ii. 519,) "was the Grove of Parnassus, (παρνασσία νάπη;) then it was called Pytho, and afterwards Delphi." Pausanias, a better authority, says (Phocis, vi.) that Pytho was a more modern appellation than Delphi. The former, however, was the favourite with the Poets, and of no recent date, since it occurs in Homer, (Od. Θ 79,) Situation.

Names.

> Ὡς γάρ οἱ χρείων μυθήσατο Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων
> Πυθοῖ ἐν ἠγαθέῃ.

Pythia, which is merely an epithet derived from Pytho, was another name given to Delphi, and Ptolemy is certainly wrong in making them different Towns at a distance from each other. Pytho, the poetic name of Delphi, is derived from a Greek verb which signifies to putrify, (πύθεσθαι,) from the putrefaction of an enormous serpent, sprung from the earth after Deucalion's flood, and slain by Apollo's arrows, who thus avenged the wrongs of his mother, Latona, whom that ferocious dragon had led a weary dance during the days of her pregnancy. The ancient Etymologists, it may be observed, seem to have been a little at fault here, (as they often are elsewhere,) for the dragon was named Pytho, and thus he himself instead of his putrefaction may have named the place on which he fell. Delphinè (Δελφίνη) according to Apollonius Rhodius, (ii. 706,) was the name of the serpent that haunted the spot whence the sacred afflatus issued, and hence some of the Ancients deduced Delphi; others have discovered, or invented, a son of Apollo, named Delphus, in order to account for the name of the City.

Oracle. The early history of the Oracle is thus related by Diodorus Siculus, (xvi. c. 26,) Goats, he says, are reported to have been the first discoverers of it. There is a chasm in the place where the Adytum or inmost recess of the Temple stood; and whenever the goats were browsing round it, an event very common in those days, for the Town of Delphi was not yet in existence, any one of them which happened to go close to the chasm and look in, began to skip about in a surprising manner, and bleat in a very unusual note. This surprised the goatherd not a little, and being curious to find out how it came to pass, he went up to the chasm himself, looked in to see how it was, and began to dance and utter strange sounds like his goats, not unintelligible bleatings like theirs, but predictions of future events. The report of these extraordinary facts was soon spread abroad through the neighbourhood; numbers came to see this wonder-working chasm, and as soon as they approached it were seized with the same phrensy, (πλησιάζονται ἐνθουσιάζειν;) so that it shortly became an object of universal wonder, and men were convinced that it was an Oracle delivered by the Earth. Persons wishing to dive into futurity came thither, and edified each other by their prophecies; but many, in the midst of their phrensy, jumped into the chasm, and never made their appearance again; so that the inhabitants of the neighbourhood resolved, in order to keep every body out of danger, to appoint a Priestess, one for all, by whom alone the oracles should be collected.* For her they contrived a machine on which she might mount and rave (ἐνθουσιάζειν) without hazard, and prophecy for all who wished it. This machine stood on three legs, and was therefore called a Tripod; and the brazen Tripods used in our days, adds Diodorus, are little more than copies of the whole of this old apparatus.

As Poetry was under the immediate patronage of Apollo, the Oracles were long delivered in verse, till some wags observed, that "the worst of all Poets was the God of Poetry;" and to avoid the repetition of that sarcasm, the Pythia, (so the Priestess at Delphi was called,) condescended to deliver her responses in prose. Parnassus, on the declivity of which the City of Delphi stood, is a very abrupt and rocky mountain, the summit of which is distinguished by two remarkable peaks, called Nauplia and Hyampæa; it was also sacred to Apollo, the Muses, and Bacchus.

From the fork between those peaks sprung the river Plistus, (ὁ Πλειστὸς,) which running through the valley between Mount Cirphis and Parnassus entered the Gulf of Crissa, close to the ancient Town of Cirrha, (Strabo, ix. p. 288,) which was the port of Delphi. (Pausanias, Phocis, c. 38.) Crissa, whence the Gulf received its name, lay a little to the south-east of Cirrha. The position of Delphi, almost in the centre of Greece, both within or without the isthmus, was artfully applied by the Priests as an additional proof of its sanctity; and they perhaps invented the fable which marked it as the spot where the eagles met, which Jupiter sent forth at the same moment from the east and west. Hence it was termed the navel of the earth, and a large boss (ὀμφαλὸς) supporting the figures mentioned in the fable was shown in the Temple. This superstition, it may be remarked, is not without its parallel: for the Arabs believe, and have probably done so from time immemorial, that Mekkah is the navel of the world; and the Hindûs represent their imaginary peak of Méru, in the centre of the seven seas and continents, just like the projecting umbilicus, or boss, on the circular bucklers of the Greeks. A similar belief, respecting the central site of Jerusalem, may be collected from many passages in the Divina Commedia of Dante.

Mount Phis. The Temple and holy City were placed on a very elevated terrace at the foot of these peaks, but overlooked from the south by Mount Cirphis, from which Parnassus was separated, in the time of Strabo, by a woody valley. Near the summit of the mountain was the village of Lycorea, (ἡ Λυκώρεια,) named from the Lycor wolves, (or more probably jackalls,) by the howlings

* As the channel by which the inspiration was received would not perhaps have been readily conjectured, it is fortunate that an exact account of it has been preserved by an ancient Christian writer. Œcumenius in his Comment on the 16th Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, says, Λέγεται ἡ Πυθία αὐτὴ γύνη τις οὖσα ἐκκαθῆσθαι τῷ τρίποδι τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος, διαιροῦσα τὰ σκέλη, ἅτ' οὕτως πνεῦμα πονηρὸν κάτωθεν ἀναδιδόμενον, καὶ διὰ τῶν γεννητικῶν αὐτῆς διαδυόμενον μορίων, πληροῦν τὴν γυναῖκα τῆς μανίας, καὶ ταύτῃ, τὰς τρίχας λύουσαν, λοιπὸν βακχεύεσθαί τε καὶ ἄφρον τοῦ στόματος ἀφιέναι, καὶ οὕτως ἐν παρρησίᾳ γενομένην τὰ τῆς μανίας φέγγεσθαι ῥήματα. Had Swift studied Œcumenius? vide Tale of a Tub.

of which, the natives of the plains were guided to that spot when escaping from the flood of Deucalion. Close to the Temple of Apollo and the sacred chasm was the Castalian fount, whence the Muses, of whom it was supposed to be a favourite haunt, were called "the Castalian Sisters."

Another celebrated place on the declivity of Mount Parnassus was the Corycian Grove and Cavern. "On going up to the summits of the mountain," says Pausanias, (Phocis, c. 32,) "at about sixty stadii (seven miles) from the city, there is a statue of brass, and then the road to the Corycian Cave becomes more passable. This cavern is the most remarkable," and he soon afterwards adds, "much the largest which I ever beheld. It may be penetrated to a great distance without the aid of a torch. It is very lofty, and there is more water filtering from above, drops of which are seen every where on the ground, than what springs from the sources below. It is considered by the inhabitants as sacred to the Corycian Nymphs and Pan." This was the Palace of the Nymphs on Mount Parnassus, mentioned by Philoxenus as having its ceilings gilt; for it appeared at certain seasons, as we are told by Antigonus Carystius, (Hist. Mirabil. c. 141,) "as if covered with gold," probably in consequence of some bright ochre contained in the fluid which filtres through the rock.

With regard to the Temple itself, "it was at first," says Pausanias, (Phocis, c. v.) "nothing but a bower made of laurel branches from Tempe. It was afterwards more solidly built by a certain Delphian named Pteras. It was next constructed of brass, but subsequently swallowed up, or consumed by fire. Trophonius and Agamedes then rebuilt it of stone, but their work was burned in the first year of the LVIIIth Olympiad, (B.C. 548.) A bargain was made by the Amphictyons, to have it rebuilt for 300 talents, (£67,500.) and Delphians were sent to ask alms, from country to country and from city to city. Spintharus of Corinth was the architect then employed. This Temple was standing in the time of Strabo, (ix. 3.) Its treasures, like those of Delos, were immense. Almost all the great cities of Greece had separate chapels, in which their votive offerings were deposited, (Herod. i. 50;) and an account of the magnificent gifts of the Kings of Lydia may be found in Herodotus, (i. 14, 49, 54.)

The Pythian Games, in honour of Apollo, celebrated in the third year of every Olympiad, in the month of Munychion, (April,) (Corsini Fasti Attici, ii. 295, Dissertat. Agonist. iv. 39, 40, 45, 46,) attracted vast numbers of strangers to Delphi; and the City, which rose like an amphitheatre on the flank of the mountain, presented as magnificent a spectacle to the stranger who approached it, as Delos, the other great sanctuary of the twins of Latona. Among the votive offerings by which the Temple was decorated, one is peculiarly deserving of notice, as it is still in existence, and there are few works of so remote an antiquity, the history of which can be so satisfactorily traced. (Gibbon's Rome, iii. 22.) Out of the spoils taken at Platæa, after the defeat of Xerxes, (B. C. 479,) "the victors," says Herodotus, (ix. 80,) "caused the golden tripod to be made, which stands, supported on a three headed serpent of brass, near the altar in the Temple of Delphi." The tripod was converted into money by the Phocians in the sacred war, (Pausan. Phocis, xiii. p. 830;) but the brazen serpent remained uninjured, and was removed by Constantine, (Zosimi Hist. ii. p. 106,) with other monuments of art, from Delphi to Constantinople, where its headless trunk still adorns the Hippodrome.

Successive plunderers of the Temple.

The Temple of Delphi was plundered at various periods. Pausanias (Phocis, c. ix.) mentions the Eubœan pirate, Crius, the Phlegyæ, headed by their father Phlegyas, son of Mars, and Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, who, according to the Delphians, was asassinated when he had come thither for the purpose of plunder, (B. C. 1262.) (Eurip. Andromache, 1239.) A miraculous shower of stones from heaven, as was believed, but most probably thrown from the heights above by inhabitants who had taken refuge there, saved the place from being ransacked by the army of Xerxes, (B. C. 480;) but its treasures were seized by the Phocians themselves, (B. C. 355,) for the purpose of carrying on the sacred war. It was threatened by Brennus, and the Gauls whom he led, (B. C. 279,) but he was prevented from executing his threats, and punished, as the Greeks believed, by the interposition of the Gods. (Pausan. Phocis, c. 22, 23.) Nero is also charged by Pausanias and Dio, (l. 62.) with having plundered this Temple; and, the latter affirms, that he filled up the chasm whence the prophetic afflatus issued. This, if it be true, must have been done in his journey into Greece, A. D. 67, but it is not mentioned by other Historians. "Riches," says Strabo, (ix. 3,) "being much coveted, are with difficulty preserved, even though consecrated to the Gods; thus the Sanctuary at Delphi is now in the utmost penury, though formerly possessed of great treasures." Such was its condition in the IId century; and, as it was further despoiled by Constantine the Great in the IVth, little could be left to excite the cupidity of the barbarians and adventurers, who so often desolated Greece in the following ages.

Amphictyonic Council.

Delphi was under the immediate protection of the Amphictyons, who held their assemblies there in the Spring of every year, (Demosth. pro Corond, sec. 275, 276,) from B. C. 1440 to the beginning of the IIId century of our era.

The modern village, Castri.

This City, once so highly venerated and adorned with all the splendour of Grecian art, has long been reduced to a mere hamlet, called Castrí, (τὸ Καστρὶ,) by its wretched inhabitants. Its actual condition is thus feelingly depicted by Dr. Edward Daniel Clarke, (Trav. vii. 225.)

"It was beginning to grow dark as we drew nigh to Castrí, the name of a wretched village, now occupying the site of the sacred city. At length we saw this truly wonderful place, covering a lofty eminence upon the south side of the mountain, immediately beneath some high perpendicular precipices, whence a chasm of the rifted rock admits the waters of the Castalian fountain to fall from Parnassus towards the sea. The village consists of about seventy houses, whose inhabitants are Greeks; and wherever Greek peasants are found in the villages instead of Albanians, want and wretchedness are generally apparent. We were conducted to pass the night in the poor cottage of the poorest peasant of this poverty-struck village; who, with a wife and many children, living in sickness and in sorrow, greeted our coming with that gladness which the afflicted feel, when they have some one to whom they may relate the story of their woes, even if this be the only consolation they are likely to experience.

DELPHI.

"In the morning," he says, (226,) "we began a very careful examination of the antiquities and natural curiosities of Delphi;" but this search for the crevice, whence the mephitic exhalation issued, was unsuccessful; a circumstance which seems to give a colouring to Dio's account of its having been filled up by Nero. An inscription on a marble slab near the Church of St. Nicolas, records an Amphictyonic Council held in the reign of Hadrian; and another, on a pillar in the same Church, and evidently of the same age, joins the Council of the Achæans with that of the Amphictyons.

Castalian Fountain.

"The Castalian Fountain on the eastern side of the village, is situate beneath a precipice one hundred feet in height, upon the top of which a chasm in the rock separates it into pointed crags; and these towering above Delphi, and being a part of Parnassus, have been sometimes considered and erroneously described as the tops of the mountain, which has therefore been said to have a double summit." "The site of the Gymnasium, mentioned by Pausanias, (Phocis, c. 8. p. 817,) is now occupied by a Monastery, dedicated to the Virgin, (Panayía.) The remains of the Fountain Castalia consist of a large square shallow basin, with steps to it, cut in a rock of marble; once, no doubt, the Castalian bath, where the Pythia used to wash her whole body, and particularly her hair, before she placed herself upon the Tripod, in the Temple of Apollo. This basin is filled with the water of the fountain. Above the basin rises the perpendicular precipice to its cloven summit before mentioned, which is at the height of about an hundred feet. In the face of this precipice are niches scooped in the rock; for the votive offerings. On the left hand, a large wild fig-tree, sprouting above the water of the fountain upon that side of the basin, spreads its branches over the surface of the rock; which is further ornamented by a most luxuriant garniture of shrubs, ivy, moss, brambles, and pensile plants; mingling together the varied hues of their flowers over the red and grey masses of the marble." One of the niches, mentioned above, has been transferred from some Pagan Deity to a Christian Saint, and is dedicated to the Apostle John, having part of an ancient basso rilievo substituted for an altar. "There is an opening in the rock towards the left of the fountain, where, in certain seasons, the melting snows and torrents from Parnassus pour down through a chasm, in a vehement cataract, (Cassotis?) and above, within the clift, a cavern is visible, which Wheler, (Journey, p. 315,) most unreasonably judged to be the Antrum Corycium, or Grotto of the Nymphs."

Corycian Cavern.

That celebrated Cavern was described to Dr. Clarke, (who could not visit it on account of the snow, then of a great depth in that part of the mountain,) as capacious enough to contain three thousand persons. It is well known to the peasants of Castrí, though between two or three hours distance, and is called by them Sarand'avlè, (Σαράντα αὐλή,) the Forty Courts. It was, however, explored by Mr. Raikes, who travelled in Phocis at a more favourable season of the year.

"The vineyards," he says, (Walpole's Mem. on Turkey, i. 312,) in speaking of the valley from which he set out on his excursion to the Cave, "were soon passed, and the ascent became more and more steep, until, in an hour's time from Aracova, (Ἀράχωβα, Arákhova,) I was susprised on entering a wide plain [illegible] of considerable extent and cultivation, when I expected to see nothing but rocks and snow. High above this wide level the ridges of Parnassus rose on the north and east, covered with snow and hid in clouds. The plain before me could not be less than four or five miles across; a large dull looking village was placed in the middle of it; a lake, with banks most beautifully broken, was on my left. The view to the southward from this spot was extensive and very striking; the Mountain Cirphis on the other side of the valley of Aracova terminated in a flat table-land, (ὄρος ἀπότομον, Strabo, ix. 3,) like the recess in Parnassus, well cultivated and studded with villages; but the greater height of both these plains raised them above the regions of Spring which we had left below;* vegetation had not yet begun to appear, and the snow lay in patches over both of them. Beyond, the mountains of the Morea filled up the distance.

"We rode across the plain towards the north, and leaving our horses at the foot of the ascent which bounded it, climbed up a steep and bushy slope to the mouth of the Corycian Cave. I had been so repeatedly disappointed with scenes of this kind, they had so generally appeared inferior to the descriptions given of them, that I expected to meet with the same reverse here, and to find nothing but a dark narrow vault. I was, however, to be for once agreeably surprised; the narrow and low entrance of the cave spread at once into a chamber 330 feet long by nearly 200 wide, the stalactites from the top hung in the most graceful forms, the whole length of the roof, and fell like drapery down the sides. The depth of the folds was so vast, and the masses thus suspended in the air were so great, that the relief and fulness of these natural hangings, were as complete as the fancy could have wished. They were not, like concretions or incrustations, mere coverings of the rock; they were the gradual growth of ages, disposed in the most simple and majestic forms, and so rich and large, as to accord with the size and loftiness of the cavern. The stalagmites, below and on the sides of the chamber, were still more fantastic in their forms than the pendants above, and struck the eye with the fancied resemblance of vast human figures.

"At the end of this great vault a narrow passage leads down a wet slope of rock; with some difficulty, from the slippery nature of the ground on which I stood, I went a considerable way on, until I came to a place where the descent grew very steep, and my light being nearly exhausted, it seemed best to return. On my way back, I found, half buried in the clay, on one side of the passage, a small antique patera of the common red and black ware. The incrustation of the grotto had begun to appear, but it was unbroken, and I was interested in finding this simple relic of the homage once paid to the Corycian Nymphs, by the ancient inhabitants of the country. The stalagmitic formations on the entrance of this second passage are wild as imagination can conceive, and of the most brilliant whiteness.

---

* So the Γεωγραφία Νεωτερική (Vienna, 1791, p. 195) says, in speaking of Parnassus, Εἰς τὴν κορυφὴ ἡ ἄνοιξι γίνεται τὸν Μάϊ, εἰς καιρὸν ὅπου εἰς τὰ παραθαλάσσια ἡ ἄνοιξι ἀρχίζει ἀπὸ τὰ τέλη τοῦ Ἰαννουαρίου: "at the summit, the Spring begins in May, while on the coast, the Spring begins at the end of January."

DELPHI. — DELPHINULA.

"It would not require a fancy, lively like that of the ancient Greeks, to assign this beautiful grotto as a residence to the Nymphs. The stillness which reigns through it, only broken by the gentle sound of the water which drops from the point of the stalactites, (Destillantes quoque guttæ in lapides durescunt in antris Coryciis, Pliny, l. xxx. i. 20.) the ὕδατ' ἀενάοντα of the Grotto of the Nymphs in the Odyssey, (N 109,) the dim light admitted by its narrow entrance, and reflected by the white ribs of the roof, with all the miraculous decorations of the interior, would impress the most insensible with feelings of awe, and lead him to attribute the influence of the scene to the presence of some supernatural being. An inscription, which still remains on a mass of rock near the entrance, marks that the cavern had been dedicated to Pan and the Nymphs."

This cavern must be at least two hours distant from Arákhova, (=48 stadii,) and that place is between two and three (50 and 55 stadii) from Castrí, which appears to give a greater distance than that mentioned by Pausanias; he, however, only says (c. xxxii.) that Delphi is sixty stadii from the foot of the ascent, and does not give the whole interval between the two places.

"The water of the Castalian Fountain is cool and pleasant to the taste. After passing from the bath or basin, it falls down southward in a deep and narrow channel (Cassotis, Pausan. x. c. 24) towards Plistus, which separates Mount Cirphis from Parnassus; and having joined that river, it runs by the ruins of Crissa (now Crissò) into the Crissæan Bay. In the first part of its course from the Fountain, it separates the remains of the Gymnasium behind the place where the Monastery of the Virgin now stands, from the village of Castrí; and between the Fountain and that Monastery the remains of the Bœotian gate may be traced. The Stadium was above the site of the village, and a little to the west of it, immediately under some perpendicular cliffs. It is even more entire than that of Athens, for the marble seats yet remain; they consist of the same substances as the cliffs around Delphi, and at the curved or upper extremity of the Stadium they are hewn in the natural rock. The length of the area may be estimated at 220 yards. Some massive architraves in the Monastery of St. Elias, below the Stadium, led Messrs. Clarke and Cripps to suppose that it is on the site of one of the principal Temples in the ancient city. Near this place the rock is hewn into several recesses, over which there is a bull's head finely sculptured. Hard by, an alcove or grotto, which has a seat all round the interior, cut out of the solid stone, affords a complete view of the whole κοῖλον of ancient Delphi, formed, like a theatre, (Strabo, ix. 3,) of terraces rising in succession one above the other, and of sufficient width to admit of Temples and other public buildings. The front work of these terraces, being perfectly even and perpendicular, is every where artificial; it exhibits a Cyclopean masonry adapted to the natural declivity of the rock. Parts only of these terraces now remain, but enough to enable a skilful architect to form a plan of the whole; "but it should be fitted," says Dr. Clarke, (vii. 245,) "to a model of Parnassus; for in the harmonious adjustment, here conspicuous, of the works of God and man, every stately edifice and every majestic pile raised by human labour was made to form a part of the features of the awful mountain. From whatever quarter Delphi was approached, a certain solemn impression of supernatural agency must have been excited, diffusing its influence over every object; so that the whole district became a saying throughout Greece, and ALL PARNASSUS WAS ACCOUNTED HOLY." (Strabo, ix. 3.)

DELPHI. — DELPHINULA.

Cassotis.

Gymnasium.

Stadium.

Nearly in the centre of the ancient city, the massy ruins and inscriptions scattered among them, seem to indicate the site of the Temple of Apollo, especially as one of those memorials records the dedication of Amarius Nepos Ægialinus to the Pythian Apollo. There are other remains of public buildings, but in so mutilated a state, that it is impossible to form any rational conjecture as to the purpose for which they were designed.

Temple of Apollo.

(Strabonis Geograph. ix. 3, p. 607, seq. ed. Oxon. fol. p. 637, Amst. 1707, fol.; Pausanias, Græciæ Descriptio Phocicas, l. x. p. 798, ed Kuhn, Lips. 1696, fol.; Dodor. Sic., Biblioth. Hist., ed. Wesseling, Amst. 1746, fol. l. xvi. sec. 26, p. 101; Barthelemy, Voy. du Jeune Anacharsis, iii. 41, Deux-Ponts, 1793; Clarke's Travels, vii. ch. 6, p. 217; Walpole's Mem. relating to Turkey, p. 64, 311, 337; Dodwell's Travels in Greece, the Plates to which are as faithful as they are finely executed.)

DELPHINIUM, in Botany, a genus of the class Polyandria, order Trigynia, natural order Ranunculaceæ. Generic character: calyx none; corolla, petals five, the upper petal with a spur, enclosing the spur of the two-leaved nectary; anthers two-lobed; capsule cylindrical, bursting along the inner edge.

Willdenow describes fourteen species, mostly natives of Europe; they are hardy herbaceous plants. D. consolida, the common Single Larkspur, is a native of England; the Double Larkspur is D. ajacis; D. grandiflorum, with petals of an intense blue, is a native of Siberia; D. alatum, the Bee Larkspur, is a native of North America; the seeds of D. staphisagria are called Stavesacre.

DELPHINULA, in Zoology, a genus of spiral operculated shells, established by Lamarck. In the system of Animals without Vertebræ, Lamarck placed these shells which are marine with the land Cyclostoma, from which they are very distinct by their pearly inside, and, doubtless, are differently constructed.

Generic character. Shell subdiscoidal or conic, umbilicated, solid; whorls rough or angular; mouth entire, round or rarely trigonal; peristome continued, often fringed or thickened; operculum distinct.

These shells are usually rough, or armed with long squamous spines; their umbilicus is mostly large, and the peristome is continued, and often entirely free and separate from the rest of the shell. The inside is pearly, and the operculum is hairy. Lamarck has described several species of this genus, both recent and fossil. The following has been the longest known, and may be considered as the type of the genus:

DELPHINULA. — DELPHINUS.

D. laciniata, Lamarck, the Turbo Delphinus of Linnæus, which has been figured by most Authors.

This species is exceedingly apt to vary in its form, and when the whorls are separate and the spire conical, Lamarck has considered it distinct under the name of D. distorta, but the intermediate varieties are not uncommon.

Lamarck has mentioned a species under the name of D. trigonostoma, which has lately been described in the Tankerville catalogue, but it appears rather to belong to the genus Cancellaria, and has been called C. favanii.

Several of Lamarck's fossil species, as D. marginata, &c., do not agree with his characters of the genus, and are certainly provided with shelly opercula; they must either be formed into a new genus, or be placed with Mr. Marryat's Cyclostrema, which appears to be closely allied to them, but they agree most nearly with the recent D. Listeri. See Lister, t. 608, f. 460.

DELPHINUS, Lin.; Dolphin, Pen. In Zoology, a genus of animals belonging to the family Cetacea Ordinaria, order Cetacea, class Mammalia.

Generic character. Teeth in both jaws, single, and generally conical.

The Dolphins are the most ferocious of the order Cetacea. They have been divided by Cuvier into four subgenera, the last of which differs very much from the others, in having palatine teeth, and but two teeth in the lower jaw.

α Dolphins Proper.

Mouth projecting, so as to form a kind of beak.

D. Delphis, Lin.; le Dauphin ordinaire, Lacep.; Dolphin, Pen. This animal is about ten feet long, and almost straight, the back being but slightly curved, and the body slender; the beak is flattened from above to below, and each jaw is provided with from forty-two to forty-seven slightly curved conical teeth; the blow-hole is placed in the middle of the head; the back fin high, triangular and placed nearer to the tail than the head; pectoral fins or anterior extremities placed low; tail horizontal and semilunar. Skin smooth; colour of the back dusky, becoming lighter on the sides, and white on the belly. It swims with great rapidity, and leaps so high out of water, as occasionally to throw itself upon a ship's deck. The position into which the Dolphin puts himself at the time of taking its leap, probably first induced the Ancients to paint and engrave it in the unnatural form in which it may be seen in most of their representations. They esteemed the Dolphin as a sacred fish, (Athenæus, vii. 7,) and believed that it was the only animal without a gall, (id. viii. 12.)

Apollo is said to have piloted the Cretan vessels to Delos, under the form of a Dolphin; and M. Visconti thinks it certain, that he was adored under that form in his Temple in that Island.

D. Rostratus, Shaw; le Dauphin à bec mince, Cuv.; Narrow-snouted Dolphin, Shaw. The front of the head more prominent, and the jaws more lengthened and slender than in the other species; it has twenty-two or three conical teeth on each side in each jaw; its colours are pale, whence it has derived the name of the White Dolphin. It is said to be a native of the American Seas.

D. Tursio, Bonnaterre; le Grand Dauphin, Cuv.; le Souffleur, Lacep.; Great Dolphin. Beak short, broad, flattened above; twenty-three teeth on each side in each jaw, conical and blunt. It is about fourteen feet long, and found in the Mediterranean as well as in the other seas.

β Porpesses.

Mouth not beaked; but short and regularly prominent.

D. Phocæna, Lin.; le Marsouin Commun, Lacep.; Porpesse, Pen. The Porpesse does not measure more than five feet; its body is very thick towards the head, but becomes more slender towards the tail; the nose projects but little; the teeth, of which there are between fifty and sixty in each jaw, are flattened, cutting, and slightly movable; the eyes are small; the blow-hole on the top of the head; it is black above and white below. They are very common upon our coasts, and are most numerous during the Mackrel and Herring seasons, pursuing their prey with as great eagerness as Dogs; besides these, they live upon Sand Eels and Sea Worms, for which they turn up the sand with their nose, as Pigs root up the ground; and from this circumstance they have been called Sea Hogs. The Porpesse was formerly considered a fit delicacy for the Royal table. It is mentioned in Henry VIII's household-book, where it is ordered, that if a Porpesse be too big for a horse-load, allowance should be made to the Purveyor. The sauce for this savoury meat consisted of vinegar, crumbs of fine bread, and sugar. (Archæol. iii. 157.)

D. Orca, Lin.; le Dauphin Orque, Lacep.; Grampus, Pen. This animal is the largest of the genus, attaining from twenty to twenty-five feet in length; it is remarkably thick in proportion, one of eighteen feet measuring ten feet in diameter; the nose is flat, and turned up at the tip; there are thirty large, conical, and slightly curved teeth in each jaw, of which the posterior are flattened transversely; the blow-hole is further back on the top of the neck; the colour is black above, with a large spot of white on each shoulder; the sides marbled, and the belly white. This is a very voracious animal, and a great enemy to the Whale, which it pursues in herds, and destroys. Cuvier and Linnæus consider the D. Gladiator merely as a variety of the same species.

To this subdivision may be added the

D. Globiceps, Cuv.

γ Delphinapteres.

Resemble the Porpesses, but have no dorsal fin.

D. Leucus, Gmel.; le Delphinaptere Beluga, Lacep.; Beluga, Pen. About the size of the Grampus; the anterior part of the body represents a cone, of which the base, placed near the pectoral fins, joins the base of another, which is much longer, and forms the remainder of the body and tail; the orifice of the blow-hole is so placed that the water is thrown backwards instead of upwards. The teeth, of which there are nine on each side, are large and blunt, the pectoral fins large and thick, but the bones within them easily felt: the back has a kind of ridge on it, as in the Common Whale. The Beluga swims very swiftly, moving its tail up and down like the Crawfish, according to Pallas's account. It is a native of the Northern Seas, particularly about Davis's Straits.

LPHI-
IUS.

δ Hyperoodons.

Body similar to that of the Dolphins, but there are only two small teeth in front of the lower jaw, which do not always appear; the palate studded with little tubercles.

C. Bidens, Shaw; le Hyperoodon Butskopf, Lacep.; Bottle Head, Dale. A specimen of this animal, described by Mr. Hunter in the Philosophical Transactions, measured twenty-one feet in length. It resembles the Dolphin in appearance, but is much shorter; the pectoral and dorsal fins are small. It has often been called the Beaked Whale, and is caught in the Northern Seas and in the English Channel.

See Lacepede, Histoire Naturelle des Cetacées; Shaw, General Zoology; Cuvier, Règne Animal.

DELTOIDES, in Zoology, a tribe of Night-flying Lepidopterous Insects, established by Latreille.

Family character. Antennæ setaceous or simple; palpi four, apparent; wings horizontally extended on the side of the body, and forming with it a sort of delta or triangle, the hinder side or base of which is scooped out.

The larvæ of this tribe has usually sixteen legs, and appertain to that division which has been called False Tinnea by some Authors. They mostly construct tubes or kinds of galleries, by rolling up the leaves on which they live, and by netting together the residuum of their food.

This tribe is closely allied to True Phalæna, or Moths; it contains the genera Botis and Aglossus.

DELU'DE, DELU'DABLE, DELU'DER, DELU'DING, DELU'SION, DELU'SIVE, DELU'SORY. Deludere, to cease playing; de, and ludere, to play or sport; (ludere, a Lydis, who first introduced them (ludi) into Hetruria, whence the Romans received them. Vossius.) Deludere, ludendi finem facere. The Roman Gladiators before the real combat had a mock battle, as a preparatory exercise, and when they ceased from this, they were said deludere. If hence deduced, the word must have been subsequently applied to the mock battle itself. And thus, to delude is,

To cheat, to deceive, to beguile; sc. by assuming false appearances.

> The idol of a thing in case may be
> So depe emprinted in the fantasie
> That it deludeth the wittes outwardly,
> And so appereth in form and like estate,
> Within the mind, as it was figurate.
> Chaucer. The Complaint of Creseide, fol. 397.

> To shew shortly why that he
> Entred first, into that contre
> From whence he came, & from what region
> But he her put in delusion
> As he had done it for the nones.
> Lidgate. The Story of Thebes, part i. fol. 375.

But experience doth teach plainly howe folishe we are, howe mad and destitute of all sense, seyng that we suffer our selves so easily and so often tymes to be deluded and deceiued.
Caluine. Foure Godlye Sermons, serm. 4.

> That cripple that doth ofte delude,
> (when his dyceite is spyed)
> Must goe on foote, whome many men > did suffer for to ryde.
> Drant. Horace. Epistle to Scæua.

When I see a miracle done at any image, and perceaue that it bringeth men to the worshipping of itself, contrary to the facte and doctrine of the Apostles, which would not receaue it themselues, I must needes conclude, that it is but a delusion done by the Deuill to deceaue vs and to bring the wrath of God vpon vs. DELUDE.
Frith. Workes, fol. 154. Of the Sacrament, &c.

> ——————— This pure metal
> So innocent is, and faithful to the mistress
> Or master that possesses it, that, rather > Than hold one drop that's venomous, of itself
> It flies in pieces and deludes the traitor.
> Massinger. The Renegado, act i. sc. 3.

For well understanding the omniscience of his nature, he is not so ready to deceive himself, as to falsifie unto him, whose cognition is no way deludable.
Sir Thomas Brown. Vulgar Errours, book i. ch. ii.

Where it was articled betwixt two kings, that there should be a free admittance of each others commodities unto their several kingdoms, and after a command should be given prohibiting either of them unto their subjects the making use thereof, it could not but be understood a defrauding and deluding of the articles, and the true intention of them.
Cabbala. Sir Walton Aston to Lord Conway.

> Who ever by consulting at thy shrine
> Return'd the wiser, or the more instruct,
> To flie or follow what concern'd him most,
> And run not sooner to his fatal snare?
> For God hath justly giv'n the nations up
> To thy delusions.
> Milton. Paradise Regained, book i. l. 443.

> To cross my innocent desires,
> And make my griefs extreme,
> A cruel mistress thus conspires
> With a delusive dream.
> Sherburne. The Dream.

Let no play-hunters therefore any longer cheat themselves or others with these delusory false pretences, which have neither truth nor substance in them.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part ii. act iv. sc. 2.

> But Tyber now thou seek'st, to be at best,
> When there arrived, a poor precarious guest,
> Yet it deludes thy search: perhaps it will
> To thy old age lie undiscovered still.
> Dryden. From Ovid. Epistle 7.

> Turn, sir, survey that comely, awful man,
> And to my prayers be cruel if you can.
> KING. Away deluder; who taught thee to sue?
> Otway. Don Carlos, act iii. sc. 1.

> Did not the sun through heaven's wide azure roll'd,
> For three long years the royal fraud behold?
> While she laborious in delusion, spread
> The spacious loom, and mix'd the various thread.
> Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book ii.

> A step methinks may pass the stream,
> So little distant dangers seem;
> So we mistake the future's face,
> Ey'd through hope's deluding glass.
> Dyer. Grongar Hill.

> What are ye, now, ye tuneful triflers! once
> The eager solace of my easy hours,
> Ye dear deluders or of Greece or Rome,
> Anacreon, Horace, Virgil, Homer, what?
> The gay, the bright, the sober, the sublime?
> Thompson. Sickness, book i.

The penitent is translated from a state of delusion to a sound judgment and right apprehension of things, from shadowes to realities; even as one awaketh from the romantic scenery of a dream, to behold all things as they really are, and to do his duty in that station in which God has placed him.
Horne. Works, vol. iv. p. 275.

Say, however, and it is all that the wicked have to say, that such imaginations may be delusive, and such fears may be vain: but yet, weak as you suppose these fears to be, we must be much weaker than we are, before we can get rid of them: that is, we must lose our reason and understanding before we can forget there is a God who will judge the world in righteousness.
Sherlock. Discourse 57. vol. iii. p. 89.

DELUDE. — DELVE.

Nobody will deny we have some assurances that are fallacious, others that are true, but we can see no difference in the countenance of the one or the other, while they remain in our persuasion, when they have been driven out by opposite evidence, like servants whose faults you seldom hear of till they are turned away, then indeed we may discover their delusiveness, but then they are no longer our judgment; every judgment, while it is our present judgment, carries the same face of veracity.

Search. Light of Nature, vol. i. part i. ch. ii. p. 198.

DELVE, v. } A. S. delf-an; Dutch, delv-an, to DELVE, n. } dig. See DELF. Spenser writes Delve, DE'LVER, } a noun, q. dell.
DE'LVING. }

"Lord kyng," quoþ Merlyn, "zef þou wolt þe soþe wyte,
Let delue vnder þe fundement, & þou schalt bineþe fynde,
A water pol, þat haþ ymad, þat þis werk ys bi hynde."
Me dalf bi neþe, and fond þe water as Merlyn hadde yseid.

R. Gloucester, p. 395.

Þe Cristynemen delve vaste, & þer wal velde adoun,
So þat þe Sarasons zolde hem vp þer toun.

Id. p. 395.

——————— Alle Cristyne people
To delve and dike a deop diche al aboute unite.

Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 385.

And the baylyf seide withynne himsilf, what schal I do, for my lord taketh away fro me the baylie, delue may I not: I schame to begge. Wiclif. Luk, ch. xvi.

Certis I haue now lined to long,
Sith I may not this closer kepe,
All quicke I would be doluen depe.

Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 135.

Alas, what was he that first dalfe vp, the gobbettes or weights of gold couered vnder yerth, and the precious stones, that woulden haue be hidde. Id. The second Booke of Boccius.

That ofte whan I shulde plaie,
It maketh me drawe oute of the waie
In soleyn place by my selfe,
As doth a laborer to delfe.

Gower. Conf. Am., book vi. fol. 128.

Stronge and vyolente exercises be these, deluynge (specially in toughe clay and heuy,) &c.

Sir Thomas Elyot. The Castel of Helth, book ii.

When base desire bade men to delven low,
For needlesse metals, then gan mischief grow.

Hall. Satire 1. book iii.

——————— He by and by
His feeble feet directed to the cry;
Which to that shady delue him brought at last,
Where Mammon earst did sunne his treasury.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 8.

It is a darksome delue farre vnder ground
With thornes and barren brakes enuiround round,
That none the same may easily out win.

Id. Ib. book iv. can. 1.

Neither onely the citizens, but also the countrie-folkes doo very well vnderstande the same. Yee maie finde, yea, euen the very dichers and deluers, and cowheardes, and gardiners disputinge the holy Trinitie, and the creation of al thinges.

Jewel. Defence of the Apologie, fol. 507.

Moreover, these rules following, are to bee observed, That when any vines do require such delving and digging, the labourers ought to go to worke betimes before the heat of the day.

Holland. Pänie, fol. 533.

And hoary frosts, after the painful toyl
Of delving hinds, will rot the mellow soil.

Dryden. Virgil. Georgic 2.

His health is injured, his spirits dejected; his time lost; after all, the parent finds it necessary to employ him in his own trade, in digging and delving, in shoe-making, &c.

Knox. Works, vol. iii. p. 81. Winter Evenings, Even. 20.

DE'LUGE, v. } Fr. deluge; It. and Sp. diluvio; Lat. diluvium; from diluere, dilutum; terram enim reddat dilutam, i. e. wetted, washed, soaked. To cover with waters, to overflow, to overwhelm. Joye writes, Diluvy.
DE'LUGE, n. }

But now so wepeth Uenus in her sphere
That with her teares she wolf drench vs here,
Alas Scogan this is for thine offence
Thou causest this deluge of pestilence.

Chaucer. Certaine Balades, fol. 337.

The diluuye drowned not the worlde in one daye, but at last when the hyllis were all kouered, all were drowned.

Joye. Expesicion of Daniel, ch. x.

——————— Torture without end
Still urges, and a fiery deluge, fed
With ever burning sulphur unconsum'd.

Milton. Paradise Lost, book i.

Then murmuring from his beds, he boils, he raves,
And a foam whitens on the purple waves;
At every step, before Achilles stood
The crimson surge, and delug'd him with blood.

Pope. Homer. Iliad, book xxi.

Upon this supposition there must have been infinite deluges already past: for if ever this Atheist admits of a first deluge, he is in the same noose that he was.

Bentley. Sermon 3. p. 509.

The deluge-vomit, all the floor o'erflows,
And the sour savour nauseates every nose.

Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 6.

And as when stormy winds encountering loud,
Burst with rude violence the bellowing cloud,
Precipitate to earth, the tempest pours
The vexing hailstones thick in sounding showers:
The delug'd plains then every ploughman flies,
And every hind and traveller shelter'd lies.

Hamilton. Translations from tenth Book of Virgil's Æneis.

When it is urged, that princes from their relation to princes have a common cause, and a cause, too, it is meant, virtually paramount to the rights of subjects and of men; the obvious answer is, that they who are not princes have also a common cause, and the obvious consequence of that answer is, that if they are true to themselves, to their neighbours, and to their posterity, confederacy is to rise up against confederacy, and deluge the world with blood.

Dr. Samuel Parr. Sequel to the Printed Paper.

DEMAGOGUE, Gr. δημαγωγὸς, compounded of δῆμος, people, and αγ-εῖν, to lead.

A leader of the people; applied to a factious or seditious leader. Milton considers the word as a novelty.

Who were the chief demagogues to send for those tumults, some alive are not ignorant. Setting aside the affrightment of this goblin word: for the king, by his leave cannot coin English, as he could money, to be current (and 'tis believ'd this wording was above his known stile and orthography, and causes the whole composure to be conscious of some other author.) Yet if the people were sent for, emboldened and directed by those demagogues, who, saving his Greek, were good patriots, and by his own confession men of some repute for parts and piety, it helps well to assure us there was both urgent cause, and the less danger of their coming.

Milton. An Answer to Eikon Basilik.

A plausible insignificant word in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and a dreadful weapon.

South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 336.

Hence Aristophanes, in banter, I suppose, of the predictions in Herodotus,—makes a pompous and ridiculous oracle, and uses the same foolish introduction, to persuade a sausage-monger to set up for a demagogue and a ruler.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 257.

DEMA'IN, DEME'AN, DEME'SNE, DOMA'IN. } The same word variously written. See DOMAIN. Fr. demain or domain; Lat. dominium; from dominus, perhaps, —master of the house, (domus.)

"Fr. domaine; a man's patrimony or inheritance, proper and hereditary possessions; those whereof he is the right or true lord or possessor, and absolute owner: also, an hereditary property in, and possession of land, &c." Cotgrave. For the more technical usages of the word, see Dominicum in Spelman, Gloss. Arch.

The first of þise fiue was þorgh Romeyns,
That wan it of Casbalan into þer demeyns.
R. Brunne, p. 7.

And for the woodes in demeines
To kepe, tho ben Driades.
Gower. Conf. Am., book v. fol. 91.

Consent at laste
Since that thou hast
My hart in thie demayne,
For service trew
On me to rewe,
And reche me love agayne.
Wyat. Of Loue.

For his [Alexander] own demain and possessions at home, as also of the crown revenues, he had bestowed the most part upon his friends and followers. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 1045.

He also reuoked unto his hands certaine parcels of his demeane lands, which his father had given away.
Holinshed. Stephen of Bullougne, Anno 1154.

William also the Earle of Mortaigne, and Warren sonne of King Stephen, were compelled to surrender to King Henrie, the castell of Pemsey, the citie of Norwich, and other tounes, and castels which he held, apperteining to the demesne of the crowne.
Id. Henrie II. Anno 1115.

From demesnes, whose barren soil,
Ne'er produc'd the barley oil;
From all liars, and from those
Who write nonsence verse, or prose,
Libera nos, &c.
Cotton. The Litany.

Or say, what difference, if we live confin'd
Within the bounds of nature's laws assign'd,
Whether a thousand acres of demesne,
Or one poor hundred, yield sufficient grain?
Francis. Horace. Satire 1. book i.

——— Peleus with a willing heart
Receiving; lov'd me as a father loves
His only son, the son of his old age,
Inheritor of all his large demesnes.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book ix.

DEMESNE, DEMAIN, according to common acceptation, is the Lord's Chief Manor Place, with the lands thereto belonging, which he and his ancestors have from time to time kept in their own manual occupation, for the maintenance of themselves and families: all parts of a Manor, except what is in the hands of Freeholders, are said to be Demains. Copyhold lands have been accounted Demains, because they that are the tenants thereof, are judged in Law to have no other estate but at the will of the Lord, so that it is still reputed to be in the Lord's hands; this word is frequently used for a distinction between those lands that the Lord of the Manor hath in his own hands, or in the hands of his Lessee, demised at a rent, and such other land appertaining to the Manor which belongeth to Free or Copyholders.

DEMA'ND, v. DEMA'ND, n. DEMA'NDABLE, DEMA'NDANT, DEMA'NDER. } Fr. demander; It. domandare; Sp. demandar; parum deflexo sensu, from the Lat. demandare; de, and mandare, q. d. in manus dare; so Gr. ἐγχειρίζειν, in manus dare, tradere, committere.

As mandare, then, is to give, deliver or commit to the hands of another,

To demand is,—to seek, ask or require, from the hands of another. And generally, to ask, to claim, to require.

"I not nout," quoth the king, "wat ower demande be."
R. Gloucester, p. 500.

And me demaunded how and in what wise
I thither come, and what my errand was.
Chaucer. The Court of Loue, fol. 349.

But thise demaundes aske I first (quad he)
That sin it shal be don in hasty wise,
Wol ye assent, or elles you avise?
Id. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8224.

Of depe imaginacions,
Problemes and demaundes eke
His wisedome was to find and seke.
Gower. Conf. Am., book i.

When that repentant teares hath clensed clere from ill
The charged brest: and grace hath wrought therin amending will:
With bold demands then may his mercy well assaile
The speche man sayth: without the which request may none prevayle.
Surrey. Ecclesiastes, ch. v.

In the fyrst question if the demaundment had no tytle, how could he graunt to him the accion of the lande during his life, and in the second, if the plaintiffe had none interest how coulde he geue him daies of payment.
Hall. Henry V. The eighth Yere.

Is water and wine hotte or no?
The question is asked, so that he must answere to both, which he cannot doe at one time, and geue one resolute answere directly, according to the demaunder's will.
Wilson. The Arte of Logike, fol. 79.

And though the requeste was pitifull and they that made it familiar, and he to whom it was made, was the father, and the demaunder was the mother, and she for whom it was made was the douhter: the emperour granted it, but not without great displeasure. Golden Boke, O iiii. ch. xxxiii.

Hereof riseth a merrie tale of a Welshman, that lieng in this place abroad all night in the weather, and peraduenture not verie well occupied, was demanded of his hostesse (where he did breake his fast the next morrow,) at what inne he laie in the night precedent, because he came so soone to hire house yer anie of hir maids were vp?
Holinshed. Description of Britaine, ch. xiv.

He must accustome himself to represse his tongue and take some pause, allowing a competent space of time between the demand and the answer; during which silence, both the demander may have while to bethink himself and add somewhat thereto, if he list, and also the demané time to think of an answer, and not let his tongue run before his wit.
Holland. Plutarch, fol. 169.

In this case therefore the reward is not demandable, so much upon the account of the divine justice, as upon the account of the divine truth and fidelity.
Hale. Contemplations, vol. i. p. 379.

In a writ of right the tenant chose trial by battle, but when every thing was prepared and performed, at the day and place appointed for the battle, the demandants being solemnly called made default, whereupon final judgment was given against them.
State Trials. Proceedings against Mr. D. Ramsay.

FAITH. Sir, though I could be pleas'd to make my ills
Only mine own, for grieving other men,
Yet to so fair and courteous a demander
That promises compassion, at worst pity,
I will relate a little of my story.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Captain, act ii. sc. 1.

If we seriously do weigh the case, we shall find, that to require faith without reason is to demand an impossibility; for faith is an effect of persuasion, and persuasion is nothing else but the application of some reason to the mind, apt to draw forth its assent. Barrow. Sermon 2. vol. ii.

DEMAND. — DEMEAN.

I bad him boldly tell his fortune past;
His present state his lineage and his name;
Th' occasion of his fears, and whence he came.
The good Anchises rais'd him with his hand;
Who, thus encourag'd, answer'd our demand.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

Christ himself, whose example is our rule, first by a good argument proved, he ought not to pay that tribute which was demanded of him for repair of his own father's house; and then paid it quietly lest he should offend the demanders, and affront the law.
Comber. Companion to the Temple, vol. ii. fol. 572.

My blood was to have been the cement of a new alliance, nor could my innocence be any security, after it had once been demanded from abroad, and resolved on at home, that it was necessary to cut me off.
Lord Bolingbroke to Lord Lansdowne.

Mr. Prior is fully instructed and authorised to communicate our preliminary demands to France, and to report the answer to us.
Additions to the Life of Lord Bolingbroke.

One penny, they allowed, was demandable every offering-day for a rent of forty shillings; but they contended no more was demandable if the rent should be forty times forty shillings.
Horsley. Speeches, p. 422.

It is proper to establish an invariable order in all payments; which will prevent partiality; which will give preference to services, not according to the importunity of the demandant, but the rank and order of their utility or their justice.
Burke. On the Economical Reform.

The directors of some of those banks sometimes took advantage of this optional clause, and sometimes threatened those who demanded gold and silver in exchange for a considerable number of their notes, that they would take advantage of it, unless such demanders would content themselves with a part of what they demanded.
Smith. Wealth of Nations, book ii. ch. ii.

DEMARCATION. Cotgrave has "Desmarquer; to take away the mark from; or, to put from his mark." But, by usage, this word is equivalent to A mark, a marking off; sc. of boundaries or limits.

The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end, and resistence must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable.
Burke. On the Revolution in France.

A people [the English] among whom rise and progress in society and public estimation is one ascending slope, as it were, without a break or landing place; among whom no sullen line of demarcation separates and cuts off the several orders from each other, but all is one blended tint from the deepest shade that veils the meanest occupation of laborious industry to the brightest hue that glitters in the luxurious pageantry of title, wealth, and power.
Sheridan. Speech. Monday, 5 January, 1795.

Still I fear the line of demarcation between spiritual and temporal, it may not always be easy to define.
Horsley. Speeches, p. 497.

DEME'AN, v. DEME'AN, n. DEME'ANAUNCE, DEME'ANOUR, DEME'ANURE, DEME'ANING. Junius thinks that this word may be from the Fr. moyen; Lat. modus, vel medium. Modus vel ratio decenter se gerendi in rebus gerendis. Skinner suggests other conjectures. Mr. Tyrwhitt interprets the verb Demaine, in Chaucer's Second Book of Fame, To manage: and the noun management. There are other passages in which the application seems precisely the same; and hence it admits a doubt whether this verb may not be formed upon the noun demain or domain; and thus, to signify—

To rule or have dominion over; to manage, to conduct; sub. the behaviour, the mode and manner of acting; and thus, to treat, to behave towards; to behave or deport. It is used by some writers as if they considered it to be from the adj. mean; thus—

To act meanly; to debase, to disgrace.

Lo, is it not a great mischaunce
To let a foole haue gouernaunce
Of things that he cannot demaine.
Chaucer. The second Booke of Fame, fol. 279.

Come on with me, demeane you liche a maid
With shamefast drede, for ye shal speke I wis
With her that is the myrrour, ioy, and blisse
But somewhat strange, and sad of her demene
She is, beware your countenance be sene.
Id. The Court of Loue, fol. 352

Who shal me yeven teres to complaine
The deth of gentillesse, and of fraunchise,
That all this world welded in his demaine
And yet him thought it mighte not suffice?
Id. The Monkes Tale, v. 14583.

As the first finder mente I am sure
C, for calot, for if we haue O
L for leude, D, for demenure.
Id. The Remedie of Loue.

I cannot report ne make no rehersaile
Of my demening, with the circumstaunce
But wel I wot the speare with euery naile
Thirled my soule.
Id. The Lamentation of Marie Magdaleine, fol. 319.

He toke good hede of the person
And saw she was a worthy wight
And thought he wolde vpon the night
Demene hir at his owne will.
Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 34.

Neuer shal ther herafter [be a place] in which ther could anye man abide riche without the danger of eternal damnacion, euen for his riches alone, though he demened it neuer so wel.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1207. A Dialogue of Comforte.

Than they entreted with therle and with his counsel, and the erle who had many thynges to take hede of, bycause he knewe nat howe all the countre wolde be demeaned, therfore he toke them to mercy, and suffred them peasably to departe.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. ch. 228.

Item the boke howe men shoulde fle synne.
Item royall demenaunce worshyp to wynne.
Skelton. The Crowne of Laurell.

Thus by this demenour the people make the saintes God's felowes, that is to saye the seruantes matcheth with their master and the creatures mates to the Maker.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 140. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

Or which of them two do men set more by; and whither wil they thinke of most honest demeaner, her that they see either neuer, or but seldom, or her whome they meet in euery corner.
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, M. 7.

Of which their demenure, & that in these heresyes thei meane here no better than Luther doth hym self, I haue had good experience.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 262. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

In this estate the thre squyers that were sende fro therle to se their demeanynge founde them.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, ch. 399.

Cause have I none, quoth he, of cancred will
To quite them ill, that me demean'd so well:
But self-regard of priuate good or ill,
Moues me of each.
Spenser. Colin Clouts come home again.

That it will please his highness, that all merchants, as well denizens as strangers, coming into this realm, be well and honestly entreated and demeaned for such things where of subsidy is granted, as they were in the time of the king's progenitors and predecessors without oppression to them to be done.
State Trials. The Great Case of Impositions.

1. If the king do not demean himself by reason in the right of his crown his lieges be bound by oath to remove the king.
Id. The Case of the Postnati.

Lady. Alas good Monsieur;
A was a proper man, and fair-demean'd,
A person worthy of a better temper.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Noble Gentleman, act i. sc. 1.

They answered with a sullen confidence, that they should demean themselves according to their instructions, and would perform the trust reposed in them by the two Houses of Parliament.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part ii. p. 518.

When thou hast all this done, then bring me newes,
Of his demeane: thenceforth not like a louer,
But like a rebell stout I will him vse.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book v. can. 5.

The prince, according to the former token,
Which faire Serene to hem deliuered had
Pursu'd him straight, in mind to been ywroken
Of all the vile demeane, and vsage bad,
With which he had those two so ill bestad.
Id. Ib. book vi. can. 6.

For of so unsupportable a pride he was, that where his deeds might well stir envy, his demeanor did rather stir disdain.
Sidney. Arcadia, book ii.

Her name was Womanhood, that she exprest
By her sad semblant and demeanure wise:
For, stedfast still her eyes did fixed rest,
Ne rov'd at random after gazers guise,
Whose luring bayts oft-tymes doe heedlesse hearts entise.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iv. can. 10.

Representing unto us the manners of strange nations, the laws and customs of old time, the particular affairs of men, their consultations and enterprises, the means they have used to compass them withall and their demeaning of themselves when they were come to the highest or thrown down to the lowest degree of state.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch. To the Reader, A 3.

But Gods like us have too much sense
At poets' flights to take offence:
Nor can hyperboles demean us;
Each drab has been compar'd to Venus.
Answer by Dr. Swift to Dr. Sheridan.

But say, that stranger guest who late withdrew,
What and from whence? his name and lineage shew,
His grave demeanour and majestic grace
Speak him descended of no vulgar race.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book ii.

Towards his Protestant brethren of all persuasions he demeaned himself with great mildness and moderation.
Porteus. Life of Archbishop Secker.

These she to strangers oftentimes would shew,
With grave demean and solemn vanity,
Then proudly claim as to her merit due,
The venerable praise and title of vertu.
West. On Travelling.

If by the simplicity of your unassuming demeanour, you can gain their favour and kindness, you may rest satisfied that you are modest enough, and that your head has been in no respect turned by your good fortune.
Smith. Moral Sentiments, vol. i. p. 314.

DEME'NT, v. } Lat dementare; dementem facere. Vossius. De-men; de, and mens, without mind.
DEME'NTATE, v. } To deprive of the mind or senses; to be or cause to be mad, insane of understanding.
DEME'NTATE, adj. }
DEME'NCY. }

For he was thus demented and bewitched with these pestilent purswasions of his wicked rulers.
Joye. Expesicion of Daniel, ch. v.

O abhomynable Papystes and minysters of Sathan, whych thus seke to demente the symple hartes of the people.
Bale. Apology, p. 80.

And yet for all that
The king his clemency
Dispenseth with his demenay.
Skelton. Why come ye not to Court?

As if they landed in the mad haven in the Euxine Sea of Daphnis insana, which had a secret quality to dementate.
Burton. Democritus, to the Reader, fol. 75.

This heaviest judgment that ever fell upon a nation, extream misery, and extream fury, is, I confess, a most direful sight, but withall a more inauspicious prognostick, a sound of a trumpet to that last more fatal day, with an ARISE thou dementate sinner and come to judgment. Hammond. Sermon 8. vol. iv.

I speak not here of men dementated with wine, or inchanted with some temptation: the thing holds true of men even in their sober and more considering seasons.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 25.

What! when we have not an ally, not a friend who wishes us well in all Europe, are we so dementated, so fitted for destruction, as to make an enemy of America also?
Anecdotes of Bishop Watson, vol. ii. p. 375.

DEME'RGE, } Lat. demergere, sum; de, and mer-
DEME'RSE. } gere, to sink.

I found the receiver severed from its cover, and the air breaking forth through the water in which it was demerged.
Boyle. Physico-Mechanical Experiments, exp. 4. vol. iv. p. 519.

The receiver being erected, the mercury will again be stagnant in the bottom of the phial, and the orifice of the tube C C will be found demersed in it. Id. Ib. vol. iv. p. 515.

DEME'RIT, v. } From Gr. μείρ-ειν, dividere, to DEME'RIT, n. } divide, whence μέρ-ος, part; and hence will come, merere, quia meritum fere partium est, sive labor, sive pretium spectetur. Vossius. Demereri, demeritus, to earn.

"Fr. demerite; desert, merit, deserving; also, the contrary, a disservice, demerit, misdeed, ill-carriage, ill-deserving; (in which sense it is most commonly used at this day.") Cotgrave.

Vossius says, that to use demeritum for peccatum, is to recede from the purity of the Latin tongue.

But she that coud so yll do and wolde,
Hers be the blame for her demerite.
Chaucer. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 324.

I haue nowe no more to dooe on yearthe. If I haue demerited any loue or thanke at your hands, bestowe it wholly on my sonne, whan I am gone from you.
Udall. Preface vnto the King, fol. 7.

For thus their obstinate rebellion against Christ demeriteth, this is a reward worthy their desertes.
Id. Thessalonians, ch. ii.

And therefore these men, now prisoners at the bar, but answer to their offences, and receive according to their demerits; and first for their faults.
State Trials. Arraignment of Sir Richard Knightly and others.

After a very fair and full trial he [Lord Macguire] was found guilty by the jury, upon a most pregnant evidence, and then condemned, executed as a traitour at Tyburn, as he well demerited. Id. The Trial of Lord Macguire.

The inhabitants of Rhodes are restored to their libertie, often taken from them, or confirmed, according as they had merited (meruerant) by seruice abroade, or demerited (deliquerant) by sedition at home. Greneway. Tacitus, fol. 173.

There is no father that for one demerit,
Or two, or three, a sonne will disinherit,
That as the last of punishments is meant;
No man inflicts that pain till hope is spent.
Ben Jonson. Under-woods. An Elegie.

DE-MERIT. — DEMI.

But his deserts, I suppose, you will date from the same term that I do, his great demerits, that is, from the beginning of our late calamities.

Cowley. On the Government of Oiver Cromwell.

They were all concerned, either as accessories, or principals, and demerit a halter, if the repliant's opinion be law.

State Trials. A second Vindication of the Magistracy, &c.

If the demerit of all sins be equal, there can then be no reason for the degrees of punishment in another world; but to deny that there are degrees of punishment there, is not only contrary to reason, but to our Saviour's express assertion, that some shall be beaten with many stripes and some with fewer, and that it shall be more tolerable for some in the day of judgment, than for others. Tillotson. Sermon 35.

The facility with which testimonia are signed by men of high characters in the universities, is certainly injurious to the cause of learning and virtue. It confounds the distinctions between merit and demerit.

Knox. Liberal Education, sec. 48.

DEMESNE, see DEMAIN.

DE'MI, or DE'MY. } Fr. demi; Lat. dimidium, half: pars dimidiati altera; i. e. per medium divisi; either part of that which is divided through the middle.

Demy, half, is much used in Composition.

Demy, technically, is the name of paper half the size of Columbier.

After whom marched in order Quene Anne his wife likewyse crouned Iedinge on her left hande Prynce Edwarde her sonne, hauing on his hed a demy-crowne appoynted for the degree of a prince. Hall. Richard III. The first Yere.

The capitaine with all his retinue departed, leuyng behynd the ordinaunce of bombardes, curtawes, and demy-curtaux, slinges, canons, &c. Id. Henry VIII. The fifteenth Yere.

The fyrst day of February, the valiant knight Sir Robert Jernynghã, and with him fifty demy-lañces of the garison of Calayoe skoured the countrie to Odirsaell. Id Ib.

Do brauely horse, for wot'st thou whom thou mooust,
The demy-atlas of this earth, the arme,
And burganet of men.

Shakspeare. Antony and Cleopatra, fol. 344.

In St. Domingo was very much great ordnance, as whole cannon, demi-cannon, culverins, and such like.

Sir Francis Drake. West Indian Voyage.

I know that in the more subtle air of yours, tinsel sometimes passes for tissue, Venice beads for pearl, and demi-casters for bevers. Howell. Letter 1. book iii.

HIR. Therein thou shewedst thyself a perfect demi-christian too, to let the poor beg, starve, and hang.

Massinger. The Virgin Martyr, act ii. sc. 1.

Whilest this lustie nauie like a demi-conqueror, ryd thus at anchor, the Spanish faction in sundrie nations hadde divulged that England was subdued.

Stow. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1588.

Now in the meane season euery dutchesse put on her bonet a coronell of golde wrought with flowers & euery marchionesse put on a demy-coronell of golde.

Id. Henry VIII. Anno 1533.

But Claron, Melon, and others, ordained to set upon Archias, had their brest-plates or demy-cuiraces before them.

Holland. Plutarch, fol. 998.

——— Have not I placed
My sakers, culverings, demi-culverings,
My cannons, demi-cannons, basilisks,
Upon her breach.

Barry. Merry Tricks, act iii. sc. 1.

These three haue robb'd me, and this demy-diuell
(For he's a bastard one) had plotted with them
To take my life. Shakspeare. Tempest, fol. 18.

And to believe that either Gods or demi-gods do delight in murder, or shedding of man's blood, it is a mere mockery and folly. Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 147. Pelopidas.

At their feasts also they dranke the second cup unto their demi-gods and demi-goddesses. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 703.

The city of New Carthage resembled the old and great Carthage in situation, standing upon a demi-island, between an haven and a great lake.

Ralegh. History of the World, book v. ch. iii.

LIS. Pedro, did you send for this tailor? or you Moncado?
This light French demi-launce that follows us.

Beaumont and Fletcher. The Maid in the Mill, act iii. sc. 1.

So likewise, when, in a writ of right the demandant, alleadging the seisin of his ancestor, will not be compelled to prove the seisin alleadged, is he not to tender the king a summe certain of demi-mark, to have this benefit?

State Trials. The Great Case of Impositions.

——— He grew into his seat
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse,
As he had beene encorps't and demy-natur'd
With the braue beast.

Shakspeare. Hamlet, fol. 276.

No, as I am a demi-pagan, I sold the victuals, and coined the money into pottle pots of wine.

Massinger. The Virgin Martyr, act ii. sc. 1.

This royal throne of kings, this sceptred isle,
This earth of maiesty, this seate of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise.

Shakspeare. Richard II. fol. 28.

They iudge conclusions by demi-premises and halfe principles; they lay them in the ballance, stript from those necessarie materiall circumstances, which should giue them waight, and by shew of falling vneuen with the scale of most vniuersall and abstracted rules, they pronounce that too light which is not, if they had skill to weigh it.

Hooker. Ecclesiastical Polity, book v. fol. 440.

——— Your demi-puppets, that
By moon-shine doe the greene sowre ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites.

Shakspeare. Tempest, fol. 16.

But afterwards, in memory of this service aforesaid, by special command from the king, his coat-armour was rewarded with a canton sinister azure, and thereupon a demi-ramme.

Fuller. Worthies. Northamptonshire.

The proper subject whereof this cube particularly standeth, is the triangle isosceles, which admitteth no inclination unto a demi-triangle, nor possibly can be concorporate or united to it.

Holland. Plutarch, fol. 1089.

Other, like beasts, yet had the feet of fowls,
That demi-urchins were, or demi-owls.

Drayton. The Moon Calf.

MAC. I, in the catalogue ye goe for men,
As hounds, and greyhounds, mungrels, spaniels, curres,
Showghes, water-rugs, and demy-wolues are clipt
All by the name of dogges.

Shakspeare. Macbeth, fol. 140.

There may be 50 or 60 iron guns from falcon to demy-culeurin, two or three whole culverin or demi-cannon, and some old iron mortars lying on logs.

Dampier. Voyage, Anno 1688.

For he was of that noble trade,
That demi-gods and heroes made,
Slaughter, and knocking on the head,
The trade to which they all were bred.

Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 2.

These great ladies following, (their horses being trapped in black cloth,) every of their footmen in demi-gowns, bare-headed.

Strype. Memorials. Edward VI. Anno 1557.

A patent of license granted to Sir John Cheke, Knt. one of the gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, to license at all times one of his household servants, to shoot in the cross-bow, hand gun, hack but, or demy-hake, at certain fowls or deer, expressed in his patent. Strype. Memorials. Edward VI. Anno 1552.

The argument their drama is founded on is too low, being usually the story of a demi-hero personated by a demi-man.
Tatler, No. 283.

On their steel'd heads their demi-lances wore
Small pennons, which their ladies' colours bore.
Dryden. The Conquest of Grenada, part i.

It appears that the maletot of 40*s.* upon a sack was again demanded by E. I. and was therefore now abrogated, saving to the king and his heirs the demi-mark upon a sack of wool granted by the commonalty.
Parl. History, vol. iv. p. 489. Charles II. Anno 1671.

An eagle with two heads displayed sable, having on its breast a demi-rose and a demi-sun conjoyned into one, counterchanged of the field. Wood. Athenæ Oxonienses, part i. fol. 675.

The English were terribly exposed to the shot of the counter-guard and demi-bastion of St. Roch.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. i. vol. i.

He had that very campaign brought no less than eight new battering cannons besides three demi-culverings, to the field.
Id. Ib. ch. xix.

Thus by degrees self-cheated of their sound
And sober judgment, that he is but man,
They demi-deify and fume him so,
That in due season he forgets it too.
Cowper. Task, book v.

Those of the human race, whose unhappy lot it is to be domestic or menial servants to persons of either sex, who swell with the selfish pride of aristocracy, are kept in a state of abject servility, compelled to watch the looks and motions of demi-god or demi-goddess, and spoken to with a severity of language seldom used to the horses in the stable, or the dogs in the kennel.
Knox. Works, vol. v. 291. The Spirit of Despotism, sec. 24.

E'en for a demi-groat, this open'd soul,
This boon companion, this elastic breast
Revibrates quick.
Shenstone. Moral Pieces. Economy.

Venus, of laughter queen and love,
The greatest demirep above
Who scorn'd restriction, hated custom,
Knew her own sex too well to trust 'em.
Lloyd. A Tale.

Having a soft hand and great tenderness of temper, we employ her in picking out the spots from prudes, demireps, and ladies of fashion who have lived in a continual round of genteel diversions doing neither good nor harm.
Search. Light of Nature, vol. iv. ch. xxiii. The Vision.

It is this that has represented the unknown causes of the ordinary as well as extraordinary, of the beneficial as well as hurtful phænomena of nature in the minds of such savages and demi-savages as we describe under the images of animal beings, a little different from man, but analogous to him, and endued only with greater power and greater intelligence.
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. v. p. 404. Essay the Second.

Entire Vills, Sir Henry Spelman conjectures to have consisted of ten freemen or frank-pledges, demi-vills of five, and hamlets of less than five.
Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. i. p. 115. Introduction, sec. 4.

DEMI'SE, v. } Lat. demittere vel dimittere; dimit-
DEMI'SE, n. } tere autem pro relinquere vel donare testamento occurit apud Ælium Lamprid: Skinner, to leave, give or bequeath by will or testament. It is also applied to

The decease or departure. And see the Examples from Blackstone.

The Stoick calls it ἀναγγελίαν ἀνθρώπου, the promise that every man makes, the obligation that he is bound in to nature at his shaping in the womb, and upon which condition his reasonable soul is at his own conception demised to him.
Hammond. Works. Sermon 14. vol. iv.

Flatter my sorrow with report of it:
Tell me, what state, what dignity, what honor,
Canst thou demise to any childe of mine.
Shakspeare. Richard III. fol. 197.

I conceive it ridiculous to make the condition of an indenture something that is necessarily annext to the possession of the demise.
Hammond. Works. Accordance of St. Paul and St. James, vol. i. fol. 725.

Two days after she went to the parliament, which, to the great happiness of the nation, and to the advantage of her government, was now continued to sit, notwithstanding the king's demise, by the act that was made five years before, upon the discovery of the assassination plot.
Burnet. Own Times. Queen Anne, Anno 1702.

So tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of his death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his [king's] demise; demissio regis, vel coronæ: an expression which signifies merely a transfer of property; for, as is observed in Plowden, when we say the demise of the crown, we mean only that, in consequence of the disunion of the king's natural from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor; and so the royal dignity remains perpetual.
Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. i. p. 249. book i. ch. vii.

And I come now to recommend this interesting object to the consideration of Parliament, in order that such further provision, as shall be most expedient, may be made, for securing the judges in the enjoyment of their offices, during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any such demise.
His Majesty's Speech, March 3, 1761.

DEMI'T, DEMI'SS, DEMI'SSION. } Lat. demittere, demissum, to send, throw or cast down; (de, and mittere, to send.)
To drop or sink down; to submit, depress.

The occasion of this conceit, might first arise from a common observation, that when they [peacocks] are in their pride, that is, advance their train, if they decline their neck to the ground, they presently demit and let fall the same.
Sir Thomas Brown. Vulgar Errours, book iii. ch. xxvii.

This said he, and soone after when he had put upon Julian his grandfather's purple, and declared him Cæsar with the joy of the armie: he speaketh unto him somewhat sad, and carrying a demisse and lowly looke.
Holland. Ammianus, fol. 44. Constantius.

And I sweare vpon the holie euangelists here presentlie with my hands touched, that I shall neuer repugne to this resignation, demission or yielding vp, nor neuer impugne them in anie maner by word or deed, by myselfe nor none other.
Holinshed. Richard II. Anno 1399.

I shall instance in prostration as a lowlier and humbler act of bodily worship than kneeling is, and this is not affirmed to be particularly commanded, and so voluntary, yet sure acceptable to God if it flow from that vehement zeal of spirit and dimission of mind, in confession and sense of sin, that I shall hope it doth.
Hammond. Works. Of Will Worship, vol. i. fol. 238.

DEMO'CRACY, DEMO'CRAT, DEMOCRA'TICK, DEMOCRA'TICAL, DEMOCRA'TIST. } It. democrazia; Sp. democracia; "Fr. democratie; a democratie; popular government, rule or authority." Cotgrave. See the Examples from Blackstone

I think it good, and my desire is, that the speeches and discourses of this good company, may not be dealt among the rich and noble persons only who are here in place, but parted equally and indifferently among them all, and go round like a cup of wine, as the manner is in democracy or state of a city, governed by the people. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 275.

DEMOCRACY. — DEMOLISH.

He that had seen Pericles lead the Athenians which way he listed, haply would have said he had been their prince; and yet he was but a powerful and eloquent man in a democracy, and had no more at any time than a temporary and elective sway, which was in the will of the people when to abrogate.

Milton. Of Prelatical Episcopacy.

A magistrate that justly wore his gown
While England had a king, or king a crown;
But stoutly flung it off, when once he saw
Might knock down right, and lust did justle law.
His soul scorn'd a democracy, and would
No longer stay, than while the kingdom stood.

Brome. The Memory of Sir J. Cordel, Knt.

For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merits in that service, that they not only thought it fit for themselves to become the commanders over many towns and islands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls they would admit none other form of government than merely democratical.

Ralegh. History of the World, book iii. ch. vii. sec. 4.

Aristocratic gouernment,
Nor democratick pleasde
But where to one man's emperie
Is monarchia seasde.

Warner. Albion's England, book x. ch. lvii.

The thing which those democraticals chiefly then aimed at, was to force the king to call a parliament, which he had not done for ten years before, as having no help, but hindrance to his designs in the parliaments he had formerly called.

Hobbes. Behemoth, part i. fol. 501.

It [government] was now shred into a democracy; and the stream of government being cut into many channels, run thin and shallow. whereupon the subject having many masters, every servant had so many distinct servitudes.

South. Sermons, vol. v. p. 85.

As though he would have all episcopacy abolished, and bring back into the church a democratical ataxy; yea, an ochlocracy, (i. e.) the government of the multitude; and would obtrude the Geneva discipline upon all churches.

Strype. Life of Whitgift, Anno 1593.

He limiteth no magistrates; he altereth no poliey; he meddleth neither with democraties, aristocraties, nor monarchies, nor prescribeth whether old or young, rich or poor, learned or unlearned, men or women, should reign.

Id. Life of Aylmer, ch. xiii.

The political writers of antiquity will not allow more than three regular forms of government; the first, when the sovereign power is lodged in an aggregate assembly, consisting of all the free members of a community, which is called a democracy.

Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. i. p. 47. Introduction, sec. 2.

He [the emperour] endeavours to crush the aristocratick party, and to nourish one in avowed connexion with the most furious democratists in France. Burke. Thoughts on French Affairs.

Under the arbitrary governments, besides the general turn of softness and effeminacy, which such governments may be justly supposed to give to the spirit of a nation, the art of speaking cannot be such an instrument of ambition, business, and power, as it is in democratical states.

Blair. Lecture 25. vol. ii.

The frame of our commonwealth did not admit of such an actual election; but it provided as well, (and while the spirit of the constitution is preserved,) better for all the effects of it than by the method of suffrage in any democratick state whatever.

Burke. Thoughts on the present Discontents.

DEMO'LISH, DEMO'LISHER, DEMO'LISHING, n. DEMO'LISHMENT, DEMOLI'TION.

Fr. demolir; Lat. demoliri, molem dejicere; to cast down any mass, any pile or structure. And, generally,

To destroy, to ruin, to dash or break to pieces.

After this he surprised all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great sacrifice to their God, by which means he drew them together into one temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impiety.

Ralegh. History of the World, book ii. ch. xx. sec. 2.

The demolishers of them can give the clearest account, how the plucking down of churches conduceth to the setting up of religion.

Fuller. Worthies. Exeter.

By the passing of this bill, so many persons in both houses would be fully satisfied, that they would join in no further alteration; but, on the other hand, if they were crossed in this, they would violently endeavour an extirpation of bishops, and a demolishing of the whole fabrick of the church.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part ii. p. 427.

You have found me merciful in arguing with you,
Swords, hangmen, fires, destructions of all natures,
Demolishments of kingdoms, and whole ruines
Are wont to be my orators.

Beaumont and Fletcher. The False One, act ii. sc. 1.

And so in the end, the glory of this temple, set up after Antichrist's demolishment, will yet be rendered more glorious (as that of Zerubbabel's also was) by Christ's coming into it.

Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part i. fol. 143.

This man defies 'em still, threatens destruction
And demolition of their arms and worship,
Spits at their powers.

Beaumont and Fletcher. The Island Princess, act v. sc. 1.

His death also was enigmatically described by the destruction, or demolishment of his bodily temple, answerable to those circumlocutions concerning our ordinary death.

Barrow. Sermon 27. vol. ii.

So Theodoret tells us, that in demolishing the temples at Alexandria, the Christians found hollow statues fixed to the walls, into which the priests used to enter, and thence deliver oracles.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 255.

Lys. Whatever merit this writer may have as a demolisher, I always thought he had very little as a builder.

Berkeley. The Minute Philosopher, dial. 5.

On their coming into administration, they found the demolition of Dunkirk entirely at a stand: instead of demolition, they found construction; for the French were then at work on the repairs of the jettees.

Burke. Observations on a late State of the Nation.

DEMONA, VAL DI, a Province of Sicily occupying the north-east part of the country, and extending from the Straits of Messina to Catania. It has the valley of Mazzara on the west, and that of Noto on the south; and is about 112 miles long, and between 60 and 70 broad, in its widest part. The population has lately been stated at 521,000; and to this part of the country the Lipari Islands are also considered as belonging. Much of this Province is mountainous and woody, and the only fertile parts are those near the banks of the rivers and smaller streams, many of which, however, are either wholly or partially dried up during a considerable part of summer. The atmosphere of this Province, however, is cooler and more humid than in the eastern and southern parts of the Island. Silk is one of its chief productions; besides which it yields hemp, flax, olives, lemons, oranges, figs, currants, and pistachio nuts. Sulphur is also found in considerable quantities towards Mount Ætna. Messina, the Capital of the Island, is situated in this Province; and the other principal Towns on the coast, are Melazzo, Cefalu, and Taormina. The first will be more fully described in another place. Melazzo, (the ancient Mylæ,) stands on the north, twenty miles west of Messina; partly covering a promontory of the same name, and partly situated at the bottom of the bay which forms a good harbour, capable of containing a considerable fleet.

DEMONA, VAL DI. — DEMONSTRATE.

The upper town is strongly fortified, but neither this nor the lower have any buildings of much interest. The trade chiefly consists in the export of wine, olives, and oil, and is principally carried on with Marseilles, Leghorn, and Genoa. The tunney fishery likewise occupies a number of people belonging to this port. The plain of Melazzo, which is covered with villages and groves of orange, lemon, and olive trees, and bounded by lofty mountains, presents the traveller with a scene of great picturesque beauty. The population of Melazzo is nearly 6000. Cefalu is also situated on the north coast, and is the See of a Bishop, but is not so populous as Melazzo. It has a small trade, and a productive fishery; but the harbour is not capable of containing more than thirty or forty vessels at a time. It stands about seventy-five miles west of Messina, in latitude 38° north. Taormina, Tauromenium, built by Andromachus, out of the ruins of Naxos, on the promontory Taurus, is a small but interesting Town, covering part of a craggy mountain on the eastern coast, and containing about 4000 inhabitants. The splendour of the old city is still evinced by the remains which are to be seen in the neighbourhood; the theatre, the cisterns, and the aqueducts being all magnificent objects. Taormina is remarkable for the number of its churches and convents, some of which are profusely ornamented with marble. It also forms one of the strong military positions of the Island, and prior to the Xth century belonged to the Greeks, from whom, at that period, it was taken by the Saracens, who called it Al-Moezzia, a name which it retained for a considerable time afterwards. In 1690 it suffered greatly from an earthquake. It has a harbour, and exports wine, hemp, and some other products of the adjacent country. In its vicinity the sea sometimes makes a dreadful roaring among the rocks, which has given rise to an idle conjecture, that the water absorbed by Charybdis is here returned to the ocean.

Cefalu.

Taormina.

DEMO'NSTRATE, DEMONSTRA'TION, DEMONSTRA'TING, DEMO'NSTRATIVE, DEMO'NSTRATIVELY, DEMO'NSTRATIVENESS, DEMONSTRA'TOR, DEMO'NSTRABLE, DEMO'NSTRABLENESS, DEMO'NSTRANCE. Fr. démonstrer; Sp. demonstrar; It. dimostrare. From moneo, is monestrum, and by a syncope of one letter, monstrum, whence monstro. Vossius. Monere, to call to mind, to call the attention to. And thus, monstrare or demonstrate, To show, to exhibit, to present to the senses, to the mind, the understanding; to make manifest, clear, plain; to prove.

I would (said Reason) thee lere
Sith thou to learne hast soch desire
And shew thee withouten fable
A thing that is not demonstrable.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 138.

Thou thy selfe art he, to whom it hath been shewed, and preued by ful many demonstrations, as I wotte well, that the soules of men, ne mowen not dien in no wise.
Id. The second Booke of Boecius, fol. 218.

And ye shull seen, up peril of my lif,
By veray preef that is demonstratif.
Id. The Sompnoures Tale, v. 7854.

He maketh his calculacions,
He maketh his demonstrations.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 135.

Now come we to yᵗ special point wherin Tindall gyueth vs a glorius demonstration of hys excellent highe witte and learning, farre surmounting the capacitie of poore popishe men to perceiue, howe it might be possible that any mā sinneth not, and yet for all that sinneth alwaye styll.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 538. The second Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

DEMONSTRATE.

The oration demonstratiue standeth either in praise or dispraise of some one man, or some one thing, or some one deed doen.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 11.

In other things we have been willing so far to descend to the desires of our good subjects, as might fully satisfy all moderate minds, and free from all just fears and jealousies which those messages, which we have hitherto sent unto the commons house, will well demonstrate unto the world.
State Trials. Proceedings in Parliament relating to the Liberty of the Subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An Act of Reason taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practice reason: they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, (as that good is to be followed, and evil to be eschewed;) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more universal propositions.
Ralegh. History of the World, book ii. ch. iv. sec. 6.

As the proving of these two things will overthrow all atheism, so it will likewise lay a clear foundation, for the demonstrating of a Deity distinct from the corporeal world.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 145.

I answer, that seducement is to be hinder'd by fit and proper means ordain'd in church discipline, by instant and powerful demonstration to the contrary; by opposing truth to error, no unequal match; truth the strong, to error the weak, though sly and shifting.
Milton. Of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes.

My reason hereof is convincing and demonstrative; because nothing is necessary to be believed, but what is plainly revealed.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. Ch. part i. ch. ii.

You commend humility, as the great and sovereign antidote against pride, the common disturber of mankind; and certainly what you say, is demonstratively true, if all the world could be persuaded to it; but this never was nor can be expected.
Hall. Cont. vol. i. p. 271. Of Humility.

And to this, I that did not really adhere to that, will not be so far concerned in it, as to make any reply, or at all to endeavour to defend it, or to add of it farther than this, that the bare possibility that it might so signifie supersedes all demonstrativeness of proof from this text for the criminousness of will-worship.
Hammond. Works. Defence of Treatises, vol. ii. part iv. fol. 178.

Here sure 'tis evident, that the truth of the minor is taken as confess'd, and then I am not to have so mean an opinion of the demonstratour's skill, that he will impertinently attempt to prove, what he takes for confess'd.
Id. Of Tradition, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 246.

Not that I covet any of your dross,
But that the power of this art may be
More demonstrably evident, leave in
My hands all but some smaller sum, to set
Something to stake at first.
Cartwright. The Ordinary, act ii. sc. 3.

He is to beseech them, yea, and to persuade with them particularly one by another, by good reasons and demonstrances of how many calamities peevish obstinacy is the cause.
Holland. Plutarch, fol. 303.

Whether therefore the being and attributes of God can be demonstrated, or not; it must at least be confess'd by all rational and wise men, to be a thing very desirable, and which they would heartily wish to be true, that there was a God, an intelligent and wise, a just and good being to govern the world.
Clarke. On the Attributes, p. 5.

Those intervening ideas which serve to shew the agreement of any two others, are call'd proofs; and where the agreement or disagreement is by this means plainly and clearly perceiv'd, it is call'd demonstration, it being shewn to the understanding, and the mind made to see that it is so.
Locke. Of Human Understanding, vol. i. book iv. ch. ii. sec. 3.

Eloquent men do never more exceed in their indulgence to fancy, than in the demonstrative kind, in panegyricks, in their commendations of persons.
Barrow. On the Pope's Supremacy, vol. i. part ii. fol. 72.

DEMONSTRATE. — DEMULCE.

Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle in some measure, had a knowledge of these principles; but I pretend to have established them demonstratively in my Theodicæa, though I have done it in a popular manner.
Clarke and Leibnitz. Leibnitz's Second Paper, p. 21.

The being of a God is not mathematically demonstrable, nor can it be expected it should, because only mathematical matters admit of this kind of evidence. Tillotson. Sermon 1.

For these reasons (I say) 'tis very fit, that notwithstanding the natural demonstrableness both of the obligations and motives of morality, yet considering the manifest corruptness of the present estate which humane nature is in, the generality of men should not be left wholly to the workings of their own minds, to the use of their natural faculties, and to the bare convictions of their own reason. Clarke. On the Evidences, p. 282.

And now, consequently, he must of necessity affirm all the conclusions, which I have before shown to follow demonstrably from that opinion. Id. On the Attributes, p. 29.

May no storm ever come, which will put the firmness of their attachment to the proof; and which in the midst of confusions, and terrours, and sufferings, may demonstrate the eternal difference between a true and severe friend to the monarchy, and a slippery sycophant of the court.
Burke. Thoughts on the Cause of the present Discontents.

His miracles were either such and so great, as manifestly to prove in their nature, that they were divine ones; or they were such, as being wrought in opposition to sorceries and enchantments, and having plainly the superiority over them, were a demonstration of the superior power, by which he acted.
Pearce. Sermon 10. vol. iii.

But nothing can be more demonstrative evidence of their ingenuity than the construction and make of their canoes, which, in point of neatness and workmanship, exceed every thing of this kind we saw in this sea.
Cook. Voyage, vol. iii. book ii. ch. iii.

Virtue, according to Plato, might be considered as a species of science, and no man, he thought, could see clearly and demonstratively, what was right and what was wrong, and not act accordingly. Smith. Moral Sentiments, part vii. sec. 2.

The demonstrator confounds in it two contrary propositions; and sliding, insensibly to many readers, from that which no reasonable man can admit into that which every reasonable man must admit, he means nothing by a pomp of words, or he means to make the proofs of the latter pass for proofs of the former.
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. vii. p. 331. Fragments or Minutes of Essays.

Qu. 43. Whether an algebraist, fluxionist, geometrician, or demonstrator of any kind can expect indulgence for obscure principles or incorrect reasonings?
Berkeley. Works, vol. iv. p. 88. The Analyst.

It is to be attributed to the early intellectual habits of some among the students in theology who receive holy orders, without having had time to attend closely to any thing but mathematics, that they are willing to assent to nothing but what is nearly demonstrable, and explain away every thing mysterious or irreconcilable to their preconceived notions of truth and rectitude.
Knox. Considerations on the Lord's Supper, vol. vi. p. 444. sec. 20.

Which demonstrably proved that he and his religion had a divine original, and that therefore the sufferings they underwent for his sake in the present life would be amply repaid by the glorious rewards reserved for them hereafter.
Paley. Lecture 5. vol. i.

DEMU'LCE, DEMU'LSATION, DEMU'LSION. Demulcere; (de, and mulc-ere, to soften;) A. S. milesc-ian, to soften, to soothe.

Jupyter was cõueyed into Phrigia, where Saturne also pursuyng hym, Rhea semblably taught the people there, called Coribantes, to dãce in another fourme: where with Saturne was eftsones demulced and appaised. Sir Thomas Elyot, book i. ch. xx.

And this grave incomparable Solomon, though he could precept the erring world against all the seducing crafts of women, yet we see he could not save himself from being entangled by their demulceations. Feltham. On Saint Luke, 14. 20.

It is to be considered, from whence it comes to pass, that wise men, and mostly such, should chuse goodness and virtue with affliction, and the burthens of unpleasing accidents; rather than vice garlanded with all the soft demulsions of a present contentment. Feltham. Resolves 57.

DEMU'R, v. DEMU'R, n. DEMU'RRER, DEMU'RRAGE, DEMO'RANCE. Also written Demour. Fr. demeurer, demourer; It. dimorare; Lat. demorari; de, and morari, from mora, delay; and this from μείρ-ειν, dividere quia morantes tempus intervallis trahunt ac dividunt. Vossius.

To abide, remain, tarry, stay, linger, stand long on; to dwell upon, to pause, to hesitate.

And in this question, if the parties demurred in our iudgemẽt we might ask aduyse further of learned mẽ & iudges.
Sir Thomas More. Works, fol. 215. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

The man is a very foole to make his demorrence vpon such an olde wife. Skelton. The Boke of Three Fooles.

And the sayde Peloponesyans demoured in the land.
Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 72.

And hauyng made one assaulte vpon the campe of the Athenyans, though they had not had the worst, yet durst they not demoure nor abyde vpon the campe. Id. Ib. fol. 73.

And therefore as soone as the storm began to asswage of its fury (which was a long half hour) willing to give his men no longer leasure to demurre of those doubts, nor yet allow the enemy farther respite to gather themselves together, he stept forward.
Sir Francis Drake Revived, fol. 15.

PLOT. Sister, 'tis so projected, therefore make
No more demurs; the life of both our fortunes
Lies in your carriage of things well.
Mayne. The City Match, act iv. sc. 2.

Most Serene King,
Whereas there is a considerable sum of money owing from certain Portugal merchants of the Brazil company to several English merchants, upon the account of freightage and demorage, in the yeers 1649 and 1650.
Milton. Prose Works. Letters of State, fol. 196.

Notwithstanding he hoped that matters would have been long since brought to an issue, the fair one still demurrs. I am so well pleased with this gentleman's phrase, that I shall distinguish this sect of women by the title of demurrers. Spectator, No. 89.

[A demurrer] denies that by the law arising upon these facts, any injury is done to the plaintiff, or that the defendant has made out a legitimate excuse; according to the party which first demurs, demoratur, rests or abides upon the point in question.
Blackstone. Commentaries, book iii. ch. xxxi. vol. iii. p. 314.

The ship was delayed, at a demurrage of an hundred dollars a day, for upwards of three months, waiting in vain for a better market. Burke. Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings.

DEMURRER, in Law, a pause or stop put to the proceeding of any Action, upon some point which must be determined by the Court before any further proceedings can be taken. In every Action the controversy is either as to the fact or as to the law; the first must be decided by the Jury, the second by the Court. A Demurrer, therefore, is an issue upon a matter of law: it confesses the facts to be true, as stated by the opposite party, but denies (as stated in the Extract from Blackstone, given above) that by the law arising upon those facts any injury is done to the plaintiff; or that the defendant has made out a lawful excuse. If the matter of the Plaintiff's declaration is supposed to be insufficient in law, then the Defendant Demurs to it; if, on the other hand, the Defendant's plea is considered invalid, then the Plaintiff Demurs to it. Sometimes Demurrers are for want of sufficient form in the Writ or Pleadings.

DEMU'RE, adj. DEMU'RELY, DEMU'RENESS. De bon mœurs; one of good manners. Minshew. This, Junius thinks, is trifling; and prefers Casaubon's derivation from Gr. θέμερος, grave, honest.

MURE. DEN.

Skinner thinks from des mœures, as we now say, over mannerly, molestè, superstitiosè modestus; but, by our old writers, it is used without any subaudition of such excess.

Attentive to, observant or regardful of, manners or morals; now frequently with a sub. of—affectation.

Thus the verb in Shakspeare: To regard or look upon with affected modesty.

When this lady had heard al this lāguage
She gaue answere, ful softe and demurely
Without chaunging of colour or courage.
Chaucer. La belle Dame sans Mercie, fol. 252.

In this apparell she goynge betwene the Erle of Ouersteyne & the Graunde Master Hostoden, which had the conduyte & ordre of the performaunce of maryage, with most demure countynaunce & sad behaviour, passed through the king's chaumbre.
Hall. Henry VIII. The thirty-first Yere.

And it is a world to see how demurely & sadly some sit, beholding them that dance, and with what gesture, pase, and mouing of the body, & with what sober footynge some of them dance. Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, K 7.

After that Gabriel had al thys sayed, the maiden made answer in fewe wordes, but wordes of suche sorte, as might be a witnesse of exceeding great demurenesse in hir, coupled with passing great affiaunce and zele towardes God. Udall. Luke, ch. i.

——— I am safe;
Your wife, Octauia, with her modest eyes,
And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour
Demuring upon me.
Shakspeare. Antony and Cleopatra, fol. 363.

Lo two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinked arme in arme in louely wise,
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbred euen steps, and equall pase.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 10.

——— Give me
My gallant prentice! he parts with his money
So civilly, and demurely, keeps no account
Of his expenses, and comes ever furnish'd.
Massinger. The City Madam, act iii. sc. 1.

And though the maids did shew themselves thus naked openly, yet was there no dishonesty seen or offered, but all this sport was full of plays and toys without any youthful part or wontonness; and rather carried a shew of demurenesse and a desire to have their best-made bodies seen and spy'd.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 40. Lycurgus.

So cat transform'd sat gravely and demure,
Till mouse appear'd, and thought himself secure,
But soon the lady had him in her eye,
And from her friend did just as oddly fly.
Dryden. An Essay upon Satire.

'Tis true, they proclaim'd themselves poets by sound of trumpet, and poets they were upon pain of death to any man who durst call them otherwise. The audience had a fine time on't, you may imagine; they sate in a bodily fear, and look'd as demurely as they could: For 'twas a hanging matter to laugh unseasonably.
Id. Plays, vol. ii. fol. 58. Preface to All for Love.

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dy'd,
The azure flowers that blow;
Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclin'd,
Gaz'd on the lake below.
Gray. On the Death of a favourite Cat.

Under a serious deportment, and the demureness of religion, still we see such a constant attention to worldly happiness—so much anxiety about worldly good—so much fear and distress about worldly evil, that it is beyond the power of charity to suppose this heavenly secret is perfectly discovered even here.
Gilpin. Sermon 36. vol. ii.

DEN, A. S. den, vallis, a valley, a vale, a dale; it. cubile, a couch, a den. Somner; who adds, Also a pathless place, woody, rugged, and uncultivated, suited for feeding swine and cattle.—The word may probably be akin to Down, q. v.

Den is a frequent termination in English names of places, and always implies a situation in a valley. Good den is a corruption of Good even, or evening. DEN. DENAY

She dorst the wilde beastes dennes seke,
And rennen in the mountaignes all the night,
And slepe under the bush.
Chaucer. The Monkes Tale, v. 14269.

And when the hande of the Medianites was sore vpon Israel, the childrē of Israel made them dennes in the mountaynes and caues and stronge holdes. Bible, Anno 1551. Judges, ch. vi.

——— This cave fashion'd
By provident nature, in this solid rock
To be a den for beasts, alone, receives me,
And having prov'd an enemy to mankind,
All humane helps forsake me.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Knight of Malta, act iv. sc. 1.

See, from afar, yon rock that meets the sky;
About whose feet such heaps of rubbish lye:
Such indigested ruin; bleak and bare,
How desert now it stands, expos'd in air!
'Twas once a robber's den; inclos'd around
With living stone, and deep beneath the ground.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book viii.

The most usual method of taking this animal is while a cub, and incapable of resistance. The place near the den of the lioness is generally well known by the greatness of her depredations on that occasion; the natives, therefore, watch the time of her absence, and, aided by a swift horse, carry off the cubs.
Goldsmith. Animated Nature. The Lion.

DENARY, Fr. denaire; Lat. denarius, ten. Decem, decenus, denus, denarius. A denarius, a Roman silver coin marked with the letter X, valued at ten asses or ten pounds of brass, 7¾*d.* English.

But that seruaunte beeyng nowe free and at libertie as soone as he was gone out of his maister's sight, met by chaunce with one of his felowe seruauntes which aught hym a lytle money: that is, an hundreth denaries, or pieces of syluer coyne.
Udall. Matthew, ch. xix.

This prince therefore hauing made the generall partition of his kingdome into shires, or shares, he divided againe the same into lathes, as lathes into hundreds, and hundreds into tithings, or denaries, as diuers haue written.
Holinshed. Description of England, ch. iv.

In the early times of Rome, the price of a sheep was a denarius, or eight pence, and the price of an ox, ten times as much.
Priestley. Lectures on History, vol. ii. part iii. lec. 15.

It was but yesterday, two of my domestic officers, mere striplings were hired for this goodly purpose at the price of three denarii: such is the easy purchase of eloquence.
Melmoth. Pliny, to Maximus.

DE'NAY, v. } Deny, anciently so written. Fr.
DE'NAY, n. } denier; Sp. denegar; Lat. denegare; de, ne, and agere, q. d. Be it not. Let it not be done. To refuse.

The Grecian king had not
The powre for to denay,
His own deare childe, and sonne in lawe
The thing that both did pray.
Gascoigne. The Complaint of Phylomene.

Amonges other of his tyranyes, he asked a great sūme of money of Seynt Edmundes landes, whiche the rulers denayed; for so moche as they claymed to be free of all kynges trybute.
Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 209.

Thus was the noble heart long time betwixt
Feare and remorse, not granting nor denaying;
Vpon his eyes the dame her lookings fixt,
As if her life and death lay on his saying.
Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book iv. st. 67.

——— Nor
Was libertie denayde
Of hawking, hunting, and disports:
That, had she been content,
Her merriest and securest daies,
A prisoner she spent.
Warner. Albion's England, book ix. ch. lv.

DENAY. — DEN-BIGH-SHIRE.

Of mild denaies, of tender scornes, of sweet
Repulses, war, peace, hope, despaire, ioy, feare
Of smiles, iests, mirth, woe, griefe, and sad regreet.
Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book xvi. st. 25.

Situation and boundaries.

DENBIGHSHIRE, a County of North Wales, joining Cheshire and Shropshire on the east, Montgomeryshire and Merionethshire on the south, Caernarvonshire on the west, and Flintshire and the Irish Sea on the north. The Welsh call it Sir Dinbech; and in the time of the Romans it was included in the part of Cambria occupied by the Ordovices, forming a portion of Venedotia, one of the minor divisions of Britannia Secunda. The greatest extent of this County is from north-west to south-east, about forty-eight miles, while its breadth varies from about ten to more than twenty miles. The area, as given in the Population Returns, is 633 square miles, and the resident number of inhabitants 76,511, which is nearly 120 persons to each square mile. The population of this County appears to have increased in the following proportion, since we have any authentic records:

Extent and population.

Increase of inhabitants

	Inhabitants.	Increase.
In 1700	39,700	18 per cent.
1750	46,900	33 per cent.
1801	62,400	6 per cent.
1811	66,400	18 per cent.
1821	78,000

Proportional employments.

Families chiefly in Ariculture	8,625
Families chiefly in Trade and Commerce	4,399
All other Families	2,653
Total	15,677

Surface.

A considerable portion of Denbighshire is covered with rugged hills and mountains, contributing but little towards human sustenance; other parts are fertile and pleasant. The western parts, which border on Caernarvonshire, are chiefly of a precipitous character, and the same description also applies to the north, with the exception of a tract along the sea coast, which gradually slopes into a plain. The celebrated Vale of Clwyd towards the north-west of this County, presents a scene peculiarly interesting. The land spreads on each side of the river of that name from its source to the sea, and sometimes to the breadth of seven or eight miles. Each side of this vale is bounded by steep, brown, and barren mountains, which afford a strong contrast to the verdant meadows and luxuriant fields below. These are also richly studded with towns, villages, and gentlemen's seats. Towards the Dee the land is in many parts fertile, while the upland tracts are often covered with peat, and afford only cover for the grouse, or fuel for the inhabitants of the lower districts. The lower hills also yield pasture for a few black cattle or mountain sheep. The following are the heights of some of the mountains of Denbighshire, as described by the Trigonometrical Survey of England and Wales:

Vale of Clwyd.

Heights of mountains.

	Feet.
Cyrn y Brain Mountain	1857
Moel Famman	1845
Moel Morweth	1767
Llandinam	1110
Moelfre Issa	1037
Gwannysgaer Down	732

The irregularities in the surface of this County give rise to a considerable diversity of climate. In the higher parts the air is keen and piercing; for, as the wind blows chiefly from the west and south-west it is deprived of its softness by passing over the elevated ridge of Snowdon before it reaches Denbighshire. It is, however, reckoned very salubrious. In the vallies it is much milder. That of Clwyd being open to the breezes from the sea, and defended on the sides by barriers of mountains, is considered as particularly healthy and pleasant.

The principal rivers of Denbighshire are the Clwyd, the Conway, and the Dee. None of these rivers are navigable within the confines of this County. The Clwyd flows from the southern part of the County, and enters the sea a few miles below St. Asaph. The Conway has already been described, and the Dee passes through a part of this County into Cheshire. Besides these the little Ceriog rises on the western side, and joins the Dee at a short distance from Chirk Castle. The Alun commences its course near Llandegla, and falls into the Dee below the town of Holt. The Ellesmere Canal likewise passes through the southern part of Denbighshire; but in summer it is often difficult to obtain a sufficient supply of water to render it navigable. Though only a small proportion of the surface of this County is capable of tillage, agriculture is here more advanced than in many other parts of the Principality, as it has been improved by the establishment of two societies; one in the Vale of Clwyd, and the other near Wrexham. The show of cattle and sheep, and the distribution of prizes by Sir Watkin Williams Wynne has also contributed to the same effect. The roads in this County have been much improved within a few years. The chief agricultural products are cattle, corn, and cheese. The cows are mostly of the black kind, and give excellent milk; and the cheese made in most parts of this County, is superior to that of almost any other part of Wales. The native horses are small but very hardy; and the sheep are of the horned mountain breed, yielding wool well adapted for manufacturing the flannels and coarse cloths which are made in the County. The goats are both larger and finer horned here than in most other countries of the same region, they are also kept in a domesticated state. Besides the articles made of the native wool, there are also some cotton twist and Angola stockings manufactured at Denbigh. There are also small manufactories of iron, and a few Welsh hoops are made at Llanrwst. Iron, lead, and coals are obtained in several parts of Denbighshire; slate of very good quality is worked in the southern parts; and limestone, with other kinds of stone common in most districts.

Denbighshire is divided into six Hundreds, viz. Bromfield, Chirk, Isaled, Isdulas, Ruthin, and Yale. It also contains one Borough, and six market Towns; these are Denbigh, Ruthin, Wrexham, Holt, Llangollen, and Llanrwst. It is included in the Chester circuit; and is partly in the Diocese of Bangor, and partly in that of St. Asaph. It sends two Members to Parliament; one for the County, and another for the Towns of Denbigh, Holt, and Ruthin.

Denbigh, the Capital of the County, is situated on a craggy hill in the Vale of Clwyd, and near a branch of the river of that name. This hill the ancient Britons called Cledfryn yn Rios, that is, the craggy hill of Rios. It is a small well-built town, and carries EN-GH-IRE. on a small trade with some manufactures of shoes, gloves, cotton, flannel, and a few other articles, chiefly designed for the consumption of itself and its vicinity. The population at the last enumeration was 3195, comprising 758 families, of whom 504 were returned as being employed in trade and manufactures. The Town was anciently surrounded by a strong wall, and defended by a castle, the chief part of which was built in the year 1280; in its structure two walls were first built several feet asunder, and the intervening space was filled up with mortar and rough stones, (a work called Grouting,) which ultimately became as solid as a rock. This castle was surrendered to the Parliamentary forces in 1646, having, during the preceding year, been occupied by Charles I. himself, after his retreat from Chester; a tower within it still retains the name of Siambr y brenhin, or the Royal Apartment. After the Restoration it was blown up, but the remains are still visible. Denbigh suffered greatly in the wars between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and after having been burned by the Earl of Pembroke in 1468, was then built in its present situation below the rock. The Church is a Rectory in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph.

in. Ruthin is one of the most considerable market Towns in this County, situated on a hill near the centre of the Vale of Clwyd, and supposed to have derived its name from a castle called Rhyddin, or the Red Fortress, from the colour of the stone with which it was built by Edward I. During the Great Rebellion, this was held by the Royalists till about the middle of April 1646, when it was compelled to surrender, and was afterwards demolished, so that only a few fragments now remain to attest its site and dimensions. Ruthin was formerly very populous, and is still a flourishing place. It is about a mile in length, and consists principally of a single street. It contains the most noted free-school in the Principality, founded by Dr. Goodman, a native of Ruthin, and Dean of Westminster, in the reign of Elizabeth. The sessions are held at Ruthin instead of Denbigh, on account of its more central situation. At the last census the population of the parish was 1294, comprising 264 families, 132 of whom were returned as employed in trade and manufacture. Distant 15 miles south-west from Holywell, 210 north-west from London. The Church, which formerly was Conventual, is a Curacy in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

tham Wrexham is a handsome Town, and has been called the Metropolis of North Wales. The Church is among the seven wonders of the Principality, the other six being Snowdon, St. Winifred's Well, Overton Churchyard, Gresford Bells, Llangollen Bridge, and Pystyl Rhaiadr. Wrexham Church was built at the latter part of the XVth century; it is of the rich florid Gothic style, and though it suffered materially from the Parliamentary forces, thirty images of Saints still remain in niches in the buttresses of the tower, which is 135 feet in height. In the chancel is a fine monument to Mrs. Mary Middleton, by Roubiliac, representing her figure bursting from the tomb at the moment of resurrection. Population in 1821, 8429. The Church is a Vicarage in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph. Distant 10 miles south from Chester, 188 north-west from London. Acton, the birth-place of Judge Jefferies, is at a short distance from Wrexham.

gollen. Llangollen is a poor Town, remarkable only for its bridge, built early in the XIVth century on a foundation of rock. Population in 1821, of the entire parish, 3535. The Church is a Vicarage in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The Vale of Llangollen is eminently beautiful; one end of it opens into another secluded valley, in which stand the remains of Llan Egwest or de Valle Crucis Abbey. On a conical hill in the back ground is Castle Dinas Bran of unknown antiquity. At the other extremity of the valley beyond Chirk Castle the Ellesmere Canal is conveyed across the Dee on the nineteen arches of the Pont y Cyssyllte Aqueduct, each forty-five feet in span. The height of the piers, together with that of the trough which conveys the water, is 126 feet from the surface of the Dee. Distant seven miles south-west from Wrexham, 184 north-west from London.

DEN-BIGH-SHIRE. — DEN-DRELLA.

Holt. Holt is an inconsiderable Village with the scanty remains of a Castle, although in the time of Leland it possessed some consequence. He states (Itinerary, v. 32) that "The Holt is a praty riche Walsche Toun governed by a maire having ons a yere a fair, but surely no celebrate market. Yn it is a praty Church and a goodly Castel." It is a Borough, and returns one Member to Parliament jointly with Ruthin and Denbigh. Population in 1821, 1403. The Church is a Curacy in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. Distant five miles north-east from Wrexham, 183 from London.

Llanrwst. Llanrwst is a market Town in the western part of the County, on the eastern bank of the Conway, 12 miles south from Aberconway, and 218 north-east from London. Being the centre of all the business of the popular and beautiful vale in which it stands, and to which it gives its name, it is a place of consequence in its neighbourhood. Population in 1821, 7227. Church a Vicarage in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph.

Llwyd's Collection for Flint, Denbigh, &c. MS.; Pennant's Tour in Wales; Bingley's North Wales; Nordon's Perambulation and Survey of the Lordships of Bromfield and Yell. Harl. Coll.

DENDRELLA, in Zoology, a genus of Infusoria, belonging to the section Psychodiana, of the family Vorticellidæ, established by Adolphus Brongniart.

Generic character. Body conical, opening by a simple mouth in front, ending in a branched pedicel.

The individuals of the genus Dendrella principally differ from the genus Convallarina by their body not being bell-shaped, but gradually attenuated at the base so as to be conical, and by not being solitary. They form a very marked passage to the Sarcoid Polypiers. The absence of the beards round the mouth at once distinguishes them from the true Vorticellæ. Like the latter genus, at a certain time they detach some of the little lateral shrub-like animals which float about freely in the water. Each individual animal becomes a true living bud, which at length attaches itself to a proper place to propagate their species; they inhabit fresh water, and are parasitic on Conferva and other small aquatic plants.

Muller describes eight species of this genus, and Brongniart seven. The latter divides it into two sections according to the pedicel being not contractile or slightly so.

a Pedicel not contractile.

1. D. Lyngbi, Brongniart; Echinella Geminata, Lyngb. Tent. Alg. Dan. t. 10, f. d. The movement of this species is so obscure, that Lyngbie considered it a plant, and figured it as such in his beautiful work on the Algæ of Denmark, published by the King.

DENDRELLA. DENDROMETER.

2. D. Geminata, Brong.; Vorticella Pyraria, Muller, Infus. t. 4, f. 1.; Vorticelle Congugale, Lamarck, Anim. sans Vert. xi. 50; Ency. Méthod. t. 25, f. 1. Muller confounded this species with the following. Pallas describes the species as having two beards on each side of the mouth, but neither Muller nor Bronguiart could find them.

3. D. Bakeri, Brong.; Clustering Polypes, Baker, Empl. Micros. t. 12, f. 6, 7.

β Pedicels subcontractile.

4. D. Mulleri, Brong.; Vorticella Racemosa, Muller, Infus. t. 46, f. 10, 11. This elegant species may be seen by the naked eye. The pedicels are united into little groups, each individual contracts with great agility, but sometimes the whole group contracts simultaneously into a brownish globule. Muller observed that each urn would produce in a few hours a small shrub-like bundle, carrying three or four hundred small animated urns.

DENDROBIUM, in Botany, a genus of the class Gynandria, order Monandria, natural order Orchideæ. Generic character: calyx three-leaved, the two lowest leaves cohering, somewhat spur-shaped, lip without a spur; anther vertical, two or four-celled; masses of pollen two, or more, globose; flowers often reversed.

A genus allied to Epidendrum, containing more than thirty species, mostly natives of the West Indies; some species are parasitic.

DENDROIDES, in Zoology, a genus of Heteromerous Coleoptera, belonging to the family Pyrochroidæ.

Generic character. Antennæ branched, or the joints projecting on the side into a long filiform branch thorax long, narrow, depressed; legs long; claws of the tarsi simple.

The Dendroides are distinguished from the Apales by their branched antennæ and their simple tarsi; they agree in these characters with the genus Pyrochroa, but they differ in the form of their body and thorax. Fischer (in the Mém. de la Soc. Imp. des Natur. de Moscou.) has established this genus under the name of Pogonocerus, but the former name has the priority.

Two species of this genus have been described:

1. D. Cyanipennis, Latr. Found by Bosc in Canada. This is the type of the genus.

2. D. Thoracicus, Auderin, the Pogonocerus Thoracicus of Fischer, found in Southern Russia.

Roussel, in the Flora of Calvados, has proposed to establish a genus of Marine Algæ, under the above name, but the plants which he referred to it has been established into several other genera by succeeding authors.

This name has also been given by many Geologists to fossil Corals which branch like trees.

DENDROMETER, δένδρον, a tree, μέτρον, a measure; a Trigonometrical instrument by which the trunk, branches, and height of a tree may be measured from a distance. Various constructions of these instruments may be found in the following publications: Duncombe's (the Inventor) Treatise upon the Dendrometer, 1769; the same conjointly with Whittell, 1771; Repertory of Arts, ii. 238; Transactions of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. xxv.; Brewster's Treatise on New Philosophical Instruments.

DENEGATION, Lat. denegare, atum. See DENAY, above. A refusal, a denial. DEN

He speaketh another language to all the world in deeds, and thereby so toucheth vs in honour and denegation of iustice, as we be inforced and compelled to vse the sword, which God hath put in our hands as an extreme remedie, whereby to obtaine both quietaesse for our subiects, and also that is due to vs by right, pacts, and leagues.

Holinshed. Scotland, Anno 1542.

Sore did they assault me and craftily tempt me to their wicked wales, or at least to a denegation of my faith and true opinion, though it were but by colour and dissimulation.

Foxe. Martyrs, fol. 8677. Letter of T. Whittel to J. Caius.

DENEKIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Syngenesia, order Superflua, natural order Compositæ. Generic character: calyx imbricated; radial flowers of the corolla two-lipped; receptacle naked; down none.

One species, D. Capensis, native of the Cape of Good Hope. Persoon.

DENI'GRATE, DENI'GRATION, DENI'GRATOR. Denigrate, atum; Fr. denigrer, to blacken, to smear with black. Niger, from the Gr. νεκρὸς, nam mortui, atri. Vossius.

For first, if we derive the curse on Cham, or in general upon his posterity, we shall denigrate a greater part of the earth than was ever so conceived. Sir Thomas Brown, book vi. ch. xi.

We shall emperically and sensiblie discourse hereof; deducing the causes of blacknesse from such originals in nature, as we do generally observe things are denigrated by art.

Id. book vi. ch. xii.

These are the advenient and artificial wayes of denigration, answerably whereto may be the natural progress. Id. Ib.

However in this way of tincture, it seemeth plain, that iron and vitriol are the powerful denigrators. Id. Ib.

And I could not find, that though in retorts hartshorn and other white bodies will be denigrated by heat, yet camphire would not at all loose its whiteness, though I have purposely kept it in such a heat, as made it melt and boil.

Boyle. Experimental History of Colours, exp. 4. part ii.

To which I shall only add, that whereas in these several instances of denigration, the metals are worn off, or otherwise reduced into very minute parts, that circumstance may prove not unworthy your notice. Id. Ib. exp. 9. part ii.

DENI'ZE, DENI'ZEN, v. DENI'ZEN, n. DENI'ZATION. Variously written, Denizen, denize, denison. A denizen, says Blackstone, is an alien born, but who has obtained ex donatione regis letters patent to make him an English subject. And Minshew suggests, donatio, Fr. donaison, a gift or donation, sc. of liberty.

If this be death, our best part to untie
(By ruining the jail) from lust and wrath,
And every drowsy languor here beneath,
To be made denizd citizen of sky.

Drummond. Flowers of Sion.

But when their posteritie became not altogither so wearie in keeping, as their ancestors were valient in conquering, the Irish language was free denized in the English pale.

Holinshed. Description of Ireland, ch. i.

The world lamenteth and counteth them vnfortunate which be banished and dryuen out of theyr countrey: but Christ pronounceth them blessed, whiche be banished for the gospel sake; for they be made denizens in heauen.

Udall. Matthew, ch. v.

Lan-franc. It should rightly be Land-franc, and seemeth first to have bin a name of naturalizing or making the bearer thereof a free denizen, whereby hee became land-franc, to wit, free of the country.

Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, ch. viii.

IZE. — N- RK.

Therefore one of the 24 elders would have John especially to mark and observe, as a strange thing, beyond the expectation and imagination of men, that God should ever take those (so numerable a company) into so great a priviledg, as to be made denizens of the new Hierusalem, and have their names found there.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. part i. fol. 55.

The pear-main, which to France long ere to us was known,
Which careful fruitrers now have denizen'd our own.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 18.

Others there be of the same nature, that the king may exercise out of parliament, which right is grown unto him in them, more in those others by the use and practice of the common-wealth, as denization, coynage, making warre.
State Trials. Of the great Case of Impositions on an Information in the Exchequer.

There was a private act made, for denizing the children of Richard Hills, an eminent merchant abroad.
Strype. Memorials. Edward IV. Anno 1552.

Poor refugees at first, they purchase here,
And, soon as denizen'd, they domineer.
Grow to the great, a flatt'ring servile rout:
Work themselves inward, and their patrons out.
Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 3.

He had informed the diocesan of somebody there, that preached popish doctrines, I suppose, and had the king's licence; with whom nevertheless the people were grieved, and the rather because he was an outlandish man, however a denison.
Strype. Memorials. Henry VIII. Anno 1538.

It [denization] is basilicon doron, it is the bounty and kindness of the king to be born out of his dominions, to give him the capacity of a subject, to sue and be sued, and the like, which cannot be forfeited even for breach of conditions in the letters patents of denization.
State Trials, ch. ii. 1682. Proceedings between the King and the City of London.

DENIZE. — DEN-MARK.

Lord Coke (sec. 198) gives a derivation of DENIZEN, from the legal French deins nèe, tanquam in regno natus. A Denizen is in a middle state between an alien and a natural born, or naturalized subject; partaking of the nature of both, he may take lands by purchase or devise. By Statute 25 George II. c. 39, no natural born subject shall derive a title through an alien parent or ancestor, unless he be born at the time of the death of the ancestor who dies seized of the estate which he claims by descent; with this exception, that if a descent shall be cast upon a daughter of an alien it shall be divested in favour of an after-born son, and in case of an after-born daughter the sisters shall be coparceners. With respect to the distinction between Denizens and persons naturalized by Act of Parliament, it may be observed, that the children born previous to the Denization of the parent cannot inherit by descent, whilst those of a foreigner naturalized are in every respect entitled to the same privileges as British subjects. As far as regards commercial privileges also, a Denizen is nearly on the same footing with a natural born subject. No Denizen can be of the Privy Council, or sit in either House of Parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands, &c. from the Crown. See 12 and 13 William III. c. 2.

DENMARK.

ion, &c.

DENMARK, one of the Kingdoms in the north-west of Europe, partly continental, partly distributed among the neighbouring islands, besides those of Faroe and Iceland situated far in the expanse of the Northern Ocean. The inhabitants of these dominions have been known by the name of Danes ever since the VIth century, when Jornandes, in his Work De Rebus Gothicis, shed the first dawn of light on their history. The appellation seems to have been derived from one of their first leaders called Dan; but they are frequently included in the general term of Scandinavians and Goths. The name of the Kingdom is evidently derived from that of the people, and implies the Marches or Territories of the Danes. The continental part of these dominions stretches from the right bank of the Elbe, in latitude 53° 30′, to the extreme point of Jutland, about 57° 40′; extending from north to south through 4° 20′ of latitude. This part includes in succession from north to south, Jutland, Sleswick, Holstein, and the recently acquired Duchy of Lauenburg. The chief insular portions are Zealand, Funen, Langeland, Alsen, Falster, Laland, Bornholm, and Moen, with others of less extent, situated in the south-west part of the Baltic. The Sea therefore is the general boundary, except where the peninsula joins Germany in the south.

it.

Though these dominions are not of great extent compared with many of the other European Powers, yet they form a concentrated territory, to which their situation. extent of coast, and other circumstances impart a considerable interest. The continental part is about 300 miles from north to south, but seldom more than 100 from east to west. The insular division has always been the chief centre of the Danish power. Zealand being the most central and populous of these islands is the seat of Government. It approaches a circular form, and is nearly 200 miles in circuit. Funen is the next in importance, and is separated from Zealand by a strait called the Great Belt. This island is about fifty miles long and forty broad. Laland is situated south of Zealand, and is a fertile island, thirty miles long, and twenty broad. Langeland lies on the west of Laland, and derives its name from the great proportion its length bears to its breadth, the one exceeding thirty miles, and the other being less than ten. Falster and Bornholm are each about twenty miles long, but not more than twelve broad. The first of these has been called the Orchard of Denmark, and the last has frequently been a point of contention between the Swedes and Danes. The whole surface of these different territories is stated at 22,000 square miles; and the population at nearly 1,700,000 individuals, which is nearly eighty persons to each square mile.

Progressive geography.

Population.

From the most authentic history of early times, it appears that the original inhabitants of these regions were the Cimbri, or northern Celts, from whom the peninsula was called the Cimbric Chersonese. But when the more powerful tribes of Scandinavian Goths, from the north and east, pressed upon these indigines, they were compelled to take refuge in more southern countries. Yet Tacitus states that there still existed a small community of the Cimbri in the southern part of Jutland, while the rest of the peninsula was possessed by seven Gothic tribes, one of which was the Angli, who subsequently imparted their name to the principal part of Great Britain. In the eastern part of the Duchy of Sleswick there is still a district or Province called Anglen. It is to Roman enterprize and ambition, however, that we are indebted for the first real knowledge which we possess of these regions. From their writers it appears that Denmark was then inhabited by a maritime people, who had adopted a monarchical form of government. Jornandes and the Francic historians supply further information respecting these people, till Adam de Bremen gave a minute description of the country in the XIth century, and their own classical author, Saxo Grammaticus, wrote his history towards the end of the XIIth.

DEN-MARK.

The Island of Rugen was annexed to the Danish dominions in 1157, by Waldimar the Great, after defeating the Wends in several successive engagements; soon after which the addition of Pomerania took place. The marriage of Margaret, daughter of Waldimar III., King of Denmark, to the King of Norway, in 1363, produced the memorable union of the three Crowns of the North. In 1387, Margaret ascended the Throne of Denmark and Norway, and that of Sweden, two years afterwards. Iceland and the Faroe Islands, which previously belonged to Norway, were, of course, acquired at the same time. Christian I., Count of Oldenburg, the founder of the present Dynasty, inherited the Duchies of Sleswick and Holstein in 1460, and mortgaged the Orkney and Shetland Islands to Scotland a few years afterwards. The greater part of Sweden threw off the Danish yoke during the tyrannical reign of Christian II.; in addition to which, Jemptland, Herjedal, Gothland, and Oejel were resigned to Christian IV. at the Peace of Bromsebive, in 1645; but the Province of Scane, and some other southern parts of Scandinavia were retained till 1660, when Frederic III. was obliged to give them up with the Island of Rugen to the Swedes. In 1676, Oldenburg was acquired in exchange for Holstein Gottorp, by Christian V.; but this, together with the County of Delmenhorst, was soon afterwards resigned to the younger branch of the House of Gottorp, in consequence of the renunciation of all claims to Ducal Holstein. From this epoch till 1813, the Danish dominions sustained but little variations. In that year the King was constrained to exchange Norway for Swedish Pomerania, which, in the following year, was ceded to Prussia for the Province of Lauenburg and a pecuniary consideration. Since these last changes, the following has been the division of Provinces:

Division.

Provinces.	Population.	Chief Towns.
Jutland	400,000	Wyburg.
Zealand, with the additional Isles	550,000	Copenhagen.
Sleswick	300,000	Sleswick.
Holstein	350,000	Kiel.
Lauenburg	35,000	Lauenburg.
Iceland	50,000	Reykeavik
Faroe Islands	5,300	Thorshaven.
Settlements in other parts	100,000

The Provinces are subdivided into different Bailiwicks or Governments. The islands in the Baltic constitute the most fertile and populous parts of the Kingdom; having a population of about 112 persons to each square mile. Several parts, however, have a much less number. Funen has about sixty-five persons; Laland, seventy; the Faroe Islands, eight or ten; and Iceland, not more than one. The outlines of the Danish dominions are much indented by the sea, and present a great variety of bays, gulfs, and creeks. On doubling the northern point of Jutland, vessels enter the Cattegat, which leads to the different straits into which the entrance of the Baltic is divided by the Danish islands. The most frequented of these channels is the Sound, which separates Zealand from Sweden, the narrowest part of which is about four miles broad. This is the place where vessels, entering the Baltic or issuing from it, pay tribute to the Danish Government, and thus virtually acknowledging the Sovereignty of the neighbouring seas as vested in that Power. This being one of the most frequented passages in Europe, the tolls here taken form an important part of the Danish revenues.

Denmark is a low and undulating country. The aspect of the islands is varied, and the most elevated parts are clothed with verdure, or shaded with wood, while the vales are rich and fertile. Wide tracts of heath cover many of the upland tracts of Jutland; but the vales generally afford good pasturage. Much of the southern and central districts of the peninsula may be considered as flat countries, but even these are often interspersed with gentle elevations, woods, streams, meadows, and cultivated fields. These varieties, however, are seldom sufficient to present any great extent of picturesque scenery; and since the loss of Norway, there is scarcely a mountain to be found in the Kingdom, except in the distant Islands of Faroe and Iceland; yet a few of the hills assume an imposing aspect when viewed from the plains which they overlook. As no part of these dominions is far from the sea, a great number of streams and rivulets intersect and adorn the surface, but these seldom accumulate to a sufficient magnitude to deserve the appellation of Rivers. The Eyder is the largest stream in this Kingdom. It rises near the eastern confines of the peninsula, and flows towards the west, separating the Duchies of Sleswick and Holstein. It formed the ancient boundary between Denmark and Germany, and falls into the North Sea beyond the mouth of the Elbe. The whole length is about 100 miles, and it is navigable to Rendsburg, to which town the tide ascends. From this place the Canal of Kiel continues the navigation to the Baltic, and is the only artificial navigation in the country. This and the navigable part of the Eyder open a communication between the two seas. The length of this canal is about twenty-two miles, and its depth sufficient to admit vessels of 120 tons burden. This was made between 1777 and 1785, and cost about £800,000. The whole length of this passage, from sea to sea, is about 105 miles, and between 3000 and 4000 vessels annually pass through it in time of war, but during peace these are much diminished; yet many still prefer the conveyance of merchandize by this route to that by the tedious passage round the north of Jutland. This canal has greatly benefitted the districts through which it passes; and as most other parts of the peninsula are favourable for such undertakings, an enterprising industry would render

DEN-MARK.

Denmark a second Holland. The lakes of this Kingdom are numerous, but few of them possess sufficient interest or importance to require a particular description. That of Ploen in Holstein is one of the largest, but does not exceed ten miles in circuit. Those arms of the sea, which the natives call Fiords, resemble large lakes connected with the sea by narrow outlets. One of the largest of these is the small sea called Lymfiord, which enters the eastern side of Jutland a little below the fifty-seventh parallel of latitude, and stretches across the country to within a few miles of the opposite shore. This Fiord divides into various arms, and contains several islands, one of which exceeds sixty miles in circumference. The whole length of the inlet is about ninety English miles, exclusive of the branch which stretches towards the south. It is about two miles wide at the entrance, and admits vessels of considerable burden, but has diminished in depth since the beginning of the last century, when ships of war would enter it without difficulty. Lymfiord abounds with fish, and imparts the advantages of seaports to the inland towns along its shores. Another of these singular inlets runs nearly parallel to the western coasts of Jutland, and is only separated from the ocean by a narrow strip of land. It communicates with the sea near its southern extremity. The Danes call it Stovningfiord, and the largest of its islands is Holmland. The Sley also gives access from the Baltic to Sleswick; and further north there is a deep passage from the same sea to Flensburg. A deep bay of this kind enters the north coast of Zealand, and divides its upper part into two peninsulas.

Vicinity to the sea renders the climate of Denmark milder, and the air more humid than in other continental countries of the same latitude. The atmosphere is often loaded with fogs, and rain frequently falls. Fahrenheit's thermometer, however, seldom sinks below 20° nor rises above 60°; yet the heat of summer is occasionally extreme, and the cold of winter intense, so that the seas are covered with ice. The transition from summer to winter, and from winter to summer is rapid; spring and autumn are, therefore, scarcely known. Winter, however, sways the greater part of the year; as the warm weather seldom commences till the end of May, or lasts beyond the close of September. The continuance of frost during the coldest months of the year is often interrupted, and a calm, clear sky is seldom experienced, though the upland tracts are by no means considered insalubrious. The climate is the mildest, and the vegetation the most luxuriant in the Duchy of Holstein, and the recently acquired Province of Lauenburg, which in several respects resembles the more southern parts of Germany. Some places on the banks of the Eyder are likewise similar to tracts on the Rhine or the Maine. The soil of Denmark is chiefly of a sandy nature, which is rendered fertile by the almost perpetual humidity of the atmosphere. That of Zealand and Laland is the most productive; that of Funen, Langeland, and Falster, the most diversified. The eastern districts of Jutland are more fertile than the western; while the central parts consist principally of a sandy ridge, yielding little that is valuable in domestic economy. In the northern parts of Jutland, the loose sands are often driven by the wind so as to injure the vegetation of the adjoining districts; and to prevent these effects, various kinds of trees are planted, and the seeds of the plant which Botanists call Elymus arenaria are frequently sown, the spreading roots and leaves of which are of essential benefit in preventing the sands from being carried away by the wind. In the upland parts of the Duchies of Sleswick and Holstein, the soil has a great resemblance to that of the other Provinces; but in the lower parts, and especially near the western coasts, it is like that of Holland, being wholly alluvial and principally gained from the sea, or the mouths of rivers by embankments. This district stretches nearly from the mouth of the Elbe to the confines of Jutland, and is a uniform plain, without any other elevation than that of the dikes. It is a rich earth, mixed with sand, and resting on a substratum of blue clay, which forms a good manure when spread on the surface. Cultivation in Denmark has a great resemblance to that of many parts of England. It has been greatly improved within the last half century; and the country now produces most of the necessaries of life. The attention of Government, the improvement of the lower classes, and the institution of Societies for the encouragement of domestic economy, have all contributed to the production of this beneficial result. Nearly forty years ago, Government established an Office, called a Chest of Credit, for the purpose of advancing sums of money for the promotion of agricultural improvements; and several millions of rix-dollars have been issued for that purpose. In the parts where the soil is chiefly composed of sand, little grain is produced except rye; the stronger soils yield wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, and other vegetable products. Zealand supplies large quantities of barley and oats; Funen is most noted for buck wheat. Laland and Falster grow more wheat than the other islands. Rape seed is an object of attention in Denmark, and forms one of its exports. Potatoes, turnips, carrots, and cabbages are extensively used by the lower classes of the inhabitants; hops, hemp, flax, and tobacco are also cultivated, and most of the common kinds of fruit are plentiful. Medicinal plants are produced in some of the provinces, especially Holstein. Danish horses are in high reputation throughout the Continent, both for the army and for carriages. The best are bred in Holstein, and are distinguished by their figure and action. The cattle are of a large red kind, and when fed on the best pastures give a great quantity of milk. Many of these are sent to the other parts of the Continent, and vast numbers of fat beasts are annually sold at Hamburg. The sheep are also good in several parts; particularly in Sleswick and Holstein, where they are noted for their fine white fleeces. Pigs and poultry are plentiful, especially geese and ducks, the feathers of which constitute a valuable article of export. The Danes likewise pay great attention to the management of bees; and the Islands Funen, Falster, and Bornholm yield abundance of wax and honey. The seas and Fiords supply plenty of fish, and several of the latter are so little impregnated with salt, that various kinds of fresh-water fish breed in them. The rivers and lakes afford pike, carp, perch, eels, and some other kinds; oysters and other shell-fish are plentiful along the coast. The progress of cultivation has destroyed all the more ferocious animals; and others have been restricted to particular tracts. Deer, hares, and foxes, however, are numerous, and hunting is a favourite diversion. Wild fowl are common, and Cultivation and products.

Animals.

DEN-MARK.

sea-fowl abound, particularly among the small islands off the western shores. The alluvial nature of so great a part of these territories, leaves little room for an extended mineralogy. Coal has been found in some places, especially in Bornholm, and near the western coast; but peat is the general fuel. Amber is found on the shores of some of the islands. Bornholm yields porcelain earth, good building stone, rock crystal, and a species of coarse marble. Gypsum is found near Kiel; and the brine springs are sufficient to yield salt enough for the supply of the whole country, which is estimated at 18,000 tons. Denmark lost her metallic stores in her separation from Norway, and none exist within her present limits sufficient to defray the expense of working.

Minerals.

Towns.

Denmark is not distinguished either by the number or the magnitude of its cities and towns. Copenhagen, the Capital of the whole Kingdom, has already been described. Altona, near the celebrated city of Hamburg, is one of its most commercial places. Kiel is the Capital of Holstein; and Elsinore is the place where the toll is collected from the ships passing the Sound. Gluckstadt is a seaport on the right bank of the Elbe. Sleswick is the Capital of the Duchy of the same; and Flensberg is the most commercial place in it; Roschild was the ancient Capital of the Danish Monarchy. There are also a few other small towns, which will be enumerated under the heads of the respective Provinces to which they belong. The manufactures of this Kingdom are neither extensive nor important. Government has adopted several measures, and expended large sums for their improvement; but its efforts have not been attended with equal success to those designed for the amelioration of agriculture. The improvement of the lower classes of society, however, has produced a corresponding change in the supply of manufactured articles; and some things are now made in quantities nearly equal to the consumption. Coarse woollens are the most extensive, besides which, some fine cloths, shalloons, and kerseymeres are made. The peasants often make a kind of coarse cloth for their own supply; independently of which, it is estimated that 2000 people are employed in the woollen manufacture, and that the value of the articles made is 165,000 rix-dollars. Carpets, stockings, and gloves are also made of the coarse wool of the sheep that feed on the heaths. The refugees from Brabant introduced lace-making into Sleswick; and this branch of industry has become so extensive among the women of several districts, as to form one of the Danish exports. Small quantities of linen and cotton goods, porcelain, and all kinds of stores necessary for military and naval equipment are also fabricated. The local situation of these dominions is favourable for the encouragement of fisheries, and these, therefore, have become an important branch of national industry. Large quantities of cod and herrings are annually cured and exported to the southern countries of Europe, in exchange for the wines and fruits of those parts. The Danish mode of curing herrings resembles that of the Dutch; and the annual exports are about 1000 tons. The Danes have also several vessels engaged in the Greenland Whale-fishery, and agents stationed on the coast to purchase the produce of the seas from the natives.

Manufactures.

Fisheries.

Commerce.

None of the northern countries of Europe are more favourably situated for both domestic and foreign commerce than Denmark. Bays and Fiords intersect the shores and extend into the interior, and these, with the great length of coast, afford a facility of communication between one part and another. This promotes its internal commerce, while its position, as the key to the Baltic, gives it an advantage with respect to all the other parts of northern Europe. This commerce, however, is fettered by being chiefly vested in Companies, who have exclusive privileges. As Denmark is deficient in products and manufactures, suitable for the outward freight to India, but five ships sail annually to those eastern regions. The trade to Iceland was laid open in 1816; and all the foreign articles which a people living in so high and desolate a region require, are transmitted from the parent country. The vessels sail in May or June, and return with salt-fish, oil, hides, skins, feathers, cider, clover, &c. The Greenland colonies are also supplied in the same way, and return similar articles. The possessions in the West Indies supply Denmark with sugar, cotton, coffee, rum, and other colonial products. The Danes chiefly send raw hides, skins, and oats to England, since their separation from Norway, before which the timber trade was the most extensive branch of Danish commercial transactions with this country; for which small quantities of manufactured goods and colonial produce were exchanged. The merchants of Denmark have formed connections with most of the commercial States of Europe, and her trade in the Mediterranean employs a great number of ships; many of which are engaged in the service of the Italians, and other southern States. As the Danish harbours are in general shallow, and the surrounding seas difficult of navigation, most of her ships are small.

Ships.

Prior to the year 1660, the Government of Denmark was an elective Monarchy; the right of election being vested in the three estates of the Kingdom; the Nobility, Clergy, and Commons. Before that period, the King was little more than the President of the Senate, and Commander of the Army; but in that year a most remarkable revolution took place, which placed the King of Denmark among the most absolute Monarchs of Europe. The Nobles had long exercised a most tyrannical sway over the other two estates, who, with a view of being revenged for this oppression, resigned all their privileges into the hands of the King, and compelled the aristocratical branch to join them in arming him with absolute authority, choosing rather to be subject to one despot than to many. The form of government was promulgated by an instrument denominated the Royal Law of Denmark; which states that "The hereditary Kings of Denmark and Norway shall be, in effect, and ought to be esteemed by their subjects, the only Supreme heads on earth: they shall be above all human laws, and shall acknowledge in all Ecclesiastical and Civil affairs, no higher power, but God alone. The King shall enjoy the right of making and interpreting laws, of abrogating, adding to, and dispensing with them. He may also annul all laws, which either he or his predecessors have made, excepting this Royal law, which must remain irrevocable, and be considered as the fundamental law of the State. He has the power of declaring war, making peace, imposing taxes, and levying contributions of all sorts." Having enumerated almost every possible prerogative of uncircumscribed Royal authority, this document states, "All that we have hitherto said of power, eminence, and sovereignty, and if there be any thing further that has not been distinctly specified, shall be comprised in the following words: The King of Denmark and Norway shall be the hereditary Monarch, and endued with the highest authority; insomuch, that all that can be said or written to the advantage of a Christian, hereditary, and absolute King, shall be extended, under the most favourable interpretation, to the hereditary King or Queen of Denmark and Norway." According to the present Constitution, the King is assisted in the exercise of his functions by a Privy Council, the members of which he nominates and dismisses at pleasure, except the Princes of the blood, who are hereditary Counsellors. The great Officers of State are also generally considered as members of this Council. From this source all laws emanate, and the most important business of Government is either sanctioned or transacted. The various subjects are prepared by appropriate bodies, called Chambers, but they must have the sanction of the King, and issue as from himself. Though the power of the Monarch is without any Constitutional check, it has been so controlled by the influence of Religion, the freedom of the Press, and the progressive improvement of the nation, as to prevent it from being much abused. Wisdom and moderation have been the general characteristics of the Danish Government; and the emancipation of the peasants at home, and of the slaves abroad, with the attention that has been bestowed upon the promotion of national industry and improvement, show the desire which has been felt by the Danish rulers for the welfare of their subjects.

Govern-ment and Constitution.

The laws of Denmark are distinguished by brevity, perspicuity, and equity. The present Code was drawn up under the superintendence of Christian V., and consists of six books. The subjects of these books, in their order, are, Regulations relative to proceedings of Courts of Justice; to Ecclesiastical Government; to Offices and the different states of persons; to maritime laws; to property and contract; and to crimes and punishment. A series of Courts has been established for the execution of these laws. The first class are the District Courts, which are open once a week; the next order, are those established in the towns; and thence the gradation is continued by Provincial Courts, and finally ascends to the Supreme Court at Copenhagen. This the King opens in person once a year, with great solemnity; and there he is always supposed to reside; and to it alone the Nobles are amenable. It is open for at least eight months in the year, and is the only one in which verbal pleadings are allowed; the processes in all the others being conducted in writing. The Judges have fixed and adequate salaries, and in all that relates to property their decisions are final; but in all that relates to life and honour, the King possesses the right of revision. In Causes brought before the lower Courts, the claims of the parties, accompanied by their proofs, are written in plain and concise terms, which must not exceed a certain number of sheets. These are submitted to the Judge; who is authorized to put such questions to the parties as he may think necessary for elucidating the subject. By this process Causes are soon decided, and none are allowed to be extended beyond six weeks. When an appeal from an inferior Court takes place, the Judge of that Court is summoned to defend his decision, and if it be found an unjust one, he is compelled to render satisfaction to the party. The proceedings in criminal cases are similar; but when any sentence to capital punishment is pronounced, no execution can take place till sanctioned by the King in Council. These laws admit of torture after a criminal has been condemned to death, with a view of discovering his accomplices. In trial by jury, and personal imprisonment, the laws of Denmark present a striking resemblance to those of England. Murder, and the limits of landed property, are always submitted to a jury of eight, and these must be of good character, and as nearly as possible of the same condition of life as the person whose cause they are to decide. No person can be imprisoned, unless taken in the actual commission of a crime subject to corporeal punishment, or who confesses himself guilty before a proper magistrate. The Duchies of Sleswick and Holstein have their ancient laws and separate institutions; and some of the recently acquired States have also their distinct charters and ordinances formed at different times, and under various circumstances.

Army

The whole military force of Denmark, previous to the late war, consisted of 40,000. During that period the number was increased; but since the peace, they have been reduced to about 25,000. The Danish army includes militia as well as regulars; in forming it, each male peasant is entered on the lists as soon as born, and is liable to be called upon to serve between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-six. The period of service is eight years, and when any vacancy occurs, the eldest on the list is called upon to supply it; and before the expiration of the specified term, no one can leave the district in which he lives without leave from the proper authorities. Few countries are more favourably situated for the creation of a maritime people than Denmark. Great attention was paid to the formation of the navy by several of its Sovereigns; and at the commencement of the present century, the Naval Arsenal at Copenhagen was one of the most complete in Europe. The navy then amounted to twenty sail of the line, besides frigates and other smaller vessels. This force was nearly destroyed by the British, in 1807; and the peace establishment is only calculated for the support of 4000 men; but as nearly 15,000 are registered, the number actually employed can readily be increased on any emergency.

and Navy.

Revenue.

Denmark offers but few sources for raising an extensive revenue; and the annual amount of this does not, therefore, exceed £2,000,000. sterling. This arises chiefly from the Royal desmenes, land-tax, poll-tax, a tax upon places and pensions, stamp duties, customs, and a toll upon vessels passing the Sound, which amounts to about £130,000. annually. This is about one per cent. on the value of the cargoes of those ships which belong to nations under a treaty of commerce with the Danes; and one and a quarter on such as belong to other nations. Ships of war, and Swedish vessels are exempt. Though the revenue of Denmark is comparatively small, by a strict economy in all departments of Government, it has generally been adequate to the expenditure. In the late war, however, this could not be effected, and a public debt of several millions was incurred; but has since been put in a way of liquidation.

Religion.

Odin was the supreme Divinity of the ancient Scandinavians; his worship was not succeeded by the Roman

DEN-MARK. DENOMI-NATE. Ecclesiastical polity.

Catholic faith, till about the end of the IXth century; and this again by Lutheranism, in 1536. After that period the most strenuous efforts of Papal influence could not stop the progress of the Reformation in Denmark. The revenues of the Church were then seized by the Crown, and partly applied to the maintenance of the Clergy, and partly reserved for the use of the State. Complete toleration is allowed, and the Ecclesiastical Establishment of Denmark seems to be a medium between the discipline of the Church of England and that of the Calvinistic persuasion. There are six Bishops in Denmark, and two in Iceland; but they have no political character, their influence being wholly confined to ecclesiastical affairs. There is no Archbishop, but the Bishop of Zealand is considered as the Metropolitan; and his See is the richest, being about £1000. a year, while the others are from £400. to £600., except in Iceland, where they do not exceed £150. per annum. These dignitaries are appointed by the King, who is the head of the Church as well as the State.

Education

Education is now brought within the reach of all, by the establishment of Parochial Schools, in which the children of the poor acquire the rudiments of knowledge at the public expense. An Institution has also been established at Copenhagen, for the preparation of masters for these schools. Besides these parochial schools, others in which classical learning is cultivated have been instituted in various parts of the Kingdom, and are also supported at the expense of the Crown. These amount to about fifty, in addition to which there is a College at Odensee, a University at Kiel, and another at Copenhagen; the last of which is the great centre of Literature and Science in the Danish dominions. The number of students is generally about 700; many of whom are from various countries in the north of Europe.

Language.

The language of the Danes is a dialect of the ancient Scandinavian; which is still preserved in the greatest purity in Iceland; and it only differs from that of either Norway or Sweden, as they have been modified by local circumstances. With these variations, the language is the same from the banks of the Eyder to the limits of Finmark. French and German are spoken at Court, and English is generally studied by the merchants. The cultivation of the Danish language for literary purposes is comparatively of recent date; and it is therefore considered by some Philologists as susceptible of greater purity than it has yet attained. Several authors of good repute might however be enumerated in the various departments of Danish Science and Literature.

Manners and customs.

The ancient Danes acquired peculiar celebrity for their courage, ferocity, and piratical disposition; and not content with evincing these in the immediate vicinity of their own abodes, they laid many of the more southern countries of Europe under contribution for several centuries. The history of Britain bears ample testimony to their restless and enterprising habits. Their national character has in this respect, however, undergone a considerable change. They are a brave and humane people, still retaining much of their former simplicity of life. The higher classes differ little from the same ranks in other countries; and the feudal splendour in which many of them lived while the government was in a great measure vested in their hands, has gradually declined, though it is yet far from being extinguished; great value being still attached to titles and privileges, and much pomp and show indulged on many occasions. Custom induces the people of Denmark to consider themselves as divided into five classes. The first includes those Nobility who hold privileged estates under the King. The second includes the titular Nobility, the orders of Knighthood, the higher Offioers of State, whether civil, military, or ecclesiastical, and offices which confer Nobility during the lives of the persons who hold them, and which are therefore frequently obtained for the sole purpose of acquiring rank without either discharging any duties or deriving any emoluments from such appointments; and the sums annually paid for such honours constitute a valuable part of the revenue. The third class comprises the inferior Clergy, lawyers, and students. The fourth, the merchants and citizens of the towns; and the fifth consists of farmers and seamen. The Danes are generally tall and robust, with good features, fair complexions, and flaxen or reddish hair. The females, however, are seldom distinguished for symmetry of figure. The higher classes are fond of show and magnificence, and the copious use of wines and intoxicating liquors has been represented as one of their characteristic customs. The lower classes live chiefly upon oat cakes, rye, fish, cheese, and other common products of the country.

Besides Iceland, which is situated far in the Northern Ocean, and the Islands almost contiguous to the shores of the central parts of the dominions, the Danes possess the Faroe Isles, situated between Iceland and Shetland, and various other settlements in distinct parts of the globe. In the West Indies, they have the Islands of Santa Cruz, St. Thomas, and St. John, which were in possession of Great Britain, during the greater part of the late war, but were restored at the conclusion of the general peace. They have also settlements on the coast of Greenland, on the shores of Coromandel, and the Nicobar Islands in Asia. But their most important settlement in the East is at Tranquebar. In Africa, they have the fort of Christianburg, and others, chiefly on the coast of Guinea.

Coxe's Travels, 1792; Consett, Tour, 1789; Beaujolin, Voyage, 1790—1792; Marshall's Travels, 1768—1770; Oddy's European Commerce, 1805.

DENO'MINATE, DENOMINA'TION, DENO'MINATIVE, DENOMINA'TOR, DENO'MINABLE.

Fr. denominer; Sp. denominar; It. and Lat. denominare. De, and nominare, to name; a word common to the Northern, as well as to the Greek and Latin languages. See COGNOMEN.

To name or call by name; to give or apply a name.

Of whiche worchings and possession of hours, ye daies of the week haue take her names, after denominacion in these seuen planets.

Chaucer. The Testament of Love, book ii. fol. 303.

But although all these complexions be assembled in euery body of man and woman, yet the body taketh his denomination of those qualyties, which abounde in hym, more than in other.

Sir Thomas Elyot. Castel of Helth, book i.

When as multiplicity of reading, the best it can signifie, doth but speak them to have taken pains for it: and this alone is but the dry, and barren part of learning, and hath little reason to denominate. Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xv.

With that writ were sent to each sheriff instructions, that, "Instead of a ship, he should levy upon his county such a sum of money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy for his majesties use with direction, in what manner he should proceed against such as refused: and from hence that tax had the denomination of ship-money; a word of a lasting sound in the memory of this kingdom.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i. p. 68.

For sanctity and to sanctifie being conjugates or denominatives, as logicians call them; the one openeth the way to the knowledge of the other.

Mede. Works. On Texts of Scripture, book i. dis. 2.

Against this opinion that Aram the son of Sem, was the father and denominator of the Syrians in general, (and not only of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia,) some read Gen. xxii. 21. Kemuel, the father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel the son of Aram.

Ralegh. History of the World, book i. ch. viii. sec. 15.

An inflammation either simple, consisting only of an hot and sanguineous affluxion, or else denominable from other humors according to the predominancy of melancholy, flegm or choler.

Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. iii.

Nor as if the relation of friends had actually discharged them from that of servants; but that of the two relations, Christ was pleased to over-look the meaner, and without any mention of that to entitle and denominate them solely from the more honourable.

South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 47.

They would not baptize their children; held as the Arians in the doctrine of the Godhead, and as Pelagius in the doctrine of free-will and predestination: all these came under the denomination of Anabaptists. Strype. Life of Archbishop Parker, Anno 1550.

Eber dyeth; read Gen. xi. 17. He was the longest liver borne since the flood; the father of the Hebrews; and denominator of the Hebrew tongue.

Lightfoot. Harmony, &c. of the Old Testament, p. 27.

On the contrary, those other passions, commonly denominated selfish, both produce different sentiments in each individual, according to his particular situation; and also contemplate the greater part of mankind with the utmost indifference and unconcern.

Hume. Essays, vol. ii. p. 316. Conclusion, part i. sec. 9.

If the qualities which I have ranged under the head of the sublime be all found consistent with each other, and all different from those which I place under the head of beauty; and if those which compose the class of the beautiful have the same consistency with themselves, and the same opposition to those which are classed under the denomination of sublime, I am in little pain whether any body chuses to follow the name I give them or not, provided he allows that what I dispose under different heads are in reality different things in nature.

Burke. Of the Sublime and Beautiful. Preface.

Denominator, in Algebra and Arithmetic, is the letter or number below the line in a fraction, showing the number of parts into which the integer is supposed to be divided, as in $\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{3}{8}$, 4 and 8 are respectively Denominators.

DENO'TE, Denō'tate, Denota'tion, Denota'tive, Deno'tement. De, and notare, to mark; notare from supine, notum, known. Nam eo rem notamus, ut e nota sua cognoscamus. We mark a thing that we may know or distinguish it by its mark. Vossius.

To mark, signify or designate; to betoken.

Denotement, in the passage cited below from Shakspeare, is the reading of the first Quarto; the first Folio reads Dilation, q. v.

Where though the word Gods be used generally, so as to comprehend both the supreme and inferiour Gods under it, yet Deus Ipse, God himself, denotes the Supreme God only.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 262.

Those termes of all and for ever in Scripture, are not eternall, but only denotate a longer time, which by many examples they prove. Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, fol. 716.

It is not their having agreed to take several relations or offices to us, and for our salvation, which he specifies and denotates them by (as in that other in Ephes. iv.) but simply their oneness and communion one with another.

Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part iv. fol. 127.

C. You will see that by reviewing the place even now cited, Acts, iii. 26. God having raised up his son Jesus sent him to bless us; which now you perceive is a denotation of his priestly office, every priest, especially the Melchizedik priest, being to bless.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 8. A Practical Catechism.

——— But, in a man that's just,
They are close denotements, working from the heart,
That passion cannot rule.

Shakspeare. Othello, act iii. sc. 3.

What are the effects of sickness? the alteration it produces is so denotative, that a person is known to be sick by those who never saw him in health. Letters upon Physiognomy, p. 121.

He hath given to the poor. These words denote the freeness of his bounty, and determine the principal object thereof.

Barrow. Sermon 31. vol. i.

The filthiness of flesh and spirit, is a general expression to denote wickedness of every kind. Gilpin. Sermon 18. vol. i.

DENOU'NCE, Denou'ncement, Denou'ncer, Denou'ncing, Denu'nciate, Denuncia'tion, Denuncia'tor. Fr. denoncer; Sp. denonciar; It. denonciare; Lat. denunciare; de, and nunciare, to bring something new. Nuncius, from νέος, new, quia aliquid novi apportat. To give information; to inform against, to publish, to proclaim, sc. an accusation, a menace or threatening; and thus, to accuse, to menace, to threaten.

For also whanne we weren among ghou we denounsiden this thing to ghou, that if ony man wole not worche neithir ete he.

Wiclif. 2 Thessalonians, ch. ii.

For surely at such time as he was denoūced for an heritike there laye his Englishe Byble open, and some other Englishe bookes of hys, that euery mā might see the places noted with his own hand.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 240. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

For as for the minoure of thys good mannes argument, that he that enquyreth of heresye, taketh knowledge of heresye, so dooeth euery denouncer, euerye accuser, and in a manner euerye witnesse too, tak vpon them knowledge of heresy in some maner wyse.

Id. Ib. fol. 1013. Debellacion of Salem and Byzance.

Yet hath there not from time to time, been wanting amongst us mischevious and evil disposed enemies of her felicity, which either by insolent and open denouncing of war or by secret and privy practices of sinister devices, have ambitiously and most disloyally attempted to spoil her of her right, and us of these blessings.

State Trials. Arraignment of Edmund Campion.

These Hebrews ent'ring the Egyptian court,
Their great commission publicly proclaim,
Which there repulsed as a slight report,
Doth soon denounce defiance to the same.

Drayton. Moses his Birth and Miracles, book ii.

The whole commandment concerning discipline, being the main purpose of the epistle: although Hooker would feign have this denouncement refer'd to the particular precept going before, because the word commandment is in the singular number.

Milton. Reason of Church Government.

The more shame for the over-easie denouncers of that censure, that inflict it on every trivial commission, without consideration whether repented of or no.

Hammond. Works. Of the Power of the Keyes, vol. i. fol. 453.

DE-NOUNCE. — DENSE.

He [William Rufus] raised a great armie and before anie denouncing of warre by him made, inuaded Northumberland, and took the castell of Anwike, putting all such to the sword as were found in the same. Holinshed. Scotland, Anno 1087.

But Gracchus's soldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed slaves, had received from their general a peremptory denuntiation, that this day, or never, they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man, for price thereof, an enemy's head.
Ralegh. History of the World, book v. ch. iii. sec. 13.

The prophet, who my future woes reveal'd,
Yet this, the greatest and the worst, conceal'd.
And dire Celæno, whose foreboding skill
Denounc'd all else, was silent of this ill.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

And if upon such denunciation, as in excommunication hath been used, the party shall not submit himself, nor stand to, nor abide such order as to him assigned, within forty days, then it shall be lawfull to signifie his contumacy in such manner and sort, and to such court, as heretofore hath been used, for persons so long standing excommunicate.
Strype. Life of Grindal, Appendix, p. 593.

The denunciator does not make himself a party in judgement, as the accuser does. Ayliffe. Parergon.

For guilty of, may mean liable to; the Scripture saith, guilty of death, as well as of sin: and then, guilty of all, may mean, liable to all the punishments denounced by the law, in his proper degree. Secker. Sermon 3. vol. iv.

I have therefore been decidedly of opinion, with our declaration at Whitehall, in the beginning of this war, that the vicinage of Europe had not only a right, but an indispensable duty, and an exigent interest to denounce this new work before it had produced the danger we have so sorely felt, and which we shall long feel. Burke. On a Regicide Peace.

Among other expedients which he [Caius Cato] employed to obstruct the designs of those who favoured Ptolemy, he had recourse to a prophecy which he pretended to have found in the Sibylline books, and which contained a severe denunciation against the state, if the Romans assisted the King of Egypt with their troops in recovering his throne.
Melmoth. Cicero. To Publius Lentulus, book i. let. 12.

DENSE, DE'NSITY. } Lat. densus, thick. Varro says, densum, a dentibus pectinis, quibus feritur, (sc. tela.)

Thick, compressed or compacted into a close mass.

It sheweth, that air may be made so to be condensed, as to be converted into a dense body; whereas the race and period of all things, here aboue the earth, is to extenuate and turn things to be more pneumaticall, and rare; and not to be retrograde, from pneumaticall to that which is dense.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 1. sec. 29.

The greatest winds, if they have no coarctation, or blow not hollow, give an interiour sound; the whistling or hollow wind yeeldeth a singing, or exteriour sound. The former being pent by some other body; the latter being pent in by his own density.
Id. Ib. Cent. 2. sec. 188.

What can we say of the subtlety, activity, and penetrancy of its effluvia, which no obstacle can stop or repel, but they will make their way through all sorts of bodies, firm and fluid, dense and rare, heavy and light, pellucid and opake?
Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 109.

Because if there were every where an absolute plenitude and density without any empty pores and interstices between the particles of bodies, then all bodies of equal dimensions would contain an equal quantity of matter, and consequently, as we have shewed before, would be equally ponderous,
Bentley. Sermon 7.

—— The watchful Hours—to whom the charge
Of the Olympian summit appertains,
And of the boundless ether, back to roll,
And to replace the cloudy barrier dense.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book v.

It may seem astonishing that so small a difference of distance from the earth as between the upper and under side of a common leaden weight in the grocer's shop should increase the density of ether in so sensible a degree as that it may be felt by taking the lead into one's hand.
Search. Light of Nature, vol. iv. ch. xxii. p. 75.

DENT, v. } Tooke says, past participle of dyn-en,
DENT, n. } strepere, to din.

As if first applied to the din or noise of blows; and then to the mark or impression made. See DIN, and DINT.

But neuer was that dent of thunder,—
That so swithe gan downward discend
As this foule whan it beheld
That I a rowme was in the field.
Chaucer. The seconde Booke of Fame, fol. 277.

And truly sone, I toke my leue and went
When she had me enquired, what I was
For more and more, impressen gan the dent
Of Loue's dart, while I beheld her face.
Id. The Court of Loue, fol. 352.

Thus thoughtful as I lay, I saw my withered skin,
How it doth shew my dented chewes, the flesh was worn so thyn,
And eke my toothless chaps, the gates of my right way,
That opes and shuttes as I do speake, do thus vnto me say.
Surrey. No age is Content.

Wherfore he willyage to saue his people from famyne whom he knewe to be from the dent of the Frenche swordе clearely exempte and vntouched, returned ouer the riuer of Leyre.
Hall. Henry V. The ninth Yere.

When stormy courses answer'd cuff for cuff
Denting proud beavers with the counter-buff;
Upon an altar, burnt with holy flame
I sacrific'd, as incense to thy fame.
Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles.

King Edward tooke euen lyke studie for the warres as his enemies did, minding eyther to bring them to conformitie or reason, by dent of sworde, or else by power of battaile vtterly to destroy and extirpate them and their affinitie.
Grafton. Edward IV. The eighth Yere.

We two have kept its homage in suspence,
And bent the globe, on whose each side we trod,
Till it was dented inwards.
Dryden. All for Love, act v.

There are a whole genus of birds called Pici Martii, or woodpeckers, that in like manner have a tongue which they can shoot forth to a very great length, ending in a sharp stiff bony tip, dented on each side.
Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 166.

DENTALIUM, in Zoology, a genus of tubular shells, which has been placed by most modern Zoologists amongst the Annelides. Cuvier, in his Animal Kingdom, (ii. p. 322,) ranges it, with a little doubt, in the Tube-living animals of the latter class, giving for its character, "shell elongate, conical, arched and open at both ends, animal most probably articulated, and provided with lateral bundles of bristles." This has been copied by Dr. Fleming in his description of the English species of Dentalia, (Edin. Phil. Jour.) Lamarck, in his History of Avertebrated animals, placed it with Maldonia in the Annelides; taking his description of the body from Argenville, and misled by the observations of Henrian de Belle Vue, who thought that the animal was very like the Sabellæ and Amphitrites, and had on each side of their body a range of small bundles of bristles, but that they had not the bundles of gills of the latter, or the pectinated pallet of the former. Savigny, in the system of Annelides, (p. 98,) was the first to correct this error, and described the animal of Dentalium Entalis from a specimen sent from England; which he observed was quite destitute of external rings, of lateral bristles, or of a foot. The animal is very muscular; shape like the conical shell, very smooth and even on the surface, ending behind by a distinct tail, which is rolled up, and has the anus at its base; the front or large end of the body is truncated, with an opening like the mouth of a Trochus, with a conical bundle, produced by the interlacement of a number of very long small thread-like tentaculæ, ending in a club. He supposes that the animal is provided with a trunk, and a more perfectly developed tentacula, which he could not observe in its contracted state; the intestinal canal descends between two very large columns of muscles, and is not accompanied by any remarkable viscera.

Deshayes has lately reexamined this animal, and sent an account of his dissection to Blainville, who has formed them into a new Order, under the name of Cirrhobranchiata, which he has placed among the Hermaphrodite head-bearing Mollusca. He describes the animals as provided with a mantle, furnished with a fleshy collar for the passage of the foot and head; its head distinct, destitute of true tentacula; mouth furnished with distinctly digitalled lips, and very peculiar jaws; stomach furnished with horny hooks. The foot at first sight is somewhat similar to the tentacular proboscis of the Serpula, but it does not occupy the same place, for in the Dentalia it is symmetrical, prolonged in front, and entirely muscular, and not hollow, and rising from the back, nor covered with a shelly or horny operculum, as the proboscis of the latter genera; it is also furnished with retractor muscles, which are attached to the hinder part of the shell: the gills are placed on the back of the neck, in a cavity formed by the mantle, and are symmetrical; they are formed of a bundle of filaments, and have a slight resemblance to the gills of the Amphitrites. The digestive canal ends in a posterior medial anus, corresponding with the hinder openings of the shell.

Nothing is known of the habits of these animals. They live principally on sandy shores, sunk more or less deeply in the sand, with their shell placed in a vertical position. According to some Naturalists, the animal can leave its shell at pleasure; but this does not appear to be the case, as they seem to be distinctly attached to the hinder end of the shell, by a muscle similar to the other Mollusca.

This genus is divided by Linnæus and Lamarck into sections according to the surface of the tube. The most remarkable species are,

1. Dentalium Elephantinum, shell large, green, slightly incurved, with ten longitudinal elevated ribs. Argenville, Conch. t. iii. f. 4; Martini Conch. t. i. f. 44 and 51. Inhabiting the Indian Ocean.

2. Dentalium Entalis, Lin. Shell nearly cylindrical, smooth, white. Gaultieri Ind. Test. Conchol. t. 10, f. 2. Inhabiting the British Channel.

There appears to be much to be learnt respecting the animals of this genus. The Dentalium Eburnea of Linnæus, which is an inhabitant of the British Seas, is furnished with a distinct slit at the side of the hinder aperture; and in D. labiatum of Turton, the end is extended into a spoon-shaped appendage, the animals of both of which are entirely unknown.

DENTARIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Tetradynamia, order Siliquosa, natural order Cruciferæ. Generic character: calyx four-leaved, cohering; corolla, petals four, with claws as long as the calyx; nectary, four glands at the base of the germen; germen oblong, the length of the stamens; pod long, round, with two elastic valves, which burst when ripe and roll back.

Seven species, mostly natives of Europe. D. bulbifera is a native of England. Eng. Bot.

DENTELLA, in Botany, a genus of the class Pentandria, order Monogynia. Generic character: calyx five-parted, superior; corolla funnel-shaped, petals three, toothed; capsule two-celled, many-seeded.

One species, D. repens, a native of the East Indies. Persoon.

DENTEX, from the Lat. dens, a tooth, Cuv. In Zoology, a genus of animals belonging to the family Percoides, order Acanthopterygii, class Pisces.

Generic character. The jaws furnished in front with large long-hooked teeth, and on the sides with conical teeth; behind the front teeth are small teeth arranged in tufts.

This genus has been separated by Cuvier from the Spari, on account of the difference in the form of the teeth; he enumerates five certain species, and several others which are uncertain. They are for the most part natives of the seas of hot climates. See Cuvier, Règne Animal.

DENTIDIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Didynamia, order Gymnospermia. Generic character: calyx five-cleft, three superior segments obtuse, toothed; two inferior, awl-shaped; superior lip of the corolla short, four-cleft; inferior lip entire.

One species, D. Nankinensis, a native of Nankin, in China. Loureiro.

DENTIL, Dens, a tooth, in Architecture, an ornament in cornices of a dentiform or toothed shape. Vitruvius (ii. 2, iv. 2) confines them to the Ionic Order, but this rule was by no means observed by the Roman Architects. In general they are so disposed that the axis of the column passes through the centre of a Dentil. The proportions assigned by Vitruvius are, height = the middle fascia of the architrave, projection = height, width = $\frac{1}{2}$ height, interval between them = $\frac{2}{3}$ of height.

DENTIROSTRES, in Zoology, one of the families of the order Passeres.

DENTI'SE, DENTI'TION, DE'NTIST, DE'NTAL, n. DE'NTAL, adj. DE'NTATE, DENTA'TION, DE'NTIFRICE, DENTICULA'TION. } Lat. dens, a tooth, q. edens, eating, that which eateth. To tooth, to have teeth. Dentifrice; dentes fricare, to rub the teeth. For the technical usage of Dentate, see the Examples from Paley.

They tell a tale of the old Countesse of Desmonds, who lived till she was sevenscore yeares old, that she did dentise twice, or thrice; casting her old teeth, and others comming in their place.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 8. sec. 755.

It causes dentition in so regular a manner, and that not only in infants, but also adult persons.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 167.

Sem. Is this gray poulder, a good dentifrice?
Ful. You see I use it.
Sem. I have one that is whiter. Ben Jonson. Catiline, act ii.

The ashes of the ankle bones of a female goat whiles it is fresh and new, are counted an excellent dentifrice to whiten the teeth.
Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. fol. 327.

DENTISE. — DENULL.

He omits the denticulation of the edges of the bill, or those small oblique incisions made for the better retention of the prey.
Grew. Museum.

Take mastic and dragon's blood, of each a sufficient quantity: powder them, and mix them together, and let the patient use them as a dentifrice. Boyle, vol. v. p. 376. Receipts, No. 9.

Next came different classes of dentals, and among the first of them should be placed the sibilants, which most nations express by an indented figure.
Sir William Jones, vol. iii. p. 267. On the Orthography of Asiatic Words.

Each of the dental sounds is hard or soft, sharp or obtuse, and by thrusting the tip of the tongue between the teeth, we form two sounds exceedingly common in Arabic and English, but changed into lisping sibilants by the Persians and French. Id. Ib.

They are what naturalists call serrated or dentated bills; the inside of them, towards the edge, being thickly set with parallel or concentric rows of short, strong, sharp pointed prickles. These though they should be called teeth, are not for the purpose of mastication. They form a filter.
Paley. Natural Theology, ch. xii. Comparative Anatomy.

Should it be said, that, by continual endeavours to shoot out the tongue to the stretch, the woodpecker's species may by degrees have lengthened the organ itself, beyond that of other birds, what account can be given of its form, of its tip? how in particular did it get its barb, its dentation.
Id. Natural Philosophy, ch. xiii. Peculiar Organizations.

A kind dentist restored my spirits, by declaring that he was possessed of an art which would prevent all bad consequences, and continue the beauty of my pearly ornaments, set between rubies (for so he expressed himself) unsullied during life.
Knox. Works, vol. ii. p. 573. Winter Evenings, even. 58.

DENU'DE, DENU'DATE, DENUDA'TION. Fr. denuer; Lat. denud-are; de, and nudare, to strip or lay bare. Nudus quasi ne dutus, that is non indutus, not covered or clothed. Gr. δύ-ειν, induere, to put on, cover or clothe.

To strip off the covering or clothing; to lay bare or naked.

Denude occurs in Chaucer in a passage not very intelligible.

——— And whereby is ment
This foresaide prouerbe and similitude
But thou thou ridde thee plainly to denude.
Chaucer. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 323.

For his colour, my pains and your trouble I'll spare,
For the creature was wholly denuded of hair.
Cotton. A Voyage to Ireland in Burlesque.

Desiring to compleate my charge in all points, and to denude this offending liberty of her most potent patronages, it is requisite to impeach some circumstances, as guilty of great aggravations in these offences.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 12. sec. 3.

Victor Utiscensis tells us, That when Dionisia, a noble matron, was immodestly denudated and barbarously scourged, with a courage beyond her sex, and in the midst of bloud she told her tormentors, that what they intended for her shame should hereafter be her glory. Feltham. Resolve 11.

And we may consequently, with much ease, bear the disfurniture of such transitorie movables, as were rather ornaments then materials of our fabrick; considering that this denudation may prove the greatest beautifying of our spiritual edifice.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 8. part ii. sec. 3.

If in summer time you denude a vine of its leaves the grapes will never come to maturity.
Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 120.

DENULL, used by Fabyan as Annull, q. v.

But after the deth of Kinge Edwarde that banysshemente was soone denulled by Edwarde his soone, whereof ensuyd moche harme and trouble as after shall be shewed.
Fabyan, Anno 1300.

DENUNCIATION, see DENOUNCE

DENY', DENI'ABLE, DENI'AL, DENI'ANCE, DENI'ER, DENY'ING. Fr. denier; Sp. denegar; Lat. denegare; de, ne, and agere, q.d. Be it not. Let it not be done. See DENAY. To refuse, to contradict, to disown.

It myght not be denied, for þing þat mot betide.
R. Brunne, p. 249.

And anoon the cok eftsoones crew: and Petir bethoughte on the word that Jhesus hadde seide to him bifore the cok crowe twyes, thries thou schalt denye me, and he began to wepe.
Wiclif. Mark, ch. xiv.

I woll in no wise, saith Daungere
Deny, that ye haue asked here
It were to great vncurtesie.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 133.

And there vpon goth he so farforth, that no Scripture can be euident to proue any thing that he lyst to deny.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 161. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

The womā was not weryed with so many repulses and denyals insomuche that she durst yet drawe nere vnto Jesus, and fallynge downe at hys knees sayde, Succour me.
Udall. Matthew, ch. xv.

As touchyng the article of mariage, to take effect betwene their prince and the Lady Cicilie of England, he knew not the determinat pleasure of ye king his master and brother, either for the affirmaunce or deniāce of the same.
Hall. Edward IV. The twenty-second Yere.

And some of thē let not with lyes and periury to defend thē selfe, and some to stande in defence of their errours or false denying of theyr owne dede, to their gret þril of the fier.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 151. A Dialoguc concerning Heresies.

Arriued there, they passed in forth right;
For still, to all, the gate stood open wide;
Yet charge of them was to a porter hight
Call'd Maluenu, who entrance none denide.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 4.

As if some divine truths, viz. those which are plainly revealed, might not be such, as of necessity were not to be denied, and others for want of sufficient declaration, deniable without danger.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. Ch. part i. ch. iii.

Again, beside the negative of authority; it is also deniable, namely, by way of Aristotle's death.
Sir Thomas Brown, book vii. ch. xiv.

Begin then, sisters of the sacred well,
That from beneath the seat of Jove do spring;
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse.
Milton. Lycidas, 18.

The author of the Epistle of comfort to the Catholicks in prison, printed by authority in the year of the powder treason, is very earnest to persuade his Catholicks not to come to our churches or communicate with us in any part of our Divine service, affrighting them with the strange terriculaments of half Christians, hypocrites, denyers of Christ, in case they joyn'd with us in our liturgy.
Taylor. Sermon 9. part iii.

What is the necessity of doing it, will not so easily be resolved even by him that hath imbibed the assemblers' principles, unless it be to gratify the separatists, who are profest denyers of one article, that of the holy Catholic Church, resolving the end and the effect of the Holy Ghost's descent to have been only to constitute particular congregations, and none else.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 372. A View of the New Directory.

And thus to rack the sacred writings, to force them whether they will or no to bring evidence to our opinions; is an affront to their authority that's next to the denying on't.
Glanville. The Preexistence of Souls, ch. iii.

ENY. — DEO-AND.

As Egypt does not on the clouds rely,
But to the Nile owes more than to the sky;
So, what our earth, and what our heaven, denies,
Our ever constant friend, the sea, supplies.
Waller. To my Lord Protector.

This is that simplicity of conversation which our Saviour requires when he saith, let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay, i. e. you ought to converse with so much sincerity, that your bare affirmation or denial may be sufficient, this being the proper use of speech that men may understand each others minds by their words. Stillingfleet. Sermon 5. vol. ii.

Even among the Jews themselves, the Sadducee (a materialist, and a denyer of the soul's immortality) was as well admitted as the Pharisee; who from the schools of Pythagoras, Plato, and other later philosophers of Greece had learnt to reason upon immaterial substances, and the natural immortality of souls.
Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, vol. iii. ch. ii. p. 77.

That the variation may be found, with a share of accuracy more than sufficient to determine the ship's course, is allowed; but that it can be found so exactly as to fix the longitude within a degree, or sixty miles, I absolutely deny.
Cook. Voyage, vol. v. book i. ch. iii.

The counsel for Woolston was sensible of this difference; and therefore he added, that there are many instances of men's suffering and dying in an obstinate denial of the truth of facts plainly proved.
Sherlock, vol. iv. p. 437. Trial of the Witnesses.

For the fourth council of Lateran, held in the year 1215, and pretended to be a general, and therefore infallible one, after beginning with a creed, of which transubstantiation, then first established, made a part: proceeds, in the third canon, to decree that all deniers of that, or any other of the [pretended] Catholic doctrines, be excommunicated, and punished by the secular arm.
Secker. Works. Sermon 13. vol. v.

DEOBSTRUENT; de, ob, and struere; which Vossius suspects is from στερ-οεῖν, i. e. firmum solidumque reddere; and thus equivalent to the English verb to Build, q. v.

That which destroys obstructions; separates parts closed or blocked up.

At least to answer the physician's scope, where he would employ an emetic, a cathartic, a diaphoretic, a deobstruent, a diuretic, a bezoardic, or cordial medicine.
Boyle. Of the Use of Simple Medicines, sec. 6.

It [tar-water] is useful not only as a pectoral and balsamic, but also as a powerful and safe deobstruent in cachectic and hysteric cases. Berkley. Siris, sec. 6.

DEODAND; Deo dandum. That which ought to be, which must be, given to God.

A man that hath been long in office vnder dyuers of the kynges almoygners, to whome the goodes of such men as kyll themselfe be apoynted by the lawe, and hys office, as deodandes to be geuë in almes.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 285. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

If beside the laws of murther, men have thought fit, out of respect to humane nature, that whatsoeuer else moves to the death of man should be forfeit to pious uses, why should there not as well be deodands for reputation?
Marvell. Works, vol. ii. p. 250.

For love should, like a deodand,
Still fall to th' owner of the land.
Butler. The Lady's Answer to the Knight.

DEODAND, in Law, any personal chattell which is the immediate occasion of death, and which is forfeited to the King to be applied to pious uses, and distributed in alms by his High Almoner, though formerly destined to a more superstitious purpose. The forfeiture of Deodands appears to have originated from the Laws of retribution delivered in the XXIst Chapter of Exodus; and the Deodands were designed by the Romish Church to purchase by propitiatory masses an expiation for the souls of such as were snatched away by untimely death, and given to the King pro animâ Regis et omnium fidelium defunctorum. (Fleta, i. 25.)

DEO-DAND. — DEOPPI-LATE.

The presumed innocency of childhood rendered such atonement unnecessary. No Deodand was therefore due where an infant under the age of discretion was killed by a fall from any thing that was not in motion. If the instrument moves, however, to the death rather of an infant or an adult, it seems clear that it is forfeited as a Deodand. 3 Inst. 57; 1 Hal. P. C. 422. So if an animal of his own motion kill either an infant or an adult, or if a cart run over him, they shall in either case be forfeited as a Deodand. Omnia quæ moveant ad mortem sunt Deodanda. A reason assigned for this is, that such misfortunes are partly owing to the negligence of the owner, and therefore he is properly punished by such forfeiture. When a thing not in motion occasions a man's death, that part only which is the immediate cause is forfeited; but wherever the thing is in motion at the time, not only that part thereof which immediately wounds him, but all things which move together with it are forfeited also. It is of no importance whether the owner is concerned in the death or not; for if a man kill another with a sword, the sword is forfeited; and therefore in all indictments for homicide the instrument of death and the value are prosecuted and found by the Grand Jury, in order that the King may claim the Deodand; for it is no Deodand unless presented as such by a Jury. No Deodands are due for accidents happening on the high seas, that being out of the jurisdiction of the Common Law. Things fixed to the freehold, as a bell hanging in a steeple, a wheel of a mill, &c. unless severed from the freehold are not Deodands. Upon inquisitions of this kind the Jury generally find the value of the Deodand to be as small as possible, and even confine that value, according to the circumstances of the case, to the very thing or part of the thing itself which caused the death; this practice the Courts have impliedly sanctioned, by refusing to reform it in favour of the Crown or its grantee. Foster, on Homicide, 266. Deodands and forfeitures in general, as wrecks, treasure trove, waifs, and estrays, have been constantly granted out by Kings as a royal franchise to particular subjects, as Lords of Manors, and other liberties, to the perversion of their original design.

One of Solon's institutions at Athens appears to have partaken of the principle of our Deodands. If a dog had bitten a man, he was to be delivered up bound to a log four cubits long; an agreeable contrivance, adds Plutarch, who records the custom, (in Solone,) for security against such an animal. This law was adopted into the Roman Twelve Tables. A law of Draco also is mentioned by Demosthenes (cont. Aristocr.) and by Pausanias, (in Atticis,) ordaining the forcible ejectment of any thing inanimate which had been the occasion of death by its fall. Τὰ ἄψυχα ἐάν τίνα ἐμπεσόντα ἀποκτείνῃ ὑπερορίζειν.

DEO'PPILATE, DEO'PPILATION, DEO'PPILATIVE. Fr. "deoppilatif, opening or unstopping obstructions." De, and oppilare; pilare, densare, to thicken, to close or stop.

When for medical uses, we take down the filings of iron or steel, we must not conceive it passeth unaltered from us; for though the grosser parts be excluded again, yet are the dissoluble parts extracted, whereby it becomes effectual in deoppilations.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. xxii.

DEOPPILATE.

Some bodies taken into that of a man are deoppilating, others inciding, resolving, &c.
Boyle. The History of Particular Qualities, ch. i.

DEPAINT.

Indeed I have found them generally to agree in divers of them (as in their being somewhat diaphoretick and very depopilative.)
Id. The Sceptical Chymist, part iii.

As in bezoardicum minerale, skilfully prepared, (for it very seldom is so) the laxative and emetick virulency of the antimony is changed into a diaphoretick, resolving, and deoppilative power.
Id. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, ess. 5. part ii. ch. iii.

DEORDINATION, used as Disorder is; de, and ordinare. Ordo, quasi ὅρον δω, terminum hunc tibi do. I give or fix this bound or limit for you. See COORDAIN and DISORDER.

[The Church of England] being thus clens'd and wash'd, is accus'd by the Roman parties of noveltie, and condemn'd because she refuses to run into the same excess of riot and deordination.
Taylor. Polemical Dis. fol. 312. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. ch. i. sec. 9.

For although the fall of man did neither alter the essential constituents of mankind, nor wholly raze out the engravings of those common notions, sentiments, and rational instincts that were in them; yet it did in a great measure impair and weaken them, and brought in a very great deordination and discomposure, setting up the lower faculties in rebellion against the superior.
Hale. Origin of Mankind, sec. 4. ch. vii. fol. 355.

DEPA'INT, DEPA'INTER, DEPE'INCT. } Fr. depeindre; Lat. depingere; de, and pingere; of uncertain Etymology. J. Scaliger thinks pingere is fingere, withdrawing the aspiration; i. e. exprimere imitatione veram rem; to express a real object by imitation.

To imitate the likeness of any thing, (coloured; to draw, pourtray, describe or delineate.

And whan this Eneas and Achates
Hadden in this temple been ouer all,
Than found they depeinted on a wall
How Troie and all the land destroyed was.
Chaucer. Dido Queene of Carthage, fol. 282.

And all aboue depeinted in a tour
Saw I Conquest, sitting in gret honour,
With thilke sharp swerd over his had
Yhanging by a subtil twined thred.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2058.

Welcum depaynter of the bloomy Medis.
G. Douglas. Prologue of the twelfth Booke of Æneados.

Her armes long in just proportion cast,
Her hands depaint with veins all blue and white.
Vncertaine Auctors. Description and Praise of his Loue.

What should I speak in praise of Surrey's skil
Unlesse I had a thousand tongues at will?
No one is able to depaint at full,
The flowing fountaine of his sacred skull.
Turberville. In Prayse of the Erle of Surrey.

——————— Through great constraint
He made him stoupe perforce vnto his knee,
And doe unwilling worship unto the saint,
That on his shield depainted he did see.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 5.

The reading thereof, in my conceit, will not hinder the rest of your affaires, nor take up any time due thereto, considering that in few words you shall there see the nature of many memorable persons lively described and depainted. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 331.

The red rose medled with the white yfere,
In either cheeke depeincten liuely chere.
Spenser. Shepheard's Calender. April.

I was naturally as much inclined as others, to play with the gilded leaves and outside of my books, and handsomely depaint the letters before I understood the sense.
Boyle, vol. vi. p. 516. Letter from R. Baxter to Mr. Boyle.

DEPA'RT, v.
DEPA'RT, s.
DEPA'RTABLE, adj.
DEPA'RTER,
DEPA'RTING,
DEPA'RTITION,
DEPA'RTMENT,
DEPA'RTMENTAL,
DEPA'RTURE. } Fr. departer; It. departire; Lat. dispartiri, to separate; dis, and partiri, to divide.

To divide or separate, to deal, share or distribute; to part with or give up, to part from or relinquish, to quit, leave, go away.

DEP

Þis folc hem armede anon, and baneres gonne rere,
And departede here ost in twolf partyes þere.
R. Gloucester, p. 18.

Þe folk was mykille & strong, of mete þei had grete nede,
Þam burd [behoved] departe þer þrong, þat lond mot þam not fede.
R. Brunne, p. 188.

Let no kynne consail. ne couetyse zow departe.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 85.

What is hus conysannce quaþ ich. in hus cote armoure
Þre peones in o pensel. quath he dep-table from oþer.
Id. Vision, p. 314.

And thanne I shal knowleche to hem, that I knewe you never, departe awey from me ye that worcken wickednesse.
Wiclif. Matthew, ch. vii.

And aftir that thei hadden crucified him, they departiden his clothis and kisten lott, to fulfil that is seyde bi the prophete seiyage thei departiden to hem my clothis, and on my cloth thei kisten lotte. Id. Ib. ch. xxvii.

For I am sacrifised now, and the tyme of my departyng is nygh.
Id. Tyte, ch. iv.

And oon of the puple seide to him maister seye to my brother that he departe with me the eritage. And he seyde to him, man, who ordeynede me a domesman or a departer on you?
Id. Luke, ch. xii.

This false blasphemour, that charged me
To parten that wol not departed be,
To every man ylike, with meschance.
Chaucer. The Sompnoures Tale, v. 7821.

The same law yᵗ ioyneth by wedlocke without forsaking, the same law yeueth libell of departicion bicause of diuerce, both demed and declared. Id. The Testament of Loue, fol. 309.

The sonnes thre, of whiche I tolde,
Right after that hem selfe wolde,
This worlde departe they begonne.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 144.

And wolde not departe hym fro
Suche loue was betwene hem two.
Id. Ib. book viii. fol. 189.

And doubtlesse this departyng asyde into a place solitarie, was not bestowed vpon fonde sensuall pleasures or on slepe: but vpon a quietnesse to praie and geue thankes to God.
Udall. Luke, ch. ix.

And at their departure was shot off all the ordinance of the ship, and about nine of the clocke at night the same day they weyed anker, and departed with their ship from Astracan.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Christopher Burrough.

Which when she saw, she left her locks vndight,
And running to her boat withouten ore,
From the departing land it launched light,
And after them did driue with all her power and might.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 12.

PHIL. Mary indeed you, maister Doctor, put me in good remembrance of the meaning of Saint Paul in that place, for apostasie is properlie a departing from the faith, and therefore commeth apostata, which properlie signifieth one that departeth from his faith.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 1635. The fourth Examination of Mr. John Philpot.

But that lewd louer did the most lament
For her depart, that euer man did hear,
He knockt his breast with desperate intent,
And scratcht his face, and with his teeth did tear
His rugged flesh, and rent his ragged heare.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 7.

ART. — AU-ATE.

It hath been subtilly, and indeed truly noted, that our sight is not well contented with those sudden departments from one extream to another. Therefore let them have rather a duskish tincture, than an absolute black. Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 61.

My lord being in the gallery of my ship, at my departure, I remember your honour took me by the hand, and said you would request one thing of me, which was, that whether I made a good voyage or a bad, I should not fail, but to return again into England: which I then promised you, and gave you my faith I would; and so I have.

State Trials. The Trial of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Although when the divine providence does itself offer us a just occasion of leaving this world, (as when a man chooses to suffer death rather than commit wickedness) a wise man will then indeed depart joyfully, as out of a place of sorrow and darkness into light; yet he will not be in such haste as to break his prison contrary to law; but will go when God calls him, as a prisoner when dismissed by the magistrate or lawful power.

Clarke. On the Attributes, p. 211.

We, who are priests of Apollo, have not the inspiration when we please; but must wait till the God comes rushing on us, and invades us with a fury which we are not able to resist; which gives us double strength while the fit continues, and leaves us languishing and spent at its departure.

Dryden. To the Right Honourable the Earl of Abingdon.

But Mr. Locke ascribes the change of action solely to uneasiness, and the continuance of it to satisfaction; it behoves me then to give my reason for departing from so great an authority.

Search. Light of Nature, vol. i. p. 112. Satisfaction, ch. vi.

In order to resume that character, let him consider what virtues his department of life particularly requires. He will find them to be industry, honesty, and frugality.

Knox. Essays, vol. i. p. 44. No. 8.

M. de la Tour du Pin, on the fourth of last June, comes to give an account of the state of his department, as it exists under the auspices of the national assembly.

Burke. Reflections on the Revolution in France.

The game played by the revolutionists in 1789, with respect to the French guards of the unhappy king, was now played against the departmental guards, called together for the protection of the revolutionists.

Id. Preface to M. Brissot's Address to his Constituents.

This is a picture drawn from life: what it represents often occurs: and the whole of it is occasioned by the merchant's departure from his natural and his most becoming character.

Knox. Works, vol. i. p. 44. Essays, No. 8.

DEPASTURE; depascere, astum; de, and pascere, to feed. Gr. νέμω.

To feed upon, to eat, to browze or graze upon.

Earth, like the patient was, whose lively blood
Hath overcome at last some sickness strong,
Whose feeble limmes had been the bait and food,
Whereon his strange disease depastred long,
But now restor'd, in health and welfare stood
As sound as earst, as fresh, as faire, as young.

Fairfax. Godfrey of Boulogne, book xiv. st. 79.

And thus, if a horse be delivered either to an agisting farmer for the purpose of depasturing in his meadows, or to an hostler to be dressed and fed in his stable, the bailees are answerable for the loss of the horse, if it be occasioned by the ordinary neglect of themselves or their servants.

Sir William Jones. Works, vol. viii. p. 421. The Law of Bailments.

DEPATRIATE; de, and patria, his country.

To go from, to quit his country.

I fear, sir, here you beg the question.
A subject born in any state
May, if he pleases, depatriate,
And go, for reasons weak or weighty
To Zeeland-new, or Otaheite.

Mason. The Dean and the Squire.

DEPAUPERATE; depauperare, atum; de, and pauper, poor.

To impoverish.

DEPAUPERATE. — DEPEND

And because the residence of this blessed poverty is the mind, it followes, that it be here understood, that all that examination and renunciation, abjection and humility of mind, which depauperates the spirit, making it less worldly, and more spiritual, is the duty here enjoyned.

Taylor. Life of Christ, part ii. sec. 12.

DEPEACH, Skinner says, absolvere, (i. e. to acquit, to discharge,) from the Fr. despescher. See DESPATCH.

They shall be forthwith heard as soon as the party which they shal find before our justices shall be depeached, which party being heard forthwith, and as soone as may be, the said English merchants shall be ridde and dispatched.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Emperour's Privilege, vol. i. fol. 267.

DEPECULATION; peculari, whence depeculari, (to plunder,) is from pecus. Vossius says, Peculari is properly applied to public theft, though it may be extended more widely. See PECULATE.

Also robbery, and depeculation of the public treasure or revenues, is a greater crime than the robbing or defrauding of a private man; because to rob the public, is to rob many at once.

Hobbes. Of Commonwealth, ch. xxvii.

DEPE'ND, DEPE'NDANCE, DEPE'NDANCY, DEPE'NDANT, DEPE'NDENCE, DEPE'NDENCY, DEPE'NDENT, DEPE'NDENTLY, DEPE'NDER, DEPE'NDING, DEPE'NDINGLY.

Fr. dependre; Sp. depender; It. dependere; Lat. dependere; (de, and pendere,) to hang from.

To hang down, to rest, to repose, to rely upon in a hanging position; to rest, to repose or rely upon, generally; and thus, met. to trust to, to confide in.

To rely upon; to have as a support; and thus, to be connected with as an inferior, to be subordinate, subservient or subject to.

To hang, sc. upon the balance, under examination; investigation, trial; and thus, to be undetermined, undecided.

Archdeacon Nares, (Gloss. ad v.) gives several instances from our elder Dramatists, in which Dependance or Dependency, is used for the subject of a quarrel, i. e. the affair depending. See in V. CARTEL, (ante,) from Ben Jonson. See also Gifford's Note thereon, and his Massinger, vol. iii. p. 9.

And now the cause driuen is so far
Sodainly peace, either hasty war
Mot follow anon, for the fatall chance
Of life and death dependeth in balance.

Lidgate. The Story of Thebes, part iii. fol. 389.

And hereby ye see that it is a playne and an euident conclusio as bright as the sunne shynyng that the truth of God's word dependeth not of the truth of the congregation.

Tyndall. Workes, fol. 268. Answer to Sir Thomas More's Dialogue.

Not that I would be thought by any one to depend on my own merits, which I absolutely discard, but I place my entire trust and dependance in the atonement of my Saviour's blood.

State Trials. Trial of Sir Christopher Blunt.

And we would the aske him such questions further either of heldinge of God's hande over them, or withdrawing hys hande of help from them, with other diuerse dependauntes therupon, which curie learned manne may soone fynd oute himself & almost vnlearned to.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 594. The second Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

The Frenchemen in their treatie demaunded to haue Calays beaten downe, and to haue the sygnorie of Guysnes Hammes, Marke, and Oye, and all the landes of Froyten, and the dependantes of Guysnes vnto the lymyttes of the water of Graueleyng.

Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. ch. 177.

DEPEND. Consider nowe that of hys electes, whiche is of hys woordes muche adoe to perceiue, they be so dark and so intriked of purpose withoute any dependence or order, yet in the ende when all is gathered together and aduysed well, thys is the whole summe, that God chooseth a certayne whom he lyketh.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 611. The first Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

The high and mightie Prince Homfrey, Duke of Gloucester, agreed him to put and putteth all maner matters and quarrelles indeede, with all their incidentez, cyrcumstaunces, dependentes, and connexes, that touchen hym and hys persone.

Hall. Henry VI. The fourth Yere.

Then let your hopes on those sure joys depend,
Which live and grow by death, and waste not when they spend.

P. Fletcher. Eliza. An Elegy.

Which made me indeed find in myself such a kind of depending upon him, as without him I found a weakness, and a mistrustfulness of myself. Sidney. Arcadia, book ii.

Sanctify him in his authority and sovereignty, by calling upon him in obedience to his command and will, who hath commanded it, by acknowledgment of thy dependence upon him.

Hall. Cont. vol. ii. p. 195. On the Lord's Prayer.

When here he adds, and we by him; this imports their being a chosen generation, a peculiar people to God, the chosen of God out of all things else: and his being a peculiar special founder unto them of a super creation-state, and a dependancy upon him for the whole of it, as he is Jesus Christ the Lord.

Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 169.

Unity which the fathers press so often, they make to be dependant on the bishop.

Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 149. Episcopacy Asserted, sec. 46.

So to strengthen his party, he was made known to the Duke, and by means of a dependant on his grace he got a letter from the king. State Trials. The Case of Archbishop Abbot, &c.

Having no relation to, or dependence upon the court, he [Sir Henry Slingsby] was sway'd only by his conscience to detest the violent and undutiful behaviour of that parliament.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. iii. part ii. p. 623.

If we make a farther advance and progression into the reason of philosophy, it will leade the mind up to religion, as it shows the congruous dependency and subordination of all causes of divine providence.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 16. sec. 1.

Nor didst thou feel their drought, their pangs, their qualms,
Their rack in writing, who do write for alms,
Whose wretched genius, and dependent fires
But to their benefactors' dole aspires.

Cartwright. Upon the Dramatick Poems of Mr. John Fletcher.

But yet the parliament of 1 H. IV. c. 3, 4. repealed this parliament of 21 R. II. with all its circumstances and dependents.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty of Papists, part i. fol. 32.

The absolute stoical depender on fate may starve for want of industry, die for want of physick, and be damned for want of repentance.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 87. A Practical Catechism.

Delay is bad, doubt worse, depending worst;
Each best day of our life escapes us first.

Jonson. Epigramme 70. To William Roe.

If thou givest me this day supplies beyond the expense of this day, I will use it thankfully, and nevertheless dependingly; for I will renew my petition for my daily bread still.

Hall. Cont. vol. ii. p. 243. On the Lord's Prayer.

As heaven with stars, the roof with jewels glows,
And ever living lamps depend in rows.

Pope. Temple of Fame.

Then, since those forms begin, and have their end,
On some unalter'd cause they sure depend:
Parts of the whole are we; but God the whole;
Who gave us life and animating soul.

Dryden. Palamon and Arcite.

Dark as a cloud they make a wheeling flight,
Then on a neighbouring tree, descending, light;
Like a large cluster of black grapes they show,
And make a large dependance from the bough.

Id. Virgil. Georgic 4.

What freeborn man, who, though of mungrel strain, DEP
Wou'd twice support the scorn and proud disdain
With which those idols you adore, the great, I
Their wretched vassals and dependants treat? PE

Dryden. Juvenal. Satire 5.

His followers afterward so understood and explained it, as if, by the creation of the world, was not to be understood a creation in time; but only an order of nature. Causality and dependence: that is, that the will of God, and his power of acting, being necessarily as eternal as his essence, the effects of that will and power might be supposed coeval to the will and power themselves.

Clarke. On the Attributes.

It is also natural and can hardly be otherwise, but that the bishop of a chief city, finding himself to exceed in wealth, in power, in advantages of friendships, dependencies, &c. should not affect to raise himself above the level: it is an ambition, that easily will seize on the most moderate, and otherwise religious minds.

Barrow. Works, vol. i. part ii. fol. 159. Of the Pope's Supremacy.

But to their prince a courser was assign'd,
Of matchless spirit and superior kind.
The bounding steed a lion's spoils enfold,
With paws dependent, sheath'd in shining gold.

Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book viii.

Well, but to this it is objected, that these witnesses we speak of, were all of them Christ's friends, and followers and dependents.

Sharp. Sermon 8. vol. ii.

Yet, though I always have my will,
I'm but a mere depender still;
An humble hanger on at best,
Of whom all people make a jest.

Swift. Riddle the Fourth.

Eternity, depending on an hour,
Makes serious thought man's wisdom, joy, and praise.

Young. The Complaint. Night 8.

We behold (and it seems some people rejoice in beholding) our native land, which used to sit the envied arbiter of all her neighbours, reduced to a servile dependance on their mercy.

Burke. Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol.

No regal pageant deck'd with casual honours,
Scorn'd by his subjects, trampled by his foes,
No feeble tyrant of a petty state,
Courts thee to shake on a dependant throne.

Johnson. Irene, act ii. sc. 2.

It is precisely the same, whether the ministers of the crown can disqualify by a dependent house of commons, or by a dependent court of star chamber, or by a dependent court of king's bench.

Burke. Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents.

For if they once quit this natural, rational, and liberal obedience, having deserted the only proper foundation of their power, they must seek a support in an abject and unnatural dependence somewhere else. Id. Ib.

There are many subjects which, though very interesting to the reader, would make no figure in representation: such are those subjects which consist in any long series of action, the parts of which have very much dependency each on the other.

Sir Joshua Reynolds. Commentary on Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting. Note 10.

If we affirm absolutely, we use the indicative or declarative mood; if relatively, conditionally, or dependently on something else, it is the subjunctive.

Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, part i. ch. i. sec. 3.

DEPEOPLE, to destroy the people. Lat. depopulari; (de, and populus, people.) To depopulate, q. v.

——— Yet undone the great worke is, all eyes
Must see Achilles in first sight, depeopling enemies,
As well as counsell it in court.

Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book ix. fol. 270.

——— I depeopled it,
Slue all men, and did their wiues remit,
With much spoile taken.

Id. Ib. Odyssey, book ix.

DE'PERDIT, DEPERDI'TELY, DEPERDI'TION. } Fr. deperir; Lat. deperdere, itum; de, and perdere, perhaps from the Gr. πέρθειν, to lay waste or destroy. Any thing lost, destroyed, ruined.

Our bodies may be said to be daily repaired by new sustenance, which begets new blood, and consequently new spirits, new humours, and I may say new flesh, the old by continual deperdition and insensible transpirations evaporating still out of us, and giving way to flesh.

Howell. Letter 31. book i. sec. 1.

Wine, and even water has been, not only by Helmont, but by divers other physicians, observed to be enriched, [with wormes] after a quantity of quicksilver has been for some hours shaken in it, though without any sensible deperdition of the substance of the mercury.

Boyle. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5.

The most deperditely wicked of all others, in whom was the root of wickedness. Dean King. Sermon, (1608,) p. 17.

No reason can be given why, if these deperdits ever existed, they have now disappeared. Yet if all possible existences have been tried, they must have formed part of the catalogue.

Paley. Natural Theology, ch. v.

DEPHLE'GM, DEPHLE'GMATE, DEPHLEGMA'TION, DEPHLE'GMEDNESS. } Gr. φλέγμα, from φλέγ-ειν, to burn. Vossius thinks, not so called because it is per se igneum, but because per accidens causet febres. "For," he adds, "a sharp and salt phlegm is the fountain of all such diseases as are produced by a defluxion of humours; as Plato says in Timæus."

To clear or purify from phlegm, in Chymistry, to free from pituitous, aqueous or watery parts.

We found that the oil that was wont to swim upon spirit of wine, not freed from its aqueous parts, did readily sink, and quietly lie in the bottom of that, which was carefully dephlegmed.

Boyle. Of Unsucceeding Experiments, vol. i. p. 349.

Our favourable thoughts of that expert chymist making us think it possible, that the spirits we employed had not been sufficiently exalted, we dephlegmated some by more frequent, and indeed tedious rectifications.

Id. Of the Unsuccessfulness of Experiments, vol. i. fol. 329.

In many bodies the parts desired by the artists being the sulphureous ones, the menstruum is the better for an exquisite dephlegmation. Id. Ib. p. 332.

And let me on this occasion advertise you, Pyrophilus, that in divers cases it is not enough to separate the aqueous parts by dephlegmation, as many chemists content themselves to do.

Id. Ib. p. 321.

Fifthly, that the proportion betwixt the coralline solution and the spirit of wine depends so much upon the strength of the former liquor, and the dephlegmedness of the latter, that it is scarce possible to determine generally and exactly, what quantity of each ought to be taken.

Id. The History of Firmness, vol. i. p. 442.

DEPI'CT, DEPI'CTURE. } Depingere, depictum; to imitate the likeness of any thing; to draw, pourtray, describe or delineate. Speed distinguishes depict, and depaint.

I remember he [Simon Steward, Mil.] lived (after he was knighted,) a fellow-commoner in Trinity-hall, where these his armes are fairly depicted in his chamber.

Fuller. Worthies. Cambridgeshire.

Wherein is the malice? in adding to the narration, pictures (sc. the prints in Fox's Martyrs,) also of the fact, so to moue hatred to Monkes, and their religion, whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that religion, were the very first, who not onely so depictured, but also liuely and richly depainted it in their goodliest manuscripts. Speed. King John, book ix. ch. viii. sec. 62.

Why the man has a perception of sound which the drum has not, or an idea of figure depicted on the chorŏides or retina of the eye, (whichever of them be the seat of vision,) which the camera has not; in other words, how perception is excited from material impulse, must ever, I think, exceed the apprehension of human intellect.

Anecdotes of the Life of Bishop Watson, vol. ii. p. 401.

DEPICT. — DEPLORE

I next mounted through a large painted staircase, where several persons were depictured in caricature.

Fielding. A Journey from this World to the Next.

DEPILA'TION, DE'PILATORY, DE'PILATOUS. } Depilare; de, and pilus, hair. To take away, strip off or destroy the hair. "Fr. depile; bauld, bare or bared of hair." Cotgrave.

Depilation is used by Dryden, in his translation of Persius, Sat. 4.

The crocodiles have a certaine fat in them which is depilatorie; for no sooner is the haire rubbed therewith, but presently it sheddeth. Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. fol. 315.

The same depilatorie effect, the ashes of horse-leeches are supposed to have, if they be reduced into a liniment with vinegre, and used accordingly. Id. Ib. fol. 439.

This animal [the Salimander] is a kind of lizard, a quadruped corticated and depilous, that is, without wool, fur, or hair.

Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. xiv.

DEPILATORIES are medicines very hazardous in their application, and chiefly composed of quicklime or orpiment.

DEPLICATION; de, and plicare, Gr. πλέκ-ειν, to knit, twist, fold. "Fr. deplicer; to unplait or unfold, to undo the plaits, to open the folds of." Cotgrave.

Unplaiting, unfolding, untwisting.

For which effect there needeth onely an unfolding and deplication of the inside of this order, to shew it is not so asperous and thorny as our nature apprehendeth it by the first glances that light upon it.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 15. sec. 3.

DEPLO'RE, DEPLO'RABLE, DEPLO'RABLENESS, DEPLO'RABLY, DEPLO'RATE, DEPLORA'TION, DEPLO'REDLY, DEPLO'REDNESS, DEPLO'REMENT, DEPLO'RER. } Fr. deplorer; Sp. deplorar; It. and Lat. deplorare; de, and plorare: distinguished from lacrymare, in degree. Lacrimandum est non plorandum. Seneca, Ep. 63. Lucilio. To weep for, bewail, bemoan, mourn, lament.

The same day [the two and twentieth day of January, 1596] Sir Francis Drake our general departed this life, whose death was exceedingly deplored; his interment was after this manner; his corps being laid in a cophin of lead, he was let down into the sea, the trumpets in dolefull manner echoing out this lamentation for so great a losse, and all the cannons of the fleet were discharged according to the custome of all sea funerall obsequies.

Sir Francis Drake. West Indian Voyage, fol. 58.

He who against thee does inveigh,
Never yet knew where beauty lay,
And does betray
A deplorable want of sense,
Blindness, or age, or impotence.

Cotton. Pindaric Ode. Beauty.

To discern the sadness, and deplorableness of this estate, I shall need give you no sharper character of it, than only this, that 'tis a condition that forceth God to forsake us in meer mercy, to give over all thoughts of kindness to us, and that the only degree of kindness left, whereof we are capable.

Hammond. Works. Sermon 10. vol. iv.

Which way of proof is most proper, and suitable to the course of the text; which hath recourse to an exemplary instance of election, continued in age, as deplorate as whatever in the Old Testament. Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part iv. fol. 24.

But seeing it now evident and certain, that my [Qu. Elizabeth] safety without her [Qu. Mary] destruction, is in a more deplorate estate, I am most grievously affected with inward sorrow.

Baker. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1586.

DEPLORE — DE-PLUME.

He will leaue to those her beneficiaries the farther search of this argument, and deploration of her fortune.
Speed. Henrie VII. book ix. ch. xx. sec. 16.

The states lie still and close oppressed with the adversities of the last year; and with nothing more than the late ruine of forty well laden ships by the Texel, wherein with depleration of the whole province were lost one thousand mariners.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 474.

To be deploredly old, and affectedly young, is not only a great folly, but a gross deformity!
Taylor. Artificial Handsomeness, p. 72.

But for thee, O blessed Jesu, so ardent was thy love to us, that it was not in the power of our extreme misery to abate it, yea so, as that the deploredness of our condition did but highten that holy flame.
Hall. Works, vol. iii. fol. 616. A Pathetical Meditation, sec. 2.

Home when she came, her secret woe she vents,
And fills the palace with her loud laments;
Those loud laments her echoing maids restore,
And Hector, yet alive, as dead deplore.
Dryden. Homer. Iliad, book vi.

After this, I have in the fire, the most deplorable, but with all the greatest argument that can be imagined; the destruction being so swift, so sudden, so vast and miserable, as nothing can parallel in story.
Dryden. To the Honourable Sir Robert Howard.

It has been more than sufficiently proved from thence [Scripture] already, how deplorably unable the heart of man is, not only to conquer, but even to contend with the difficulties of a spiritual course, without a steady view of such promises as may supply new life, spirit, and vigour to its obedience.
South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 218.

I was the more invited not to be a mere spectator, or a lazy deplorer of the danger I saw religion in, because it seemed not unlikely, that philosophical infidels, as they would be thought, would be less tractable to divines, though never so good humanists and antiquaries, than to a person that reasons with them upon their own grounds, and discourses with them in their own way.
Boyle. Works, vol. iv. p. 153. Preface to a Discourse about the possibility of the Resurrection.

So that bating those few barbarians, whose superstition and malice brought her to that condition, all the other spectators of her sufferings were deplorers of them too.
Id. Ib. vol. v. p. 309. The Martyrdom of Theodora.

Aristides, in a discourse which he addresses to the people of Smyrna, to congratulate their re-establishment, says, that their calamity had been deplored by all the inhabitants of Greece and Asia, as a distress common to them.
Jortin. Works, vol. ii. p. 82. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

This deplorable scene admits of but one addition,—that we are governed by councils, from which a reasonable man can expect no remedy but poison; no relief but death.
Junius. Letter 1.

The editions of Greek and Latin classics produced within these few years from the English press, are deplorably incorrect, and seem to indicate a declension of an art which has afforded light, and given honour to empires.
Knox. Works, vol. ii. p. 83. Essays, No. 134.

DEPLOY, a word adopted like many others into our Military language, from the French deployer, deplicare, to unfold. A column is said to deploy or make a flank march, when it unfolds itself so as to extend its front.

DEPLUME; Lat. de, and pluma, a feather. To strip off the feathers.

And with hir beik deplumand on all sydis,
The licht downis up to the skyis glydis.
Douglas. Æneados, book xi.

Such a person is like Homer's bird, deplumes himself to feather all the naked callows that he sees.
Taylor. Sermon 15. part ii.

DEPO'NE, DEPO'NENT, DEPO'NER. } The Scotch use, to depone; the English, to depose. See DEPOSE. A deponent, one who gives evidence, bears witness or testimony; so called, says Skinner, because the witness depones, (deponit,) places his hand upon the Book of the Holy Evangelists, while he is bound by the obligation of an oath.

Fyrste the sayde deponent sayeth, that on Saturdaye, the seconde daye of December, Anno M. D. xiiii. he toke the charge of the pryson at foure of the clocke at afternone by the commaundemente of master Chauncellor.
Hall. Henry VIII. The sixth Yere.

And farther, Sprot deponeth, that he entered himself thereafter in conference with Bour, and demanded what was done betwixt the laird and the Earl of Gowrie.
State Trials. Trial of George Sprot.

Whereupon he began to read: and before he had ended it, he said to the deponer, Mr. John, I intreat you heartily that I may have this paper to Naughtoun, that I may read it, and consider it at leisure.
Id. The Trial of Lord Balmerino.

Item, this deponent being demanded by the said Margery what she did euery daie at church, she answered that she kneeled down and said 5 Pater nosters, in worshippe of the crucifix, and as manie Aue Maries, in worshipp of our Ladie.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 610. The Story of Margery Backster.

The pleader, having spoke his best,
Had witness ready to attest,
Who fairly could on oath depose,
When question on the fact arose,
That every article was true;
No further these deponents knew.
Swift. Cadenus and Vanessa.

The verbs called deponent, desiderative, frequentative, inceptive, &c. need not to be considered here, being found in some languages only, and therefore not essential to speech.
Beattie. Moral Science, vol. i. part i. ch. i. sec. 3.

DEPO'PULATE, v. DEPO'PULATE, adj. DEPOPULA'TION, DEPOPULA'TER, DEPO'PULACY. } Sp. despoblar; It. dispopolare; Fr. depopuler; Lat. depopulare, to de-people. "To unpeople or dispeople, to waste, ravage, ruin or destroy." Cotgrave. See DEPEOPLE.

So that the Jewes were euer ouerrunne and depopulated of both the hostes, now of the Egyptians, and then of the Assyrians and Grekis.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. xi.

And so in that realme were continually two kynges, vntyll the kynge of Mede had depopulate the countrey, and brought the people in captiuytie to the citie of Babylon.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i. ch. ii.

O poore and miserable citie, what sondry tormẽtes, excisions, subuertions, depopulations, and other euyll aduentures hath happened vnto the, sens thou were byreft of that noble courte of Sapience.
Id. Ib. book iii. ch. xxii.

By which means the year ensuing, he with Edrick the traytor passing the Thames at Creclad, about Twelftide, enter'd into Mercia, and especially Warwickshire, depopulating all places in their way.
Milton. Prose Works, vol. ii. fol. 104. The History of England, book iv.

It might reasonably be concluded that this wild and barbarous depopulation, would even extirpate all that learning, religion and loyalty, which had so eminently flourished there; and that the succeeding ill husbandry, and unskilful cultivation, would have made it fruitful only in ignorance, prophanation, atheism and rebellion; but by God's wonderful blessing, the goodness and richness of the soil, could not be made barren by all that stupidity and negligence.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. iii. part i. p. 74.

The persons agreeing in this one mischief, are of divers sorts and humours; 1st, meddling and busy persons, who love popular speeches: 2. covetous landlords, inclosers, depopulators, &c.
State Trials. Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham.

EPO-LATE. — PORT.

Mars answered; O Joue; neither she nor I
(With both our aides) can keep depopulacie
From off the Froggs.
Chapman. Homer. Batrachomyomachia.

So two young mountain lions, nurs'd with blood,
In deep recesses of the gloomy wood,
Rush fearless to the plains, and uncontrol'd
Depopulate the stalls, and waste the fold.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, book v.

Each man, being a sovereign in his own family, has the same interest with regard to it, as the prince with regard to the state; and has not, like the prince, any opposite motives of ambition or vain-glory, which may lead him to depopulate his little sovereignty.
Hume. Essays, vol. i. part ii. ess. 11. Populousness of Ancient Nations.

But Plutarch says, that the general depopulation had been more sensibly felt in Greece than any other country. How is this reconcileable to its superior privileges and advantages?
Id. Ib.

DEPO'RT, v. } Fr. deporter; Lat. deportare;
DEPO'RT, n. } (de, and portare,) to bear or carry
DEPORTA'TION, } away.
DEPO'RTMENT. } To bear or carry,—applied to the bearing, carriage, conduct or behaviour.

To bear or carry away; sc. to a place of exile or banishment; and thus, to exile or banish.

The third consideration should be, how a man may bee valued, and may depart himselfe as he is compared with his equals and rivals.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book viii. ch. ii.

No assurance of better dealing then was used to the deported House of Saxe, by a better emperour than this accounted.
Cabbala, fol. 334. Sir Dudley Carleton to the Duke.

——— Like a wood-nymph light,
Oread or Dryad, or of Delia's traine
Betook her to the groves, but Delia's self
In gait surpass'd and goddess-like deport.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book iv. l. 309.

——— At last
Of middle age one rising, eminent
In wise deport spake much of right and wrong,
Of justice, of religion, truth and peace,
And judgment from above.
Id. Ib. book xi. l. 666.

The Jews are miserably scattered over the world, in that woeful deportation under Jeconiah.
Hall. Cont. Ahasuerus Feasting, &c.

Now where to begin or end this compute, ariseth no small difficulty; for there were three remarkable captivities and deportations of the Jews.
Sir Thomas Brown, book vi. ch. i.

A sinne which sundry fathers have plentifully condemned, as mis-beseeming Christians, whose very outward guestures and deportment ought to be modest, chaste, and holy, as becometh the Gospel of Christ.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act v. sc. 2.

Thus did our Lord deport himself toward his spiteful adversaries, who being reviled, did not revile again; when he suffered, did not threaten, but committed it to him that judgeth righteously.
Barrow. Sermon x. vol. iii.

And if we must take care of our very feet, the lowest part of our body, much more of our hands and eyes, and heads, and all other members of our body, to see that they deport themselves so as to express and manifest our fear and dread of him, before whom we are.
Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 95.

In their deportations, they had often the favour of their conquerors; were permitted by them freely and publicly to exercise their religion, and even to make proselytes, to live under their own laws and customs, and to retain some shadow of their domestic polity and government.
Atterbury. Sermon 5. vol. iii.

Thus from the pattern of our Saviour's deportment, the point of doctrine is this: DEPORT.
The entire resignation of our wills to the disposing will of God, is the indispensable duty of Christians under the sharpest afflictions. DEPOSE.
Bates. Works, vol. ii. p. 142. The Great Duty of Resignation.

Virgil lived in an age of more refinement, and was, perhaps, too much conversant in courtly life, as well as too bashful in his deportment, and delicate in his constitution, to studie the varieties of human nature, where in a monarchy they are most conspicuous; namely, in the middle and lower ranks of mankind.
Beattie. On Truth, part iii. ch. ii.

In the Roman Law, DEPORTATIO was a perpetual banishment to any fixed place, generally in insulam, the Gyaræ, or any similar rock in the Ægean. The criminals under this sentence were deprived of the rights of Citizenship. The punishment was revived under the same name, Deportation, by the French Directorial Government, in 1797; and the sufferings of Barthelemy and Carnot, who themselves had formed part of that body, and their companions in exile to Guiana, are among some of the more striking incidents of this period of turbulence and misery.

DEPORTRAIED; depainted, depictured, pourtrayed, q. v.

Solinus thus delivereth: The country is in part (note that hee makes it not general) inhabited by the people barbarous, who, by artificial forms of incision, haue from their childhood sundry shapes of beasts deportraied in their bodies.
Speed. The more Ciuill Britaines, book v. ch. i. sec. 11.

DEPO'SE, v. } Fr. deposer; Sp. deponer; It. deponere; Lat. deponere, depositum, to put down; de, and ponere, to put, place or fix.
DEPO'SABLE, }
DEPO'SAL, }
DEPO'SER, }
DEPO'SING, }
DEPO'SIT, v. }
DEPO'SIT, n. } To put down, as to depose a King; to put him down from his throne or eminence.
DEPO'SITARY, }
DEPO'SITING, }
DEPOSI'TION, }
DEPO'SITOR, }
DEPO'SITORY, }
DEPO'SITUM, }
DEPO'SITURE. } To put, place or lay, sc. in the hands, custody or power of another, as a pledge or security, in safety, at use, at interest. Now more usually, to deposit.
To depose, or, as the Scotch say, to depone, q. v. to give evidence, bear witness or testimony. So used, because the witness, when sworn to give true evidence, depones or deposes his hand upon the Book of the Holy Evangelists. See DEPONE.

And depose yow for youre pruyde prophecie.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 297.

——— Where many a daie
In sorie plite and poore he laie,
The corone on his head deposed,
Within walles fast enclosed.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 161.

For God, whiche al thyng hath bounded,
And sighe the falsehead of his gyle,
Hath set him but a litell whyle,
That he shall reign vpon depose
For sodeinly right as he rose,
So sodeinly downe he felle.
Id. Ib. book ii. fol. 37.

For thei or that were worse falle,
Through common counseile of hem all
They haue her wrongful kyng deposed.
Id. Ib. book vii. fol. 173.

Peraduenture he may be borne a subiect and after made king, or else he may bee borne a king, and after deposed and made a subject.
Frith. Workes, fol. 17. An Answer against Rastel's Dialogue.

DEPOSE. I answer unto you, that what remaineth be oaths, and those not to rest as proofs unto you, but to be duly examined and fully considered, whether they be true and their deposers of credit.

State Trials. Arraignment of Edmund Campion.

This scisme, as before is towchyd, began by reacon of the deposicion of y^e^ sayd Eugeny at the counsayll of Basile, for that he wolde nat obserue the decree before made in the coũsayll of Cõstaunce, and other causes to hym layde. But yet that deposyng natwithstãdyng, perforse he cõtynued pope by y^e^ terme of xiiii. yeres after. Fabyan, Anno 1548.

And to the intent the commons might be perswaded, that he was an unjust and unprofitable prince, and a tyrant over his subjects, and therefore worthy to be deposed; there were set forth certaine articles (to the number of 32 or 38, as some record,) very hainous to the eares of many. some whereof I have formerly recited, and the residue you may read in Hall, Grafton, Haywood, Trussell, and others.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty, part i. fol. 80.

Their aged syre, thus eased of his crowne,
A private life led in Albania,
With Gonorill, long had in great renowne,
That nought him grieu'd to beene from rule deposed downe.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 10.

So hereafter they shall only be keepers of the great seal, which for title and office, are deposable; but they say the Lord Chancellor's title is indelible.

Howell. Letter 8. book i. sec. 4.

Then through the casement ventur'd so much face
As kings depos'd show, when through gates they peep,
To see deposers to their crowning passe,
But straight shrink back, and at the trumpet weep.

Davenant. Gondibert, book iii. can. 3.

But all other inferiour magistrates, officers, and princes whatsoever are resistible, questionable, censurable, and deposible for their tyranny, wickednesse, and misgovernment by the parliament's censure, as I have proved.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty, part v. fol. 201.

The offence, therefore, wherewith I charge this Talbot, prisoner at the bar, is this in brief and in effect: that he hath maintained and maintaineth under his hand a power in the pope for the deposing and murdering of kings.

State Trials. The Case of William Talbot.

The fear is deposited in conscience, and is begotten and kept by this proposition, that God is a rewarder of all men according to their works.

Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book ii. ch. i. rule 3.

At least, if it have not, it seems your church is not so faithful a guardian of her deposit, as her dear friends (moved by partiality or ends) would make us believe.

Hammond. Works, vol. ii. part i. fol. 677. The Lord Faulkland's Reply.

Whereas it is most manifest by the occasion, and whole contexture, that I mentioned the Scripture, and those, as the safest depositaries of all that faith which was delivered by Christ and his Apostles.

Id. Ib. vol. ii. part ii. fol. 141. An Answer to Schism Disarmed.

I have now gone through your papers and wearied you, and almost myself, yet if what is written prove usefull to you, to the depositing that which I cannot but deem an errour, although I lay no epithet upon it, it will be far from burthenous.

Id. Ib. vol. i. fol. 704.

The influence of princes, upon the depositions of their courts, needs not the deposition of examples, since he hath the authority of a knowne principle.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 9. sec. 2.

For as to his answer to my addition, that if we held these doctrines deposited in the church as zealously as the Romanist, we must hold them as of faith, and that the depository is so trusty, as it cannot deceive us, I reply, &c.

Hammond. Works, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 138. An Answer to Schism Disarmed.

And even the creeds of the Catholick Church, that great depositum, which the Apostles in their several plantations left as a summary of all that was to be believed to our soul's health, and foundation of all Christian practice and reformation.

Id. Ib. vol. i. fol. 538.

The Ægyptians were afraid of fire, not as a Deity, but a devouring element, mercilesly consuming their bodies, and leaving too little of them; and thefore by precious embalments, depositure in dry earths, or handsome inclosure in glasses, contrived notablest wayes of integrall conservation.

Sir Thomas Brown. Urn Burial, part iv. ch. i.

Thus when the state one Edward did depose,
A greater Edward in his room arose.
But now, not I, but poetry is curs'd;
For Tom the second reigns like Tom the first.

Dryden. Epistle 10. To Mr. Congreve.

To them were committed the oracles of God; i. e. with them were intrusted all the revelations of the will of God, the law and the prophesies, as the people with whom God thought fit to deposit these things for the benefit of the world.

Clarke. Sermon 5. vol. x.

To obtain our pardon, the Son with the consent of the Father, deposits his interests into his hands, and as a Mediator intervenes between us and him, who in this transaction is the depositary of the rights of heaven.

Bates. The Harmony of the Divine Attributes, ch. xiii.

If a person of clear fame assert a thing which he is ready to maintain with the loss of his life, there is no reason to doubt of the truth of his deposition.

Bates. The Harmony of the Divine Attributes, ch. xxii.

They [schoolmasters] are indeed the great depositories and trustees of the peace of it; as having the growing hopes and fears of the nation in their hands. South. Sermons, vol. v. p. 23.

My leisure has not yet permitted me to transcribe some things out of it, which concerns me on another subject, but if the detaining of it longer be no prejudice to you, it is in a safe depositum. Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 294. J. Evelyn to Mr. Boyle.

In this very year the sceptre of royal power departed from Judah; for it was in this year that Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great, was deposed by the Roman emperor, and banished to Lyons, and the Jews became wholly subject to the dominion of the Romans. Horsley. Sermon 30. vol. iii.

Your metrical imitation of them is elegant, and if you will allow me to publish it in my work, you will equally oblige me and my readers, who will be glad to hear the Persian poet speak Latin; if you object to this, copies of them shall be deposited with my treasures, and the originals restored to you as soon as possible.

Sir William Jones. Works, vol. i. p. 107. Mr. Jones to C. Reviczki, 1768.

The swell of pity, not to be confin'd
Within the scanty limits of the mind,
Disdains the bank, and throws the golden sands,
A rich deposit on the bord'ring lands.

Cowper. Charity.

Thus it is ordained by the sages of Hindustán, that "a depositor shall carefully enquire into the character of his intended depositary; who, if he undertake to keep the goods, shall preserve them with care and attention."

Sir William Jones. Works, vol. viii. p. 446. The Law of Bailments.

An equal caution should be used to separate the clear naked deposition of experiment from all conjectural deductions.

Horsley. Sermon 39.

If I am a vain man, my gratification lies within a narrow circle. I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me.

Junius. Dedication to the English Nation, v.

DEPOSITION, in Law, a testimony given in Court by a Witness on oath. Depositions in Chancery, and in Ecclesiastical Courts, are evidences set down in writing, and signed by the Witness, who is called Deponent; they are answers to Interrogatories exhibited for his examination, taken in or near London, in the Examiners' Office, and, at a greater distance, by Commissioners appointed for the purpose, and are read as evidence at the hearing. Depositions, after a cause is determined in Chancery, may be given in evidence at a trial at Bar in the King's Bench, in a suit for the same matter, between the same parties, if the party that deposed is dead. Those taken on oath before a Coroner or Justice, may also be given in evidence at a trial for felony, if the Deponent is dead, unable to travel, or kept away by the Prisoner's procurement, oath being made that the Depositions are unaltered.

EPO-TION. — PRAVE

Deposition is also used for sequestering or depriving a person of his dignity or office. According to Du Cange, (ad. voc.) it is a milder kind of DEGRADATION, not being accompanied with the same solemn ceremonies, and is synonymous with DEPRIVATION.

DEPOVERISH, to impoverish. See DEPAUPERATE, ante.

So is your power depouerished, and lordes and great men brought to infelicitie, and all your people to great debilitie.
Grafton. Richard II. The tenth Yere.

DEPRA'VE, DEPRAVA'TION, DEPRAVA'BLE, DEPRA'VEDLY, DEPRA'VEDNESS, DEPRA'VEMENT, DEPRA'VER, DEPRA'VITY. } Fr. depraver; Sp. depravar; It. depravare; de, and pravus; perhaps from the Gr. πρᾶος, mild, gentle; and by warlike people, in contempt; cowardly.

To deprave, says Minshew, is to viciate and corrupt that which before was good.

To viciate, to corrupt, to degrade; to put a bad meaning or construction upon; and thus, to vilify, to defame.

And þat knoweþ conscience. ich cam nogt to chiden
Ne to deprave þe pēsone.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 49.

And yet good Lord, of a presumpcion
I nil depraue thy might and Deite
I liue but vnder thy protection
I am thy subiect, and wear thy liuery.
Chaucer. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 322.

Although sometimes he seeme (alite) to craue,
Yet wyll I not his doings so deprave,
As for to iudge (before I see his ende)
What harder happe his angrie starres can sende.
Gascoigne. Dan Bartholmew of Bathe.

We began to lose, whan our capitaines began to deserue to be depraued and condempned. Golden Boke, ch. xlix.

As though all the false religion that euer was amonge the heithen, was not a corrupting & depravation of the true religiō of God. Calvine. Foure Godlye Sermons, serm. 1.

O temerous tauntrese that delights in toyes,
Tumbling cockboat tot'ring too and fro,
Jangling iestres, deprauresse of swete ioyes,
Ground of the graffe whence all my grief doth grow.
Uncertaine Auctors. Against an Unstedfast Woman.

Ah! why hath nature to so hard a hart
Given so goodly gifts of beauties grace?
Whose pride depraues each other better part,
And all those precious ornaments deface.
Spenser. Sonnet 31.

The scrutiny all over the kingdom, to find out men of arbitrary principles, that will bow the knee to Baal, in order to their promotion to all publick commissions and employments, and the disgracing on the contrary and displacing of such as yet dare in so universal a depravation be honest and faithful in their trust and offices.
Marvell. Works, vol. i. p. 645. Of the Growth of Popery, &c.

Human nature is so mutable and depravable, as that notwithstanding the connate idea and prolepsis of God in the minds of men, some unquestionably do degenerate and lapse into atheism.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, book i. ch. iv.

Yet in the worst of the depravedness of Israel, there were some which both drouped under the deplored idolatry of the times, and congratulated to Jehu this seuere vindication of God's inheritance.
Hall. Cont. Jehu Killing the Sons of Ahab, &c. book xx. vol. i. fol. 1273.

And to this effect he maketh men believe that apparitions, and such as confirm his existence are either deceptions of sight, or melancholy depravements of phancy.
Sir Thomas Brown, book i. ch. x.

DEPRAVE — DEPRE-CATE.

The rest, which the text ensuing shall lay abroad, we will to our abilitie perform and perfit more exactly, not fearing all the backbiters and depravers of this so long a worke, as they hold it.
Holland. Ammianus. Constantius, fol. 29.

By aberration of conceit they extenuate his depravitie, and ascribe some goodnesse unto him.
Sir Thomas Brown, book vii. ch. i.

These are the points and articles in which we accuse the church of Rome to have grievously corrupted and depraved the Christian doctrine and practice in this matter of the sacrament.
Sharp. Works. Sermon 14. vol. i.

And still much less inconsistent will it be with the same divine goodness, to permit the posterity of a sinful and depraved creature to continue by natural consequence in a lower and more obnoctious rank of beings, than possibly they would have been placed in, had no such depravation been introduced, either by our first parent, or by any of his successors.
Clarke. Sermon 13. vol. ii.

If there be no designed depravedness, and pestilent perverseness of the mind, charity will make an indulgent allowance for it.
Bates. Spiritual Perfection Unfolded and Enforced, ch. xi.

Disclaiming so noble a parent, as wisedom omnipotent; disowning so worthy a benefactour, as sovereign goodness? ô brutish degeneracy, ô hellish depravedness of mind.
Barrow. Sermon 1. vol. ii.

Over-great concern for self-preservation [is owned to be] meanness and cowardice; too little, rashness; and none at all, or that which is contrary, (viz. a passion leading to self-destruction) a mad and desperate depravity.
Shaftesbury. An Enquiry concerning Virtue, book i. part i. sec. 2.

When reason and understanding are depraved and as far corrupted as the very passions of the heart; when thus the blind leads the blind, what else can we expect, but that both fall into the ditch? Sherlock. Discourse 33. vol. ii. p. 121.

Which, if it, [refinement] does not lead directly to purity of manners, obviates at least their greatest depravation, by disentangling the mind from appetite, and conducting the thoughts, through successive stages of excellence, till that contemplation of universal rectitude and harmony, which began by taste, may, as it is exalted and refined, conclude in virtue.
Sir Joshua Reynolds. Discourse 9.

It is the artificial theologer, the depraver as he says, of the gospel, who would draw him into so absurd a system.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, book v. Appendix.

We owe it to the bounty of Providence, that the compleatest depravity of the heart is sometimes strangely united with a confusion of the mind, which counteracts the most favourite principles, and makes the same man treacherous without art, and a hypocrite without deceiving.
Junius. Letter 15. To his Grace the Duke of Grafton.

DE'PRECATE, DEPRECA'TION, DE'PRECATIVE, DEPRE'CATORY. } Deprecari, deprecatus; (de, and precari, to pray.) "Fr. desprier; to unpray, disintreat; revoke a suit, recall prayers; desire to the contrary." Cotgrave. A deprecation, says Minshew, or begging of God to turn away his heauie displeasure from us, for our sins committed. Fr. deprecation; Sp. deprecacion; Lat. deprecatio.

He then muttered in a broken and imperfect kind of tone that the prayers he made, and the masses he performed, were in order to deprecate a massacre he had heard was designed against the Catholics. State Trials. Trial of the Earl of Arundel.

Deprecacions of evil to a malicious man are no better than advices. An unknown idiom is fit to keep counsel: they are familiar words, that must convey ought to the understanding.
Hall. Cont. Hezekiah and Sennacherib.

DEPRAVE — DEPRECIATE.

In petitioning for ourselves, the first thing to be explained, is deprecation, which concerns the prevention, or removal, or lessening of evil.

The first evil to be prayed against is that of sin; and therein we should deprecate both the {Guilt. Power.

Wilkins. On Prayer, ch. xvi.

And in the opuscular of Thomas Aquinas, he tells that a doctor said to him, that the optative form, or deprecatory, was the usual.

Taylor. Pol. Disc. fol. 484. Dissuasive from Popery, book i. sec. 9. part ii.

The blood of this day was sacred and royal, innocent and precious, and the manner of shedding it so wilful, malicious and cruel, that we cannot too often, nor too earnestly repent the crime, nor deprecate the punishment thereof.

Comber. Companion to the Temple, vol. ii. fol. 147.

First of all Δέησις, which we here render supplications, but may more properly be rendered deprecations, that is to say, such prayers as we put to God for the pardon of our sins, and the averting from us all those evils that we deserve upon account of them. Sharp. Works. Sermon 7. vol. iv.

The form itself is very ancient, consisting now as it did of old, of two parts, the first deprecative, the second indicative; the one intreating for pardon, the other, dispensing it.

Comber, vol. i. fol. 752.

We have three peculiar prayers for the evening, differing in words, but agreeing in sense with those in the morning, and therefore our notes on them shall be shorter. The first is penitential and deprecatory. Id. vol. ii. fol. 145.

I fear he is a fraudulent dealer, and we may with too much justice apply to him the Scriptural deprecation, he that withholdeth his corn, the people shall curse him; but blessing shall be upon the head of him who selleth it.

Gilpin. Sermon 11. vol. iii.

But a city without the knowledge of a God, or the practice of religion: without the use of vows, oaths, oracles, and sacrifices to procure good, or of deprecatory rites to avert evil, no man can or ever will find.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book ii. sec. 1.

DEPRE'CIATE, DEPRECIA'TION. Low Lat. depreciare, minuere pretio; Fr. depriser. Du Cange: (de, and pretium, price or value; of uncertain Etymology.)

To lower, lessen or diminish the price or value; to deny the price or value.

Lest those unintelligent maligners take an advantage from our discourse, to depreciate and detract from what hath been alway the object of their hate, because never of their knowledge, and capacities.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxiv.

In the other parts of the book, we do often give an account, of the doctrine of the ancients: which however some over-severe philosophers, may look upon fastidiously, or undervalue and depreciate, yet, as we conceived it often necessary, so possibly may the variety thereof not be ungrateful to others.

Cudworth. Intellectual System. Preface to the Reader.

Thou dull important lump of pride,
Dar'st thou with that harsh grating tongue
Depreciate birds of warbling song?
Indulge thy spleen: know men and fowl
Regard thee, as thou art, an owl.

Gay. Fable 41.

Others are so unhappily attentive to party considerations or personal prejudices, that if a design, ever so valuable, comes from a wrong quarter, instead of being ambitious to share the merit and the honour of it, they set themselves immediately to depreciate it, and suggest mischievous intentions in it.

Secker. Works. Sermon 7. vol. v.

This depreciation of their funds has not much the air of a nation lightening burthens and discharging debts.

Burke. On a late State of the Nation.

The depreciators of the Eucharist have maintained, among other strange, and conceited opinions, that the prayers, hymns, and thanksgivings contained in our communion service have no real connection with the sacrament; which, according to them, consists merely of eating the bread, and drinking the wine, in commemoration of our Lord's death and passion.

Knox, vol. vii. p. 421. Considerations on the Lord's Supper.

DEP CIA — DEP RE

DE'PREDATE, DEPREDA'TION, DEPREDA'TOR, DEPREDA'TORY, DE'PREDABLE. Fr. depreder; Lat. depredari, atum; (de, and præda, prey, plunder. Of uncertain Etymology.) To prey upon, plunder, pillage, despoil, ravage, waste or lay waste.

I have now a plentiful estate, external affluence; what if, at this moment, I were bereft of all, either by fire or depredation, how were my mind fitted with humility and patience to submit to a poor, strait, wanting condition?

Hall. Cont. vol. i. p. 333. Of Afflictions.

It is reported, that the shrub called our ladies seale, (which is a kind of briony,) and coleworts, set near together, one or both will die. The cause is, for they be both great depredatours of the earth, and one of them starveth the other.

Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 5. sec. 432.

The juyce and succulencies of the body, are made lesse depredable, if either they be made more indurate, or more dewy, and oyly. Id. On Learning, by G. Wats, book iv. ch. ii.

The two precedent intend this, That the spirits and aire in their actions may be the lesse depredatary; and the two latter, that the blood and juice of the body may be the lesse depredable.

Id. Natural History, part iii. fol. 38. The History of Life and Death.

The visitors found, in some of the richest abbeys of England, as St. Alban's and Battel, such depredations made that at St. Alban's an abbot could not subsist any longer, the rents were so low.

Burnet. History of Reformation, Anno 1537, book iii.

Nevertheless, I shall, in this case, send my brother with a detachment of horse to harass Antony in his retreat, and to protect Italy from his depredations.

Melmoth. Cicero, book xiv. let. 9. Plancus to Cicero.

The prostitution of praise, for venal purposes, is a species of deception, which deserves to be ranked among the frauds of the vilest depredator on property.

Knox. Winter Evenings, even. 40.

They are a stout, well-made, bold, warlike race of people; redoubtable neighbours to both nations of the Koriacs, who often feel the effects of their depredatory incursions.

Cook. Voyage, vol. vii. book v. ch. vii.

DEPRE'DICATE, DEPRE'DICATING, n. De, and prædicare, to attribute; (præ, and dicare, which Vossius says is the same as attribuere, ac præcipuè consecrare; perhaps, he adds, of the same origin as dicere.)

To proclaim, to commemorate.

The Hebrew which signifies to praise, or celebrate, or deprædicate, doth import no more, than hymnes or lauds; accordingly and singing them is Mat. xxvi. 30, exprest by ὑμνήσαντες, having sung an hymn.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. fol. 1. The Book of Psalms.

The negative flattery being as truly, though not so grosly such as the affirmative; the concealing of faults, as the depredicating of vertues.

Id. Ib. vol. i. fol. 294. Of Fraternal Admonition.

DEPREHE'ND, DEPREHE'NSION. Deprehendere; de, pre, and hendere, used only in composition, and which Tooke derives from A. S. hent-an, to hunt, seize, catch.

To catch or seize; to seize the intent or meaning; to discover; to detect.

In so moche as Cornelius Tacitus, an excellente oratour, historian, and lawiar, sayth, Surely in the bookes of Tulli, men maye deprehende that in hym lacked not the knowlege of geometrye, ne musyke, ne grammer, finally of no maner of arte that was honest.

Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i. ch. xiv.

Yet hitherto the reliques of youre old lyfe are deprehended in you, you haue not yet all together caste of the olde manne.
Udall. James, ch. iv.

For that God is ready to forgive the greatest criminals if they repent, appears in the instances of Ahab and Manasses, of Mary Magdalen and S. Paul, of the thief on the cross and the deprehended adultress, and of the Jews themselves.
Taylor. Pol. Dis. fol. 801. Of Repentance, ch. 9. sec. 1.

——— And askt, what God hath been so rude,
(Sweet daughter) to chastise thee thus? as if thou wert pursude,
Euen to the act of some light sinne, and deprehended so.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, book v. fol. 70.

Her deprehension is made an aggravation of her shame: such is the corrupt judgment of the world: to do ill troubles not man; but to be taken in doing it.
Hall. Cont. The Woman taken in Adulterie.

DEPRE'SS, DEPRE'SSION, DEPRE'SSIVE, DEPRE'SSOR. Deprimere, depressum; to press down; de, and prem-ere: which Vossius thinks may be from Gr. βαρήμα, pondus; because premere is properly to lean against or lie upon any thing, cum pondere. See COMPRESS.

To press down, to thrust or squeeze down; to deject, to sink, to debase, to degrade.

The same houre, when this child was borne
Uenus direct, and contrarious
And depressed in Mercurius hous.
Lidgate. The Story of Thebes, part i. fol. 372.

And thā is the depression of the pole artentike beneath the orizont, y^e^ same quantity of space, neither more ne lesse.
Id. Of the Astrolabie, fol. 267.

Perceyuynge thus the tyrannye of synne,
That with hys weyght hath humbled and deprest
My pride; by gnawyng of the worme within,
That neuer dyeth, I lyue withouten rest.
Wyat. Psalm 38.

I meane not his materiall crosse that he himselfe dyed on, but a spirituall crosse which is aduersitie, tribulation, worldly depression, &c. Frith. Workes, fol. 5. His Book of Purgatory.

Close smother'd lay the low depressed fire
Whose after-issuing flames confounded all.
Daniel. History of Civil War, book v.

Then fearless he replies, Great King to you
All truth I shall relate: nor first can I
My self to be of Grecian birth deny;
And though my outward state misfortune hath
Deprest thus low, it cannot reach my faith.
Denham. Essay on Virgil's Æneis.

He specifies very nicely that a ring that hath for a seal the figure of a man, if it be gibbous, or swelling out, is not itself lawful to be worn, but yet 'tis lawful to seal with it, because the impression, in that case is hollow, not swelling out; and on the other side of the seal be depress, or hollow, 'tis lawful to wear, but not to seal with it.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 259. Of Idolatry.

I speake to this effect; That they would forbear too much depressing of the clergy, either in their reputation or maintenance, in regard it was not impossible that their profession, now as high as ours once was, may fall to be as low as ours now is.
State Trials. Trial of Archbishop Laud.

Lambert in great depression of spirit, twice pray'd him to let him escape, but when he saw he could not prevail, submitted as all the rest did except Okley, Axtel, and Cleer, who escaped.
Baker. Charles II. Anno 1660.

The Gods with ease frail man depress or raise,
Exalt the lowly, or the proud debase.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xvi.

Should he [one born blind] draw his hand over a picture, where all is smooth and uniform, he would never be able to imagine how the several prominencies and depressions of a human body could be shewn on a plain piece of canvas, that has in it no unevenness or irregularity. Spectator, No. 416.

——— May Liberty
The light of life, the sun of human kind,
Whence heroes, bards, and patriots borrow flame,
Ev'n where the keen depressive north descends,
Still spread, exalt, and actuate your powers.
Thomson. Britannia.

An illustrious scene will open, in which the world and all its views, and pageantry, will be depressed; and heavenly truth shine out in all its splendour.
Gilpin, vol. i. p. 322. Hints for Sermons.

For my own part, my greatest glory is, that travelling has not more steeled my constitution against all the vicissitudes of climate and all the depressions of fatigue, than it has my mind against the accidents of fortune, or the accesses of despair.
Goldsmith. Citizen of the World, let. 7.

DEPRISURE, "Fr. despris; disesteem, disprisal, neglect, little regard, small respect, contempt or disdain of." Cotgrave. See DEPRECIATE.

Nor can any, upon consideration, expect less then a great abatement and deprisure of their souls in the account of God, when his pure sight beholds this protected impuritie.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 6. sec. 2.

DEPRIMENT, deprimens, present participle of deprimere, to depress, q. v. Pressing down.

Partly by the equality of their strength; which is the case of the adducent and abducent muscles: partly by their peculiar origine, or the addition of the trochlea; which is the case of the oblique muscles: and partly by the natural posture of the body, and the eye; which is the case of the attollent and depriment muscles. Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. ii.

DEPRI'VE, DEPRI'VABLE, DEPRIVA'TION, DEPRI'VEMENT, DEPRI'VER, DEPRI'VING, n. Fr. priver; Sp. privar; It. and Lat. privare, deprivare. A πρίω, (emo) censeo dici privum, quod quis sibi emit, atque ita privum et proprium fecit. Vossius. To make our own private and peculiar property, to appropriate; and thus, to take away, withdraw or withhold from another; to take away, bereave or despoil.

Almerck or Mountfort deprived was þare
& þe tresorie, þat he had in kepyng.
R. Brunne, p. 222.

Haue I the nat honoured all my liue?
As thou wel wotest, above the goddes all
Why wilt thou me fro ioy thus depriue.
Chaucer. The thirde Booke of Troilus, fol. 177.

To what end then pursued you the marriage? to no other end surely, but to advance and maintain the false and pretended title to the present possession of the crown of England, and for the attaining thereof, to practice the deprivation, death and destruction of the Queen's majesty. [Elizabeth.]
State Trials. Trial of the Duke of Norfolk.

Love fleeth my hart, while fortune is depriuer
Of all my comfort.
Wyat. Of Loue, Fortune, and the Louer's minde.

And on the tother syde, if, some saye be a good proofe, than the suspending wil be as long as a deprysing for euer.
The Apology of Sir Thomas More, ch. xlvi. fol. 919.

Though perhaps we might escape the sword, yet would our life have been worse then death, not alone in respect of our wofull captivity, and bodily miseries, but most of all in respect of our Christian liberty, being to be deprived of all publique meanes of serving the true God.
Sir Francis Drake. The World Encompassed, fol. 101.

Mr. Pym, in a long form'd discourse, lamented the miserable state and condition of the kingdom, aggravated all the particulars which had been done amiss in the government, as done and contriv'd maliciously, and upon deliberation, to change the whole frame, and deprive the nation of all the liberty and property which was their birthright by the laws of the land.
Clarendon. History of Civil Wars, vol. i. part i. p. 171.

I might prosecute and draw down the histories of all the Spanish kings and kingdoms from his dayes till this present, which are fully fraught with presidents of this nature, to prove all the kings of Spaine inferiour to their kingdoms, assemblies of the estates, lawes, resistible, deprivable for their tyrannyes.

DEPRIVE. — DEPURE.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty, part v. fol. 75.

Why should I think a priest will not reveal confession? I am sure he will do any thing that is forbidden him, haply not so often as I. The utmost punishment is deprivation.

Selden. Table Talk, p. 27. Confession.

If then violence, injury, terrour, and depriving of that which is more dear than life itself, liberty, be fit orators for affection, you may expect that I will be easily perswaded.

Sidney. Arcadia, book iii.

God might freely have ordered the contrary, and they could no way have claimed it as a due, or a deprivement of their right; it was no natural due that was the consequent of its being.

Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 115.

Scarce had he said, when on the mountain's brow,
We saw the giant-shepherd stalk before
His following flock, and leading to the shore.
A monstrous bulk, deform'd, depriv'd of sight,
His staff a trunk of pine, to guide his steps aright.

Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

We can sooner leave our place, and all our present outward enjoyments than leave that, which was the first ground of our wandering from our native country; nor are we thereby made such strangers thereunto, but we can rather chuse to return, and take our lot with our brethren, than abide here under the deprivement of the ends of our travels.

Appendix to the Life of Mr. Boyle, vol. i. p. 215. No. 6.

And, in this business, these deprivers were so quick, and went so roundly to work, that they stayed not for the appearances of the priests to answer for themselves, nor sometimes so much as cited them to answer, but deprived them to rights without any more ado. Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, Anno 1553.

Thus a punishment of this kind was inflicted on the rebellious Israelites: they were deprived of the extraordinary providence, and were yet held subject to the theocracy, as appears from the sentence pronounced upon them, by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book v. sec. 4.

DEPUDORATED; de, and pudor, shame. Rendered shameless or void of shame.

Their [Atheists] minds are partly petrified and benummed into a kind of sottish and stupid insensibility, so that they are not able to discern things that are most evident; and partly depudorated or become so void of shame, as that though they do perceive, yet they will obstinately and impudently deny the plainest things. Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 193.

DEPULSION, depellere, depulsum, to drive away; (de, and pellere, to drive; perhaps from Gr. πέλ-ειν, to move or remove.)

A driving away.

In the meane time (the errour or weaknesse of the Burgundian Dutchesse and her Perkin, suffering their enemy in this sort, to puruey for his owne security, and their depulsion) King Henry for farther assurance of himselfe makes a progress into Lancashire. Speed. Henrie VII. book ix. ch. xx. sec. 38.

DEPU'RE, DE'PURATE, v. DE'PURATE, adj. DEPURA'TION.

"Fr. depurer; to purge, clear, purifie, clarifie." Cotgrave. Lat. de, and purus, from πῦρ fire; properly spoken of metals which are purified by fire.

He shall fyrst bee well purged, and all the spottes & wrincles that thē remayn, shal be cleane burned out by the hote fyre of purgatory, or by other men's prayers and almes dede, and other suffrages of the churche doone for hym, be depured and clensed before that he shalbe layde vp for pure gold in the treasures of God.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 800. The Confutacion of frere Barnes Church.

We say, Spirits are where they operate: but strictly to be in a place, or ubi, is a material attribute, and incompatible with so depurate a nature.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xi.

For all the excoctions and depurations of metalls it is a familiar error, that to advance excoction, they augment the heate of the fornace, or the quantity of the iniection. DE DI

Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book v. ch. i.

Or this manner of depuration and clarifying of it by a strainer, first doth enervate and cut as it were the sinewes of the vigour and vertue, yea, and quench the native heat that it hath.

Holland. Plutarch, fol. 603.

Recrements of the blood, whose seasonable expulsion is required to depurate the mass of blood and make it fit, both to circulate and to maintain the vital heat residing in the heart.

Boyle. New Experiments Physico-Mechanical touching the spring of Air.

You will obtain together with the spirit of wine the spirit of soot, and also a very depurate oil, smelling like camphor.

Id. vol. ii. p. 209. Usefulness of Natural Philosophy. Appendix.

This is requisite to be done only when, to master some stubborn disease, the medicine is to be exalted either to its supreme, or at least to some approaching degree of purity and efficacy; for otherwise so exquisite a depuration is not always necessary.

Id. Ib. p. 213.

Fast flows the liquor through the lead-lin'd spouts;
And depurated by opposing wires
In the receiver floats the limpid stream.

Grainger. The Sugar Cane, book iii.

DEPU'TE, DEPUTA'TION, DE'PUTY; DE'PUTISHIP.

The Fr. deputo; It. deputato; Sp. deputado, are from the Barbarous Lat. deputare pro delegare. Rectius itaque, delegatos dixeris, quos vulgo deputatos vocant. Junius. And Vossius says, They are rashly called Deputies, who ought to be called Delegates. And see Deputer, in Menage, and Deputati, in Du Cange.

To appoint, authorize or empower one or more to act for others.

Some old Authors write Debyty for Deputy.

But for he maie not all hym one
In sondry places do iustice,
He shall of his riall office
With wise consideracion
Ordeine his deputacion.
Of suche iudges, as ben lerned,
So that his people be gouerned
By hem, that true ben and wise.

Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 157.

Then sayde Absalom vnto hym: see thy matter is good and ryghteous, and yet no manne is deputed of the kyng to heare the.

Bible, Anno 1551. 2 Kings, ch. xv.

Now is it profytable and good, that we take hede, make search thereafter, and consydre, not only what hath happened vnto vs of olde: but the shamefull, vnhonest, and noysome thynges, that the debytyes haue now taken in hande before our eyes

Id. Esther, ch. xvi.

And yet he wyll be named like the lamb, and Christes deputie or vicar, and wyll haue all power as Christ hathe bothe in heauen and in earthe.

Udall. Reuelacion, ch. xiii.

I then delivered him the six broad pieces, and telling him, that I was deputed to blush on your behalfe for the meannesse of the present &c. but he took me off, and said, he thanked you for it, and accepted it as a token of your kindnesse.

Marvell. Works, vol. i. p. 211. Letter 138. To the Corporation of Hull.

Some few days after the Parliament was holden at Westminster begun by a deputative commission granted by the Queen to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby, and that not without former precedents.

Camden. Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1586.

And with a veile the iudge's eyes were hid,
Who should not see the partie but the cause.
God's deputies, which his tribunall reare,
Should have a patient, not a partiall eare.

Stirling. A Paræneis to Prince Henry, son of James I.

'UTY. —)E- ACE.

This earle of Bedford as ambassador from the Queene of England, was sent to the Queene of Scots by waie of deputiship to present the person of his mistress.

Holinshed. History of Scotland, vol. v. p. 724.

And Sir William Fitzwilliams in the time of his deputiship, hauing a verie good triall of his fidelitie, truth, and good seruice, did giue vnto him the order of knighthood, and made him shiriffe of the countie of Corke. Id. Ireland, Anno 1580.

The assembling of persons, deputed from people at great distances one from another, is trouble to them that are sent, and charge to them that send.

Sir William Temple. Works. Upon the original and nature of Government.

We see others also in regard to their designment and deputation to offices of power and dignity, although indeed subordinate and inferior to those he received, to be entitled to be the sons of God.

Barrow. Sermon 21. vol. ii.

Though he had heard great complaints of him, as indeed, there was some ground for them, yet, since his son was sent one of the three, upon so great a deputation, he concluded from thence, that the family was not so much hated, as he had been informed: so he continued still to be advised by him.

Burnet. Own Times. William and Mary, Anno 1689.

Our Saviour pleads our cause, and manages our affairs there; and the Holy Spirit, as his deputy and vicegerent doth it here.

Sharp. Discourse 2. vol. v.

The deputy-godmother returning to the Tower to wait upon her lady, found the cloth of state taken down, and all things defaced belonging to Jane as Queen, and she as well as her mistress made prisoners.

Strype. Memorials. Edward VI. Anno 1584.

He thinks he believes, because he is pleased to take certain points of trust; and to be sure that something is right, of which he himself knows nothing, because another, whom he deputes to think for him, tells him that it is so.

Hoadly. Works. Sermon 2. vol. iii.

And, indeed, I was wholly unapprised of the particular purposes of that deputation, which was going to Rome with the customary complimental address to the senate upon your account.

Melmoth. Cicero. To Appius Pulcher.

When I was at Apamea, some of the principal inhabitants of several different cities, complained to me of the excessive appointments that were decreed to their deputies; assuring me that their respective communities were by no means in a condition to support the assessments levied upon them for that purpose.

Id. Ib.

DEPUTY, in Law, is one who discharges the duties of an office for another man, being authorized and appointed by him to do so. The principal is liable in all Civil Actions for the acts of his Deputy; but not so in Criminal cases. A principal officer cannot (unless the particular grant of his office will justify him in doing so) appoint a Deputy; but when an office descends on an infant or ideot, then a Deputy may be appointed as a matter of course. Judges cannot hold their courts by Deputy, Recorders may do so. Coroners as holding a judicial office, and judicial offices being annexed to the persons, ought not to execute their office by Deputy. Sheriffs, Bailiffs of Liberties, Stewards of Courts, and Constables, are allowed to act by Deputy.

DEQUACE, v. Mr. Tyrwhit says, To shake down, as if from the Lat. quatere, to shake. The A. S. cwysan, to quash, to crush, to bruise, to squeeze, seems to offer a more satisfactory Etymology. Skinner says, q. Dequash. See QUASH.

DE- QUACE. — DERBA.

And thus with sleight shalte thou surmount and dequace the yuel in their heartes.

Chaucer. The first Booke of the Testament of Loue, fol. 290.

Wherefore (as I sayd) with reason I think, thilk foresaid errours to distroy and dequace. Id. Ib. fol. 296.

DEQUANTITATE, see QUANTITY; and the Example from Beattie.

This we affirm of pure gold; for that which is current, and passeth in stamp amongst us, by reason of its allay, which is a proportion of silver or copper mixed therewith, is actually dequantitated by fire, and possibly by frequent extinction.

Sir Thomas Brown. Vulgar Errors.

Brown has words still more extraordinary, as feriation, for keeping holiday, dedentition, for falling of teeth, dequantitate for diminish.

Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, part v. ch. i. sec. 3.

DERACINATE, Fr. racine, a root; Lat. radix, icis: radcina, racine. See Menage.

To root up, tear or cut up by the roots.

——— ——— Frights, changes, horrors
Diuert, and cracke, rend and deracinate
The vnity, and married calme of states
Quite from their fixure.

Shakspeare. Troylus and Cressida, fol. 82.

——— Her hedges euen pleach'd,
Like prisoners wildly ouer-growne with hayre,
Put forth disorder'd twigs: her fallow leas,
The darnell, hemlock, and ranke femetary,
Doth root vpon; while that the culter rusts,
That should deracinate such sauagery.

Id. Henry V. fol. 92.

DE'RANGE, v. } "Fr. desranger; to disrank,
DE'RANGEMENT. } disarray, disorder, to thrust out of his rank, put out of array; turn out of order." See ARRANGE, and DISARRANGE. The word is modern; though Cotgrave uses desrange in interpreting the French participle desrange.

A casual blow, or a sudden fall, deranges some of our internal parts; and the rest of life is distress and misery.

Blair. Sermon 18. vol. iv.

Both these kinds of monopolies derange more or less the natural distribution of the stock of the society; but they do not always derange it in the same way.

Smith. Wealth of Nations, book iv. ch. vii. Colonies.

Whether the expence [fine apparel] great as it is, be the greatest evil; but whether this folly may not produce many other follies, an entire derangement of domestic life, absurd manners, neglect of duties, bad mothers, a general corruption of both sexes? Berkeley. Works, vol. iv. p. 169. The Querist.

It is in the highest degree improbable, and I know not, indeed whether it hath ever been the fact, that the same derangement of the mental organs should seize different persons at the same time: a derangement, I mean so much the same, as to represent to their imagination the same objects.

Paley. Evidences, prop. 2. vol. i. ch. i. p. 334.

DERBA, in Zoology, a genus of Hemipterous insects, belonging to the family Cicadidæ, founded by Fabricius.

Generic character. Lip very much extended, above elevated, beneath compressed, three-keeled.

All the species of this genus are exotic, and but little known. They are mostly confined to South America.

DERBYSHIRE.

DERBY-SHIRE.

Situation, boundaries, extent, and population.

DERBYSHIRE, a County of England, bounded on the north by Yorkshire, and encompassed on the other sides by the Counties of Nottingham, Leicester, Stafford, and Chester. It is situated nearly in the centre of the Kingdom; during the time of the ancient Britons, it formed part of their Kingdom of the Coritani; under the Romans, it was included in Britannia Prima; and during the Heptarchy, in the Kingdom of Mercia. The shape of Derbyshire is nearly triangular; the greatest extent stretching from south-east to north-west, about fifty-six miles; from north-east to south-west, about thirty-three or thirty-four miles. The area as stated in the last Population Returns is 1026 square miles, which is equal to 656,640 statute acres; with a population of 217,600, which is about 212 individuals to each square mile, or rather less than the medium for the whole Country. The following has been the increase of the population of this County, as far as can now be ascertained, viz.

	Years.	Population.	Increase.
In	1700	93,900	17 per cent.
	1750	109,500	52 per cent.
	1801	166,500
	1812	191,700	15 per cent.
	1821	217,600	13 per cent.

General surface.

As this County is intersected by that grand ridge of mountains which divides the eastern from the western part of England, its surface is among the most diversified of any in the British Empire. In some places it presents rich and almost level plains, in others towering and naked peaks, intersected by deep ravines and vallies, and presenting some of the most picturesque scenery in the Kingdom. The southern district has little that is remarkable, but gradually rises from its borders towards the centre, where the hills begin to assume a more decided form, and soon afterwards exhibit a mountainous character, which they preserve to the north-western extremity. The most elevated summits in this County are the following, the heights of which were determined with great accuracy during the trigonometrical operations connected with the survey of Great Britain:

Mountains.

	Feet.
Holme Moss	1859
Axedge	1751
Lord's Seat	1751
Hathersedge	1377
Orpit Heights	980

Picturesque scenery.

In the hilly districts some of the vallies are strikingly beautiful; of this description are those of Castleton and Glossop; but it is in the smaller dells of this County that most of its attraction consists. These are principally characterised by limestone rocks of very singular and romantic appearance; while their sides are adorned with woods, and their bottoms watered by clear and rapid streams. One of the most celebrated of these is Matlock Dale, intersected by the river Derwent, in which a remarkable rock, called High Tor, rises almost perpendicularly from the bank of the river to the height of 300 feet. Miller's Dale and Monsal Dale are situated on the river Wye; and to these may also be added Middleton Dale, Cyam Dale, and Dove Dale.

The principal rivers of Derbyshire are the Trent, the Derwent, the Wye, the Dove, the Erwach, and the Rother. The Trent, however, only intersects the southern part of the County, and forms the boundary between it and Staffordshire for a short distance. This river is of great utility to the inland trade of the County, not only on account of the numerous rivers which flow into it, and of the canals by which they are connected, but as forming an immediate communication between the interior and the British Sea. It is a full, clear stream, gliding through rich meadow and cultivated plains; but its current is slow, when compared with the impetuous course of some of the northern streams. The Derwent rises near the northern confines of the County; and all the early part of its course is very romantic. After passing Derby, and completing a course of about forty miles, it falls into the Trent, on the borders of Nottinghamshire. It was formerly navigable as far as Derby, but its navigation has chiefly been abandoned since the Derby Canal was finished in 1795. The Wye rises a little to the north of Buxton, and after flowing through a romantic district, terminates in the Trent a few miles north of Matlock. The Dove has its source a few miles south of Buxton, and forms the boundary for many miles between this County and Staffordshire, ultimately falling into the Trent, a few miles above Burton. Both the Wye and the Dove are celebrated for their trout and grayling fishery. The Rother rises near Padley, passes Chesterfield, and afterwards enters Yorkshire. The Erwach flows from the borders of Sherwood Forest, on the confines of Nottinghamshire, and terminates in the Trent near Long Eaton.

Rivers.

Derbyshire is intersected by numerous canals. The most important of these is the Trent and Mersey, or Grand Trunk Canal, which forms an important part of that inland communication which joins the four great and distant ports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Hull. It was begun as early as 1766, by the celebrated Brindley, but was not completed for nearly eleven years afterwards. It enters Derbyshire near Burton, and nearly follows the course of the Trent till it terminates on the banks of that river, near the place where the three Counties of Derby, Leicester, and Nottingham meet. The Chesterfield Canal was commenced by the same Engineer on the Grand Trunk in 1771, and extends from Chesterfield to the north-east till it enters Yorkshire at Killamarch. The Erwach Canal runs along the vale watered by that river, as the Derby Canal does from that turning along that of the Derwent. The Peak Forest, the Cromford, the Measham Canal, and some others, also intersect various parts of this County.

Canals.

Climate.

This County necessarily presents considerable diversity of climate in consequence of the varied elevation of its surface. In the lower and more level tracts it resembles that of the other central parts of the Kingdom; but in the northern and western division the air is sharp, and the weather changeable; as the mountains arrest the clouds in their progress across the county, and thus a greater quantity of rain falls there than in the other parts. These, however, are colder than some of the other counties nearer the centre of the island; and thick fogs are frequently seen hanging over the rivers and the base of the hills, even in summer. Hoar frosts are frequent, and only a few kinds of grain will grow in the north-western district, or Peak; and that which is sown even in the most favourable and sheltered places is seldom cut till very late in the year. The winters in the upland districts are severe The soil, as well as the surface of the county, is much diversified, but is chiefly composed of clay, loam, sand, and peat, variously intermixed. The southern part is generally called the fertile district, and principally consists of pasture, arable, and meadow lands, in many parts of a reddish loam; but this not only rests on different subsoils, but approaches to clay, marl, gravel, or sand, in different districts. The substratum of this part of the County is chiefly gravel and red marl, interspersed with beds of gypsum, which are sometimes very extensive. In the High Peak, much of the upper parts of the surface is composed either of heathy moor or peat moss, while the substrata are principally limestone of various kinds, intermixed with loadstone, slate, and gritstone. Coal and indurated clay are also found here, resting upon each other in alternate layers. The south and south-eastern parts of Derbyshire are not only the most susceptible of culture, but the best cultivated. The arable lands in these districts yield good crops both of wheat and barley; while in the more northern tracts oats are the principal product, and oat-bread the chief article of food with the lower classes. Much of the land towards the south-west is occupied in pasturage, and not only many cattle are annually fed there, but about 2000 tons of cheese are yearly exported from the vicinity of Ashbourn and some of the neighbouring places. Derbyshire is noted for the growth of camomile for the supply of the London consumption; about eighty acres of land are applied to this purpose in the vicinity of Chesterfield, which produce nearly five hundred weight each acre upon an average. The Derbyshire cows are chiefly of the long horned, speckled kind; they are large and well shaped, and give a good quantity of fine milk. The short horned Lincolnshire breed has been introduced in some places, but they are by no means general. The horses in the southern districts are heavy and good; in the northern they are light and slender, but hardy and well adapted for the hilly district in which they are employed. The sheep on the Leicestershire borders resemble those of that County; but towards the north, they gradually diminish in size, and fineness of wool, until in the more elevated regions of the Peak, they are as small as those on the mountains of Wales or Cumberland.

RBY-IRE.

cul- and icts.

ock.

ls ssils.

Minerals of various kinds are found in most of the hilly districts of Derbyshire, especially embedded in the limestone strata. Lead under several different forms is obtained, but chiefly in galena, or sulphuret of that metal. The quantity of silver, however, which is usually found in the lead of this County is not sufficient to render it worth the expense of separation. A native oxide of zinc is obtained at Castleton, Cromford, Bonsall, and Wirksworth. Copper also has been found, though only in small quantities. Iron abounds in all the tracts whereon coal has been discovered. It sometimes appears on the surface of the ground, and at others, from the dip of the strata, it is very deep. Both the argillaceous and calcareous or sparry ores are met with. These are of various colours, and are found both in beds and insulated masses. The chief founderies and forges are those at Butterley, Codner, Morley Park, Wingerworth, Chesterfield, Stavely, and Riddings. Manganese, arsenic, and antimony, have been found in small quantities; with crystals of quartz, calcareous spar, and fluor, as well as gypsum and barytes. The most beautiful fossil of this County is that much admired species of fluor called Derbyshire spar, and sometimes Blue John, which is usually found in fissures of the limestone near Castleton. When this substance is polished it exhibits a great diversity of shades, varying through all degrees of blue, purple, and yellow. Petroleum also has been met with; a peculiar kind of elastic bitumen, resembling Indian rubber, is found in cavities near Odin; and black marble at Ashford. Several large fields of coal are worked in this County. It comes from the pit in long stratified pieces of a shining fracture, and burns with a bright flame, and a slight crackling noise. Perhaps no County in the Kingdom presents so great a variety of limestone as Derbyshire. It is not only of various qualities in regard to strength, but passes through almost every shade from white to black, containing impressions of leaves, plants, and shells.

DERBY-SHIRE.

Derbyshire is as much noted for its mineral waters, as for its minerals and romantic scenery; and from several relics that have been discovered at different times, there is reason to believe that they were known to the Romans, and have been the resort of invalids from that era to the present. The hot springs at Buxton have long been celebrated, the waters of which stand uniformly at a temperature of about 82°, whatever may be the state of the atmosphere. These waters are slightly impregnated with saline particles, but are otherwise very pure, and are used both for bathing and drinking. They possess considerable efficacy in gout, rheumatism, bilious complaints, and indigestion. There are several both public and private baths; and one for the poor, the use of which they enjoy gratis. The waters at Matlock are not so warm as those at Buxton, as they seldom rise above 68°. They are however purer, and are marked by this peculiarity, all the hot springs are from fifteen to thirty yards above the river. Above or below that height, the springs are all cold, and are merely common water. A tepid chalybeate spring at Bakewell, of a temperature of about 59°, is used with good effect in cases of debility and indigestion. There are also tepid springs at several other places; and one strongly sulphureous at Kedleston, which greatly resembles the Harrowgate water, and is used externally for most cutaneous complaints, and internally, as an antiscorbutic. A chalybeate spring near Derby is likewise a place of considerable resort. An intermitting spring near Tideswell has generally been mentioned among the wonders of Derbyshire. Its ebbing and flowing is not, however, regular; in dry weather it sometimes ceases for two or three weeks together, while in rainy seasons it ebbs and flows several times in the space of an hour.

Mineral waters.

DERBYSHIRE.

Manufactures.

Derbyshire was formerly noted for its woollen manufactures; but these in a great measure have been superseded by other kinds of industry, and are at present restricted to a little worsted and a few blankets, the former of which is made at several places, the latter principally at Chesterfield. The first silk mill established in the Kingdom was at Derby, more than a century ago; and the great improvement made in the apparatus since that time has largely extended the manufacture of that article. This machinery was brought from Italy by a Mr. Lombe; and the making of silk stockings was commenced there soon afterwards. It was much improved by the ingenuity of Mr. Strutt, who introduced a machine for making ribbed stockings, soon after the middle of the last century. Derbyshire must also be considered as the nursery of the most important branches of the cotton trade; as Sir Richard Arkwright established one of the first cotton mills on the improved principle there in 1771, and two years afterwards made the first successful attempt to establish the manufacture of calicoes in this Kingdom, which is now carried to a great extent, and employs an immense capital in the County of Derby. A few linens are made; and both lead and iron works are carried on in several places, as well as those of marble and spar. Derby is also celebrated for its porcelain, some of the superior specimens of which are very beautiful.

Antiquities

Many British antiquities still remain in this County, as Druidical circles, tumuli, rocking stones, and some rude military works in the most unfrequented parts. The relics of Roman origin are some remains of roads and stations, and an ancient altar preserved at Haddon Hall. Derbyshire exhibits ecclesiastical specimens of almost all ages to be met with in other parts of the island. The crypt under Repton Church is supposed to be the remains of an edifice destroyed by the Danes in 874. Melbourne Church is a good specimen of the style which prevailed in the XIth century; and Steetly Church of the later and more enriched style of Saxon architecture. There are not many specimens of the early Gothic to be met with; and of these the tower of All Saints Church in Derby, is considered as one of the most perfect. Very few remains of Monastic edifices now exist in Derbyshire. Among the most remarkable are Dale Abbey, an arch at the east end of which is still standing; Beucheif Abbey, now used as a Church; and part of a Saxon Monastery at Repton.

Natural curiosities.

The wonders of the Peak have long and deservedly held the first place among the natural curiosities of Great Britain. Among the most prominent of these objects may be mentioned Poole's Hole, Elden Hole, the Peak Cavern, and the Speedwell Mine.

Poole's Hole.

Poole's Hole is about a mile west of Buxton; it is a natural cavern formed in a limestone rock, and received its name, according to tradition, from an outlaw who made it his abode. The entrance is low and the passage at first narrow, but it afterwards expands into a spacious and lofty cavern, adorned with transparent crystals, appended to the roofs and sides. Some of these stalactitical petrifactions also drop on the floor, and assume a variety of fantastic shapes. A narrow passage separates the cavern into two parts, the second of which is composed of a lofty vault, resembling that of a cathedral; and ultimately terminating at the distance of half a mile from the entrance. A spring of water bubbles from the rock near the further extremity, and flows through nearly the whole length of the cave. Elden Hole is a deep and singular chasm, opening in the side of a gentle hill, at a short distance from the village of Peak Forest, an extensive tract of land, formerly covered with wood, and now giving its name to a small village. The mouth of this frightful abyss opens nearly horizontally. It is in the shape of an irregular oval, about ninety feet from north to south, and nearly thirty from east to west in the widest part. This fissure gradually contracts, and at about seventy feet from the surface the descent is no longer practicable, on account of its steepness. On being fathomed, however, the depth is found to exceed two hundred feet. Mr. Lloyd, who descended and explored the lower parts, describes several caves, richly ornamented with stalactites. (Phil. Trans. lxiii.) In Peak Cavern, near Castleton, the scene at its entrance is peculiarly striking. The rocks within which it is hollowed, rise for about 300 feet, and nearly at a third of that height they meet and form a deep and gloomy arch. After crossing this vestibule the passage contracts, till it reaches the bank of a small lake, called the First Water, which is about forty feet across, but not more than two or three deep. The vaulted rock above it in some places is not more than two feet above the surface of the water. Beyond this, other large caverns and a second pool of water are found. In one of these spacious chambers, called the Chancel, the visitor is often unexpectedly greeted with a chorus from several women and children, placed in a cavity of the rock about fifty feet above the bottom of the cave. The whole length of the cavern is about 2250 feet, and its depth below the surface of the ground 620 feet. In the Speedwell Level, or Navigation Mine, a flight of 106 steps, beneath a vaulted arch, descends to the level where the visitor enters a boat, and is pushed forward through the chasm for about 650 yards, when the passage opens at once into a tremendous gulf, neither the bottom, top, nor sides of which can be seen. At a depth of ninety feet commences a pool of water, into which the level is drained, and which without apparent diminution of depth or extent, has received from time to time more than 40,000 tons of rubbish from blasting. Across the narrowest part of the gulf, the navigation has been carried by an arch. The depth of the fissure below the arch exceeds 300 feet; but the height of the roof has not been ascertained. Rockets have been fired to the height of 450 feet without discovering it; and the effect of a Bengal light in this stupendous cavity is truly magnificent. A level of similar length has been driven beyond the fissure; the mine, however, has been abandoned as unproductive.

Divisions.

Derbyshire is divided into six Hundreds; they are, Appletree, High Peak, Morleston and Litchurch, Repton and Gresley, Scarsdale, and Wirksworth. These contain sixteen Market Towns and 139 Parishes, situated in the Diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. Derbyshire sends four Members to the British Parliament; two for the County, and two for the Borough of Derby.

Derby.

DERBY, the County Town, and an ancient Borough returning two Members to Parliament, stands on the RBY. western bank of the river Derwent, over which it has a stone bridge. It contains five Parishes, one of which, All Saints, as we have stated above, is noted for the beautiful Gothic tower of its church, erected in the reign of Henry VIII. at the expense of the Bachelors and Maidens of the Town. The other parishes are St. Alkmund, St. Peter, St. Werburgh, and St. Michael. We have already mentioned the porcelain, silk, and cotton manufactures of the Town; the population of which in 1821 amounted to 17,423. Derby was the farthest point to which the army of Charles James penetrated in his disastrous invasion in 1745. After remaining two days within its walls, and finding himself deceived in the hopes of assistance with which he had been allured onward, the unhappy Prince determined upon a retreat. Distant from London 126 miles, 12 from Ashbourn, 19 from Loughborough. About three miles eston. north-east from Derby stands Kedleston, the superb mansion of Lord Scarsdale, the chef d'œuvre of an Architect, Adams, who was not often equally successful.

of eston. The villages of Hope, Castleton, and Brough, are situated in the beautiful vale of Castleton, to which the remains of a fortress still existing gives its name. It stands on a lofty elevation, which must have rendered it impregnable; and its foundation is attributed to William Peverel, a natural son of the Conqueror. Hence it is sometimes described as Peverel's Place in the Peke. About two miles from Castleton is a rocky eminence, composed of alternate strata of shell and micaceous grit, anciently called Mam Tor; but in later times from its decomposition, which covers the neighbouring valley for more than half a mile, it is better known as the Shivering Mountain. Buxton and Bakewell have already been described under their respective heads. About four miles from the last rworth stands Chatsworth, the magnificent seat of the Duke of Devonshire, erected at the latter end of the XVIIth century. About half that distance on the south is Haddon Hall, belonging to the Duke of Rutland, perhaps, in its later erection (for one of its towers claims the high antiquity of Edward III's time,) the most perfect specimen in the kingdom of the Elizabethan style. A very interesting and minute description of it will be found in the Archæologia, (vi.) Matlock, twelve miles north-west from Buxton, had in 1821 a resident population of 2920, which is much increased by the influx of visitors to its Baths during the season from April till November. Chesterfield is a large market Town on the west bank of the river Rother, giving its title to the Stanhope family. The Church is remarkable for a singularly twisted spire, which rises 230 feet in height. The population of the Town in 1821 was 5077, of the whole parish 9190. Not many miles from it stands Hardwick Hall, another seat of the Duke of Devonshire, erected by Elizabeth, the memorable Countess of Shrewsbury, by whom also was built the house at Chatsworth which preceded the present mansion, and also that at Oldcotes, the three most splendid palaces of that time in the County. This eminent Lady, daughter of John Hardwick, of Hardwick, became heiress of his property by the death of her only brother without issue. At fourteen she married Robert Barley, of Barley in Derbyshire, by whom she had no issue, and to whose estates she succeeded at his death. She then married Sir William Cavendish, who had been Gentleman Usher to Cardinal Wolsey, and who wrote his master's life. About the time of his marriage he had been appointed Treasurer of the Chamber to the King, and Privy Counsellor. By him, whom she survived, she had a numerous family. Her third husband was Sir William St. Lowe, who by the marriage articles settled on her a large estate in Gloucestershire. Lastly, she married George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, who bequeathed her a considerable fortune. A change of condition, says her Biographer, that perhaps never fell to any one woman; to be four times a happy wife; to rise by every husband to greater wealth and higher honours; to have a numerous issue by one husband only; to have all these children live, and honourably disposed of in her life time; and after all to live seventeen years a widow in absolute power and plenty. She died in her ninety-first year, and was buried in All Saints Church, in Derby, where a splendid mural monument, constructed under her own inspection, records the above facts, but misstates her age. Lord Orford records a tradition which may account for the Lady's passion for building, namely that she had been assured by a fortune-teller that her death should never happen while she was thus employed. Accordingly, having expended vast sums in this way, she died during a hard frost, while the workmen could not labour. At Hardwick, Mary Queen of Scots passed several years of her captivity, and the apartments which she occupied still remain very much in their original state.

ck.

ter-

DERBY. — DE-RELICT.

Hardwick Hall.

Pilkington, View of Present State of Derbyshire, 2 vols. 8vo, 1789; Hutton, History of Derby, 1791; Wonders of the Peak.

DERE, see Dear.

DERELI'CT, n. } Derelinquere, derelictum, to forDERELI'CT, adj. } sake, to abandon; (de, re, and DERELI'CTION. } linquere, to leave.)

Forsaken, abandoned, deserted, left destitute.

And therefore the affections, which these exposed or derelict children bear to their mothers, have no grounds of nature or assiduity, but civility and opinion.

Taylor. The Great Exemplar, fol. 37.

And however such symbolical intimations receive their efficacy from the fancy of the contriver, yet here, whether this apparition [the dove] did intend any such morall representment or no, it is certain that wherever the Holy Spirit does dwell, there also peace and sanctity, meekness and charity, a mortified will, and an active dereliction of our desires do inhabite.

Taylor. The Great Exemplar, fol. 143.

The state of idolaters is two ways miserable. First, in that which they worship they finde no succour, and secondly, at his hands whom they ought to serve, there is no other thing to be looked for, but the effects of most iust displeasure, the withdrawing of grace, dereliction in this world, and in the world to come confusion. Hooker. Ecclesiastical Polity, book v. fol. 209.

DERELICT. DERIDE.

You must mean, without an explicite and particular repentance, and derelection of their errors.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. Ch. Answer to the Preface.

When I am a little disposed to a gay turn of thinking, I consider, as I was a derelict from my cradle, I have the honour of a lawful claim to the best protection in Europe.
Savage. The Wanderer, can. 5. note.

It was one of those subtile artifices of Julian the Apostate, to mingle the images of the heathen Gods with those of the emperors, that the doing reverence (as the Christians were commanded) to all together, might imply a derelection and renouncing of their religion, and their simplicity seem impiety.
Bates. Eternal Judgment, ch. v.

As those who joined with them in manning the vessels were the most directly opposite to his [Lord Chatham] opinions, measures, and character, and far the most artful and most powerful of the set, they easily prevailed, so as to seize upon the vacant, unoccupied, and derelict minds of his friends; and instantly they turned the vessel wholly out of the course of his policy.
Burke. On American Taxation.

It [this holy sacrament] is a professed derelection of former evil habits; a solemn return, on our part, to God and virtue, under the firm trust that God will, through Jesus Christ, show mercy to the frailties of the penitent.
Blair. Sermon 15. vol. iii.

DERELICT, in Law, any thing forsaken or left, or wilfully cast away by the owner. Derelict lands, if they are of considerable size, and suddenly left, belong to the King, as being Lord of the Sea, and so owner of the soil whilst covered with water; it is therefore reasonable that he should have the soil when left dry; but if the Derelict land is gained by small and imperceptible degrees by the sea shrinking back, it belongs to the owner of the adjoining lands.

DERI'DE, DERI'DER, DERI'DINGLY, DERI'SION, DERI'SIVE, DERI'SIVELY, DERI'SORY.

Lat. deridere; de, and ridere, to laugh; of unknown Etymology. It. deridere.

To laugh at; to mock or make a mockery of; to jeer, to scorn, to treat scornfully or jeeringly.

As in al tymes have the tyrants derided the Godly, whyls they paciētly waited for God's helpe.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. iii.

But nowe they that are myne inferyours and younger than I, haue me in derision; yea, euen they whose fathers I would haue thoughte scorne to haue set with the dogges of my cattell.
Bible, Anno 1551. Job, ch. xxx.

But loe, the Gods, that mortall follies view,
Did worthilie reuenge this maiden's pride;
And nought regarding her so goodly hew,
Did laugh at her, that many did deride.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book vi. can. 7.

If Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a river of Paradise, they might justly have thought that he had derided them.
Ralegh. History of the World, book i. ch. iii. sec. 14.

When Diogenes fell into the school of the Stoicks; he answers his deriders, with this question: Why, do you laugh at me for falling backward, when you yourselves do retrograde your lives?
Feltham. Resolves 8.

And in the same epistle deridinglie commendeth them, as wise men, that had rather lose their faith than their flocke.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 635. Council of Basill.

——— And now and then
A tear or two, as in derision of
The toughness of his rugged temper, would Fall on his hollow cheeks, which but once felt,
A sudden flash of fury did dry up.
Massinger. The Unnatural Combat, act ii. sc. 1.

The Persians (ware) thence called Magussæi derisively by other ethnicks.
Sir Thomas Herbert. Travels, p. 243.

DEI

Mr. Richard Cromwel, besides other reproachful language, taxing him in a deriding manner, whether he would have him prefer none but those that were Godly? "Here continued he, is Dick Ingoldsby, who can neither pray nor preach, and yet I will trust him before ye all."
Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 171.

Of all sorts of sinners, there is the least hopes of a prophane derider and scoffer at religion: other men may do as bad things, but they have something left within them which may in time reclaim them; but these cast off the very means of reforming them.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 1. vol. iii.

The appellation of esquire is the most notoriously abused in this kind of any class amongst men, insomuch that it is become almost the subject of derision.
Tatler, No. 19.

Meantime, o'er all the dome, they quaff, they feast,
Damœtas taunts were spread from guest to guest,
And each in jovial mood his mate addressed.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book ii.

The comick or derisory manner, is further still from making shew of method.
Shaftesbury. Advice to an Author, part ii. sec. 2.

Like the rake of antiqnity, who mingled in the audience of a philosopher, with a design to ridicule him, but who was made a convert before his departure, many of the loose and profligate votaries of vice have been enticed by the music, afterwards reformed by the sermon, which they intended to slight, and perhaps had begun to deride.
Knox. Essays, No. 149.

British policy is brought into derision in those nations, that a while ago trembled at the power of our arms, whilst they looked up with confidence to the equity, firmness, and candour, which shone in all our negotiations.
Burke. On the Present Discontents.

DERI'VE, DERI'VABLE, DERI'VATE, DERIVA'TION, DERI'VATIVE, adj. DERI'VATIVE, n. DERI'VATIVELY, DERI'VEMENT, DERI'VER, DERI'VING, n.

Fr. deriver; Sp. derivar; It. derivare; Lat. derivare; de, and rivus, from ῥέ-ω, to flow. See ARRIVE, and the Quotation from Holland's Livy.

To flow from, to deflow; to flow down, to descend; to have the source or origin from, to rise or spring from; to take, draw or deduce the source or origin from; generally, to draw, to draw down, to drain, to deduce or educe. Also, to flow, to diffuse.

Wel may men knowen, but if he be a fool,
That every part deriveth from his hool.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 3008.

So through the ryghteousnes of one, which is derived into all suche as beleue and submitte themselfe vnto the kyngdome of lyfe, are all men of God made righteous and partakers of the kyngdome of lyfe.
Udall. Romaines, ch. v.

Ne henceforth be rebellious vnto loue,
That is the crowne of knighthood, and the band
Of noble minds deriued from aboue:
Which being knit with vertue neuer will remoue.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iv. can. 6.

Perfumes shall not my breath belie,
Nor clothes my body glorify,
They shall derive their honour, 'cause I wear 'em.
Brome. Songs. Reasons of Love.

Nay, rather, how should those works which are constant and ordinary, and so consequently derivable to all successions to the end of the world, be imposed upon a mere extraordinary agent.
Hall. Works, vol. iii. fol. 153. Episcopacy by Divine Right, part ii. sec. 6.

But this kind of writing, which seems to be reformed, which is, that writing should be consonant to speaking, is a branch of unprofitable subtelties; for pronunciation it selfe every day encreases and alters the fashion; and the derivation of words, especially from forrain languages, are utterly defac'd and extinguish't.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi. ch. v.

But created beings have but a derivative participation hereof, [truth] their understandings being obscure, and they erring in many things, and being ignorant of more.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 720.

If therefore any humane constitution, as such, can bind the conscience, it must be of such instances which either are derivatives from the law of nature, or of things which before the law did bind at all, that is, of things which in their own nature are indifferent. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book iii. ch. i.

It is certain, and affirmed by all antiquity upon many grounds of Scripture, That Adam sinned, and his sin was personally his, but derivatively ours; that is, it did great hurt to us, to our bodies directly, to our souls indirectly and accidentally.

Id. Pol. Dis. fol. 747. On Repentance, ch. vii. sec. 1.

For our experiments are onely such as do ever ascend a degree to the deriving of causes and extracting of axiomes.

Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 7. sec. 176.

Then went hee on still, and shewed what was the solemne and right manner of deriving the water.

Holland. Livy, fol. 190.

I offer these derivements from these subjects, to rise our affections upward.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 4. part ii. sec. 4.

Resume your ancient care; and if the God
Your sire, and you, resolve on foreign blood:
Know all are foreign, in a larger sense,
Not born your subjects, or deriv'd from hence.

Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book vii.

I might add to all the past dissuasives, the ill repute that curses gain a man amongst the most scrupulous and preciser sort of people, who, judging of the greatness of the vice by the smallness of the advantage that is derivable from it, will hardly believe him to be the owner of much piety, that will slight it upon so little a temptation. Boyle. A Dissuasive from Cursing.

The Scripture, in declaring the Son's derivation from the Father, never makes mention of any limitation of time; but always supposes and affirms him to have existed with the Father from the beginning and before all worlds.

Clarke. On the Trinity, p. 246.

But I think the words should rather be rendered, the antientest of all derivative beings, for so the word [δημιούργημα] may be understood in a larger sense. Id. Ib. 245.

Such an one to be sure, it is that makes a man, not only (according to the Apostle's phrase) a partner of other men's sins, but also a deriver of the whole entire guilt of them to himself: and yet so, as to leave the committer of them as full of guilt as he was before. South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 198.

If they mean that a contempt of these miracles, which they would persuade us to believe, would necessarily derive the same contempt on history itself; all experience has shown the contrary, for though their have been doubters and contemners of such miracles in all ages, yet history has maintained its grounds through them all.

Middleton. Works, vol. i. p. 175. An Enquiry into the Miraculous Powers, &c.

Whether we consider poetry in particular, and discourse in general, as imitative or descriptive, it is evident, that their whole power in recalling the impressions of real objects, is derived from the significancy of words. Blair. Lecture 5. vol. i.

The dictates of the sense of honour are capable of directing those who possess it, if you will believe themselves, more safely and infallibly on the path of rectitude and happiness than any light derivable from philosophy and religion.

Knox. Works, vol. iii. p. 355. Winter Evenings, even. 81.

The Apostle, in the preceding verse, had warned Timothy against giving heed to fables and endless genealogies: meaning by genealogies, the derivation of angelic and spiritual natures according to a fantastic system, invented by the oriental philosophers, and thence adopted by some of the Grecian sects.

Hurd. Works. Sermon 8. vol. vi.

He supposes people of fashion, according to the old derivation of lucus a non lucendo, to be spoken of those who do nothing. But this is too general, and would include all the beggars in the nation. Fielding. The Covent Garden Journal, No. 37.

But that use bears a derivative value is implied in the very term, for whatever may have been said concerning things beautiful or laudable in themselves, we never hear them styled usefull in themselves but for something else, that is, so far as they tend to improve our condition, or contribute to our enjoyment, either immediately or remotely in some respect or other.

Search. Light of Nature, vol. ii. ch. xxiii.

Since the disciples of this new and great high priest become righteous in him, and are by the spirit conformed to his image, the character which essentially and inherently belongs only to him, will derivatively belong to them also, who must follow his steps below, if they would reign with him above.

Horne. Works, vol. ii. p. 75. Commentary on Psalm 15.

DERMAPTERA, in Zoology, an order of Mandibulated insects, first proposed by De Geer, but revived and restricted by Mr. Kirby.

The insect to which the latter has referred it was placed by Linnæus in his Coleoptera, and by Latreille and Lamarck in the order Orthoptera; Fabricius placed it with his Ulonata. In fact, they appear to be the connecting family between the two above named orders.

Ordinal character. Elytræ somewhat crustaceous, short, square, the suture straight; wings membranaceous, externally coriaceous, large, folded transversely, and longitudinally; anus armed with horny and movable forceps; body linear, depressed; antennæ inserted before the eyes, composed of twelve to thirty joints; mandibles bidentate; palpi distinct, filiform; tarsi three-jointed.

This order only contains one family, which as it is equivalent to the genus Forficula, may be termed Forficulidæ.

DERMATOBRANCHUS, in Zoology, a genus of mollusca, established by Dr. Hasselquist in his Letters on the Mollusca of Java.

Generic character. Body flat, semicircular; mouth below, tentaculæ extensile, placed just under the edge of the mantle, retractile, (but not inversile,) short, close together, without any black spot; foot broad, very distinct from the mantle; mantle thin, flexible, before, rounded, behind narrow, pointed, with edge of the sides reflexed; back rugose, with elongated pustules or striæ performing the office of gills; the groove on the right side, between the foot and the mantle, with three apertures, the first near the head, belonging to the organs of generation, (of both sexes,) the second, the anus, and the third, the secretory organ. Hermaphrodite.

Dr. Hasselquist describes three species of this genus which is nearly allied to Cavolina.

D. striatus. Body black, variegated with yellow and brown; back mucous, grooved; grooves simple, longitudinal, straight, parallel; head and feet edged with yellow, tip of the tentaculæ black; mantle nicked in front. Common in Java.

D. pustulosus. Back variegated with yellow, violet, and black, covered with a series of pustules; tentaculæ black.

D. gonatophorus. Back variegated with yellow, violet, and black, grooved; grooves oblique, transverse, parallel, on each side of the dorsal line, edge waved.

DERMESTIDÆ, Dermestini, in Zoology, a family of Coleopterous insects, proposed by Latreille.

Family character. Antennæ straight, longer than the head, composed of nine joints, the end club-shaped, formed of three large perfoliated joints; mandibles short, thick; palpi short, filiform; body oval or ovoid, thick, convex; head small, inclined; feet short, not contractile.

DERMESTIDÆ. — DERN.

The larva and perfect insects of the family live upon putrid animal substances.

This family contains the genera Attagenus, Dermestes, and Megatoma.

DERMESTES, in Zoology, a genus of Coleopterous insects, established by Linnæus, and the type of the family Dermestidæ.

Generic character. Mandible short, thick, slightly arched, toothed at the end; palpi very short, nearly filiform; antennæ a little longer than the head, ending in a large oval club, formed of three joints; body oval, thick, convex, rounded behind; head small, inclined; thorax broader than the head, sinuated behind; elytræ bent under the sides of the body.

This genus, as established by Linnæus, included all the Coleopterous insects with a three-jointed club-shaped antenna; but it has been restricted by Latreille and others to those which agree with the above more definite characters.

The genus Dermestes has considerable affinity with the genera Megatoma and Attagenus; but it differs from the first, in the sternum not being produced over the mouth like a neckcloth, and from the latter, in the club being short, and not ovate elongated.

These insects are generally too well known by Zoologists by the ravages which they make in Natural History collections, for they eat with voracity all sorts of animal and vegetable substances, and, indeed, by some late accounts they appear to draw nourishment from some inorganic bodies.

The larva is long, rather hairy, formed of twelve distinct joints, the last ending in a tuft of very long hairs; the head is scaly, armed with very hard and prominent jaws, two antennæ, and short beards; legs six, scaly, ending in a bent claw. These animals change their skin several times before they pass into the pupa or nympha state, when they are immovable, and change into the perfect insects in a few days.

The Dermestes like dark places, their walk is timid and uncertain, they sometimes advance quickly and stop in an instant, as if from some unseen danger. When they are touched they draw in their legs, head, and antennæ, and are perfectly immovable, so as to appear dead.

The Dermestes are very common in Europe, and several species are found in other parts of the World also. They are usually met with on putrid animal and vegetable substances. The last Catalogue of species takes notice of forty-six, several of which are exotic.

The type of the genus is D. Lardarius, Lin.

Very common near London.

Geoffroy gave this name to a very different genus of insects, but his name has not been adopted.

DERMOBRANCHIATA, in Mollusca, the name given by Dumeril to a family in his first order of Gasteropodes.

Family character. Branchiæ external, in the form of lamina, filaments, or little trees.

Containing the genera Doris, Tritonia, Scyllea, Eolida, Phyllidia, Patella, Haliotis, and Chiton.

DERN, DE'RNFUL, DE'RNFULLY. A. S. dyrran, occultare, to hide, to conceal, to secrete. See DARN.

Hidden, secreted, concealed. Used consequentially,

Solitary, lonely, sad, dismal, melancholy, mournful, lamentable.

DERN — DERO GATE

þo he hadde þe kyng in priuete al clene at ys wille,
Sire, he seide of derne cas ich wol þe warre stille.
R. Gloucester, p. 114.

þo þys holy man ymartred was, hii, þat hym þer brozte to,
By þozte how hii myzte best myd þe holy body do.
Hii porueyde an derne stude, & þer inne yt caste,
Vyllyche & styllelyche, & bured yt þer vaste.
Id. p. 289.

For þat derne dede. do no man sholde
Bot wedded men with wyves. as holy writ telleþ.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 181.

And also Dominikes dedes weren dernelich yused.
Id. Crede, D. 2.

Ye mosten be ful derne as in this cas.
Chaucer. The Millereȝ Tale, v. 3297.

For loue is of him selfe so derne.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 19.

Gow. By many a dearn and painful perch
Of Pericles the careful search
Is made. Shakspeare. Pericles, act iii.

——— Next stroke him should haue slaine,
Had not the lady which by him stood bound
Dernely vnto her called to abstaine,
From doing him to dye.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 12.

At last, as chaunc't them by a forest side
To pass, (for succour from the scorching ray)
They heard a rueful voice, that dearnly cride
With piercing shriekes, and many a dolefull lay.
Id. Ib. book ii. can. 1.

Long they thus trauelled in friendly wise,
Through countries waste and eke well edyfide,
Seeking adventures hard, to exercise
Their puissance, whylome full dernly tride.
Id. Ib. book iii. can. 1.

——— Unweetingly dismay'd
A cold foreboding impulse thrills his breast:
And who but Kathrin now is dearnly fray'd
When entering in she kens the stranger guest.
Mickle. Syr Martyn, can. 2.

DERO, in Zoology, a genus of Annelides, near the genus Neries, established by Ocken.

Generic character. Destitute of eyes, gills distinct; tail enlarged into the form of a more or less lobed leaf.

This genus includes two species: 1. D. Cæca, Nais Cæca, Linnæus; 2. D. Florifera, Nais Florifera, Linnæus.

DERO'GATE, v. DERO'GATE, adj. DERO'GATELY, DEROGA'TION, DERO'GATIVE, DERO'GATORILY, DERO'GATORY. Derogare, atum; (de, and rogare, from ὀρέγ-ειν, to stretch, to reach after; and thus, to seek, to ask, to demand.) Rogare legem proferre, abrogare cum tollitur, derogare, si pars tollatur. Vossius. See ABROGATE. And Festus, Derogare, propriè est, cum quid ex lege vetere, quo minus fiat, sancitur lege novâ. Derogare ergo detrahere est.—To derogate, then, is

To take or detract, sc. from any thing established by law or otherwise; to deduct from, lessen or diminish the authority, the reputation; to degrade, disparage, debase.

And neither willeth he, nor may not doe any thinge including repugnaunce, imperfection, or that should derogate, minish or hurt his glory & his name.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1121. A Treatise upon the blessed Sacrament of the Altar.

The Cardinall of Winchester, whiche at this time would haue no man to hym egall, commaunded the Duke of Bedforde to leaue of the name of Regent, duryng the tyme that the kyng was in Fraunce: affirmyng the chief ruler beyng in presence, the authoritie of the substitute, was clerely derogate.
Hall. Henry VI. The tenth Yer.

Than y^e^ stryfe was renewed, which Lamfranke before, as ye haue harde in the iii. chapitre of Wyllyam Conquerour, dyd appeace, and was brought i argumēt before the Pope, the whiche, at the Kynges request, promysed y^t^ he wolde nothynge do nor ordeyn y^t^ shulde be derogacion to the Archebysshop of Canterbury, or to the dygnytie of his churche. Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 228.

Oft (that he thus the world may more amaze)
Weake instruments worke wonderfull effects:
That, due to him, none may usurpe one thought,
Nor from his glory derogate in ought.
Stirling. Jonathan.

Into her wombe conuey stirrility,
Drie up in her the organs of increase,
And from her derogate body, neuer spring
A babe to honor her. Shakspeare. Lear, fol. 289.

——— More laught at, that I should Once name you derogately: when to sound your name
It not concern'd me.
Id. Antony and Cleopatra, fol. 345.

The last week I heard of a play the Jesuits of Antwerp made, in derogation, or rather in derision of the proceedings of the Prince Palsgrave. Howell. Letter 16. book i. sec. 2.

It may rationally be presumed, that I had been a very senseless fool, if ever I had been for promoting such an authority and interest over me, as levelled all, and was so totally destructive to all that differenced, myself and other noblemen, from their own vassals, which many say I was too earnest in, yea, it being absurdly derogative to all true nobility.
State Trials. Proceedings against the Marquis of Argyle, 1661.

Nor have my actions been derogatory,
Unto my clients profit, or the glory
Of this renowned court, and therefore I
Now humble beg to be at liberty.
Brome. To the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

He was of a high rough spirit, and spake derogatorily of Sir Amias Paulet.
Aubrey. Of Cardinal Wolsey. Anec. 2. 187.

There is no room therefore to object, that we derogate from the majesty of the Father; seeing that whatever majesty we shall ascribe to the Son must all redound to the magnifying of the power of him, who begat a Son of such divinity and majesty.
Clarke. On the Trinity, sec. 45. p. 333.

I hope it is no derogation to the Christian religion, to say that the fundamentals of it, i. e. all that is necessary to be believed in it by all men, is easy to be understood by all men.
Locke. Works, vol. ii. fol. 552. Of the Reasonableness of Christianity, &c.

So vain are the cavils of those who say, we have nothing but meer probabilities for our faith, and do interpret that manner of proof which matters of fact are capable of, in a sense derogatory to the firmness of our Christian faith.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 5. vol. i.

Let no one imagine that in the religious part of this character there is any thing which casts over it a gloomy shade, or derogates from that esteem which men are generally disposed to yield to exemplary virtues. Blair. Sermon 1. vol. iii.

False; because their brevaries and litanies shew, that they supplicate the saints to befriend them by their own inherent power, or to intercede for them to the throne of God by virtue of their own personal merits, in blasphemous derogation to the all-atoning and incommunicable intercession of Jesus.
Hurd. Works. Sermon 11. vol. v.

DERRING, in Spenser, seems plainly to mean Daring.

So from immortal race he does proceed
That mortall hands may not withstand his might,
Drad for his derring doe and bloudy deed;
For all in bloud and spoile is his delight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 4.

One day, when all the troupe of warlike wooers
Assembled were, to weet whose she should bee;
All mightie men, and dreadfull derring doers
(The harder it to make them well agree)
Amongst them all this end he did decree.
Id. Ib. book iv.

From thence I durst in derring to compare
With shepheards swaine, whateuer fed in field.
Id. Shepheard's Calendar. December.

DERRIS, in Botany, a genus of the class Diadelphia, order Decandria. Generic character: calyx tubular, coloured, margin five-lobed; corolla, petals four, keel ovate, petals furnished with a filiform claw; pod oblong, membranaceous.

Two species, D. pinnata, native of the woods of Cochin-China, and D. trifoliata, native of Canton. Loureiro.

DERRIS, in Zoology, a genus of animals, most probably related to the Annelides, very imperfectly known, and only described by Mr. John Adams in the Linnæan Transactions, vol. iii.

Generic character. Body long, enclosed in an external membranaceous, transparent sort of tube, furnished with numerous joints to facilitate its flexion, pointed behind, head rather larger than the body, retractile with two cylindrical tentaculæ on its top; mouth deeply divided into two lips, of which the upper is long and pointed. Inhabit the coast of Pembrokeshire.

DERVIS.

DERVIS, which is only a slight deviation from the Persian word Dervísh, (Durwesh, as it is sometimes spelt, according to an inelegant system of orthography, and the provincial pronunciation current in India,) is a mere translation of the Arabic word Fakír, both signifying poor, and applied particularly to those who, professing an exclusive devotion to the service of God, and a total absorption in the contemplation of the Divinity, have neither leisure nor inclination to acquire even the means of subsistence; and are, therefore, restricted to a life of poverty, depending for all their sustenance upon the alms which are given in compliance with the Law of God.*

Dervísh, or Fakír, is thence the general term for a mendicant Devotee, among the Musulmáns of Asia and Africa, and is applied equally to those who belong to Monastic Orders, and to such as lead an Ascetic life without attaching themselves to any religious community; for there are throughout Africa multitudes of Devotees of both classes, as will soon be shown, not only among the Mohammedans, but also among the worshippers of Brahmà. The mind of man is, indeed, essentially the same, in every climate and under every combination of circumstances; and any one who shall take the trouble to mark the numerous coinci-

Resemblance between the Roman Catholics and Mohammedans.

* Fi-sebili'llah, i. e. In the path of God; for God's sake. A phrase continually in the mouths of the Arabs, which led Mrs. Tully into a curious mistake; for she has given fisby in her Vocabulary as the Tunisian word for alms. (See Letters on Tunis,) She was not aware that lillah should not be separated from fisby.

DERVIS. dences which may be found in all the different forms of superstition which have prevailed in distant regions and remote ages, will be astonished to find how constantly the same general principle recurs, only modified and disguised by local peculiarities and habits. Every one knows that there are not two sects of Christians professedly more opposed to each other in doctrine and practice, than the Roman Catholics and the Methodists; and yet a Prelate of our Church (Bishop Lavington) long ago indicated so many points of resemblance between them, as must have astonished all who had not been led by their speculations to form such a comparison, and showed by what a variety of paths the same evil principles will gain possession of the mind, and lead to the same absurd and erroneous conclusions. A case strictly parallel is presented by the numerous points of coincidence between the practical doctrines of the Mohammedans and of the Roman Catholic Church; and few subjects are more worthy of the attention of those who make Mohammedan literature a part of their studies, than a careful examination of the corresponding doctrines and practices of the two Religions, and an investigation of the steps by which they have been engrafted on a system so remote from Christianity, as pure unsophisticated Mohammedanism, such as we see it exemplified in the reformed doctrine of the Wahábís. As this question is only indirectly connected with the subject of the present paper, the reader will think perhaps that too much has been said upon it already; we cannot, however, resist the temptation of briefly naming a few of the leading coincidences, in the hope that this mention of them may attract the notice of some abler Orientalist, who can give the subject all the attention and labour which it deserves. When the traveller sees the pious Musulmáns praying round the tomb of the Válihdeh Sultán, at Iyyúb, near Constantinople, must he not immediately suspect that they are offering up prayers for the soul of the deceased? If he turn to the grave-stones near the Mosque hard by, his suspicions are confirmed at once; for he reads on every one of them an injunction to say a *Fátihah for the departed soul. When we learn from the Mohammedan Catechism, that "of those true believers who enter Hell-fire, no one remaineth in it eternally, but entereth into Paradise, after that he hath been punished according to the measure of his transgressions," can we doubt whether the Mohammedans hold the doctrine of Purgatory? When we see the sacred rosaries brought from Mekkah; the votive rags tied round every bush near the shrine of a Saint, commemorative of cures performed by his influence; and the various prostrations and genuflexions by which the prayers of a Musulmán are accompanied;—are we not powerfully reminded of the beads, wax eyes and noses, tied with pink ribands to some wonder-working tombstone, and the bowings and crossings of the Roman Catholics. Is not the veneration for the Hadís or "Sayings and Doings" of the Prophet, traditionally recorded by his companions, of which there is not a word in the Corán, exactly parallel with the Traditions of the Roman Church? But in no point is the resemblance more striking than in the crowds of Ascetics by which almost every Mohammedan country is overrun.

The notions of superior holiness and excellence so readily amalgamate themselves with those of an entire dedication to Religion, that a truly devout spirit may be easily misled by its fervour, to overlook the mixed nature of man's condition here, and to persuade itself that all religious duties are concentrated in contemplation. When to this inclination so to generalize devotion, is superadded the indolence generated by a burning climate, it is manifest that an Ascetic life must in the tropical portions of the earth have attractions of which the natives of colder regions can form no adequate conception. We need not, therefore, be surprised to find Monasticism first springing up among the Christian communities in Egypt, and to hear of Ascetics among the followers of Mohammed, whose system does not seem calculated to favour such Institutions.

If, however, the Oriental accounts can be trusted, they must have received at least the tacit approbation of the Prophet; for the Súffes or Mystics of the Mohammedan world, believe that they owe their origin to forty-five citizens of Mekkah, and as many of Medínah, who in the first year of the Hijrah, (A. D. 622,) bound themselves by a vow to remain faithful to the Prophet; to hold all their property in common; and to lead a life of penitence and mortification. If the Greek word σοφὸς be the real etymology of this name, we may rest assured that it is more modern than the time of Mohammed; for the Arabians had then but little intercourse with the Greeks, not to say that the Sophists were Philosophers and not Devotees. Súf, a coarse white woollen robe, furnishes a much more plausible etymology; but the very uncertainty respecting the origin and meaning of the name implies an equal uncertainty with regard to the early history of the Order. The first holy personage who bore the name was Abúl Hasan, who died A. H. 150 = A. D. 767, which seems to give some clue to the period when these Ascetics sprung up. It should be also observed, that their vow of perpetual poverty is built upon a saying of the Prophet; El facru fakhrì!—Poverty is my Glory!

The two first distinct Orders of these Devotees are said to have been founded by the Khalifs Abú Bekr and Alí, who presided over their fraternities and prescribed the religious exercises by which they were distinguished. Their followers, like those of the Prophet, were called Khalífahs, (Vicars or Deputies,) and the first was succeeded by Selmán Fárisì; the other by Hasan Basrí, both great names in the Annals of Mohammedan Mysticism.

From these two Fraternities sprang all the rest; according as ambition, or jealousy, or mere fanaticism stimulated some of their members to strike out a new path, and practise some unheard-of austerities, which might be more meritorious than those of their rivals. Uweïs, of Carn in Yemen, declared (A. H. 37, = A. D. 657) that the Archangel Gabriel had commanded him in the name of the Lord, to lead a life of abstinence and retirement. The rules of his institution were imparted by the same heavenly messenger, just as the Virgin delivered the scapulary and coat of arms of the Carmelites to St. Elias on Mount Carmel; but it does not appear that it was by the order of heaven, that Uweïs pulled out all his teeth, because the Prophet had lost two in the battle of Ohod. As this holy man predicted that an Angel would do the same pious act for all his followers, it is not likely that

* The Fatihah, or "opening chapter" of the Coran, is said by Musulmans just as Christians say the Lord's Prayer.

DERVIS. he had many, or that his Order ever extended beyond the bounds of Yemen.

Two and thirty is the number of the religious Orders now existing in the Turkish Empire; all but three of which (the Bestámí, Nacshbendí, and Bek-táshí,) are derived from the congregation founded by Alí. In the following Table they are arranged in chronological order, and the names and age of their respective founders are annexed. DERVIS.

Religious Orders of the Mohammedans.

Name.	Founder.	Time and place of his death.	A. H.	A. D.
Olwání	Sheïkh Olwán	Jiddah	149	766
Ed-hemí	Ibráhím ibn Ed-hem	Damascus	161	777
Bestámí	Báyazíd Bestámí	Jebel Bestám	261	874
Sacatí	Sirrí Sacatí	Baghdád	295	907
Cádirí	Abdu'l-cádir Gilání	Ditto	561	1165
Rufáïí	Seyyid Ahmed Rufáïí	Near ditto	578	1182
Suhherwerdí	Shihábu'd-dín Suhherwerdí	Ditto	602	1205
Kubreví	Nejmu'd-dín Kubrà	Khwárezm	617	1220
Sházilí	Abú'l Hasan Sházilí	Mekkah	656	1258
Mevleví	Jelálu'd-dín Mevlá-nà	Cónyah	672	1273
Bedeví	Abú'l-fetán Ahmed Bedeví	Egypt	675	1276
Nacshbendí	Pír Mohammed Nacshbendí	Persia	719	1319
Sádí	Sádu'd-dín Jebawí	Near Damascus	736	1335
Bek-táshí	Hájí Bek-tásh Khorásání	Kir-sheher	759	1357
Khalvetí	Omar Khalvetí	Caïsaríyeh	800	1397
Zeïní	Zeïnu'd-dín Khafí	Kúfah	838	1434
Bábáï	Abdu'l-ghaní, Pír Bábáï	Adrianople	870	1465
Beïrámí	Hájí Beïrám Ancarevì	Angora	876	1471
Eshrefí	Eshref Rúmí	Chin-Iznic	899	1493
Bekrí	Abú Bekr Vefáï	Aleppo	902	1496
Sunbulí	Sunbul Yúsuf Bóleví	Constantinople	936	1529
Gulshení, or Rúshení	Ibráhím Gulshení	Cairo	940	1533
Yigit-báshí	Shemsu'd-dín Yigit-báshí	Magnesia	951	1544
Umm-Sinání	Sheïkh Umm-Sinán	Constantinople	959	1552
Jelvetí	Pír Uftádeh Jelvetí	Búrsah	988	1580
Oshákí	Husámu'd-dín Oshákí	Constantinople	1001	1592
Shemsí	Shemsu'd-dín-Sívásí	Near Medínah	1010	1601
Sinán Ummí	Alím Sinán Ummí	Elmahlì	1079	1668
Niyází	Mohammed Niyází Misrí	Lemnos	1106	1694
Murádí	Murád Shámí	Constantinople	1132	1719
Núru'd-dín	Núru'd-dín Jeráhhí	Ditto	1146	1735
Jemálí	Jemálu'd-dín Edirneví	Ditto	1164	1750

The dates here given were extracted by Mouradgea d'Ohsson (Tableau, iv. 622) from a sort of genealogical table of the Monastic Orders, drawn up by Alí Efendí, Sheïkh of the Jemálíes, in 1783, but the earliest are not perhaps to be relied upon. Some of these names occur in Hájí Khalífah's Chronological Tables, and are there found under different years, and Abú'l Fedà (Annales Muslem. ii. 215) places the death of Sirrí Sacatí in A. H. 251, (A. D. 866,) more than forty years earlier than the time given by Alí Efendí. One inference, however, may be fairly deduced from this Table; that these Institutions were not formed by the Musulmáns so soon as the Dervíshes would have it believed, and that, like the Monastic Orders among Christians, they multiplied in proportion as the pure faith in the Corán declined; for we find no new Orders established in the first century and a half of the Mohammedan era, and no less than six in the Xth.

Those here enumerated, are many of them scarcely known beyond the Turkish Empire; but others, such as the Nacshbendíes and Mevlevíes are common in Persia and India. It appears that they formerly had Religious Houses in those countries also, though it is probable that they may have lost them in the many revolutions which have desolated that part of Asia. The Abdálíes, of whom so much is heard in India, seem to be entirely itinerant, as are the Calenders, but none of the Orders already named. For all these communities are properly stationary, though some of them occasionally send out a portion of their members to collect alms from the pious. The regularly itinerant Dervíshes in Turkey are all foreigners or outcasts, who, though expelled from their Orders for misconduct, find the profession too agreeable and profitable to be willingly abandoned; and therefore set up for themselves, and under the colour of sanctity fleece their more honest and industrious neighbours. Itinerant Dervishes.

All, except the Nacshbendíes, are considered as living in seclusion from the world; but that Order, which answers very nearly to the Confraternities among Nacshbendies.

DERVIS. the Roman Catholics, is entirely composed of persons who, without quitting the world, bind themselves to a strict observance of certain forms of devotion, and meet once a week, usually on Thursday, after the fifth daily service is over, to perform those works of supererogation together. The most indispensable part of their engagements is to repeat the Istaghfar (Lord have mercy upon us !) at least once; the Salavát (Lord give thy peace and blessing to Mohammed and his family as thou gavest them to Abraham and his family, &c.) seven times; the Fátihah (first Chapter of the Corán) seven times; and the 94th and 112th Chapters of the same book, nine times. When assembled, the senior member recites the prayers, and the rest shout out Hú (He !) or Allah ! at the close of each.

Noviciate. Each of these Orders has its peculiar statutes, exercises, and habits. Most of them impose a Noviciate, the length of which depends upon the spiritual state of the candidate, who is sometimes kept for a whole year under this kind of discipline. A continual repetition of the Esmâ Iláhí, (the Divine names,) or seven principal attributes of God, is the leading exercise enjoined on every Dervísh; and the form of initiation consists in a solemn and gradual impression of those holy phrases on the mind and memory of the Novice. They are: 1. Lá Iláhí ill' Allah ! There is no God but God ! 2. Yá Allah ! O God ! 3. Yá Hù ! O He ! 4. Yá Hacc ! O Just God ! 5. Yá Haï ! O Living God ! 6. Yá Cayyùm ! O Existing God ! 7. Yá Cahhár ! O Avenging God ! These phrases are considered as expressing the Unity, Omnipotence, Eternity, Justice, Life, Existence, and Avenging power of the Deity; and each of them is whispered by the Superior into the ear of the candidate three times, in a full assembly of all the brethren. A considerable period is allowed to elapse before a second of these Esmá is imparted, and the Novice is bound to give the Superior a faithful report of his dreams during that interval, as an evidence of his spiritual progress. The Novice is termed Kochek, (Camp-follower,) and the Superior is his Murshid, (Director,) the Noviciate is called a Chilleh, and Tekmíl Suluc (Completion of the Paths) is the phrase by which the completion of the Noviciate is expressed.

Noviciate of the Mevlevies. In the form of the Noviciate, each Order has some peculiarities, and those of the Mevlevíes are not the least remarkable. A thousand and one days* is the time prescribed for the Noviciate; and the place where the Novice is to perfect his spiritual knowledge is no other than the kitchen of the Convent ! Carah-cúllúcchi (Scullion) is his appropriate title; and the Ash-jì-báshí (i. e. Head Cook) of the Convent presents him to the Sheïkh (Superior) in the solemn assembly held at the close of his initiation. That venerable and culinary Dervísh also assists in the ceremony of his admission into the Order, and holds his head while the Superior lifting up his cap repeats this distich from the Mesnevì of Jelálu'd-dín, their founder:

Ser zi-hevà yáftenl'st serverl'st,
Terki hevà cuvveti Peïghamberl'st.

"To feel oneself liberated from the bondage of desire is indeed to enjoy supreme dominion ! To abandon ones domineering passions is indeed to exercise a power which the Prophet only can give !" A Prayer, called Tekbír, is then chanted, the Sheïkh places the cylindrical cap (kuláh) on the Novice's head, and DERV. he squats down with all humility, beside the Head Cook, in the middle of the room; while the Superior pronounces the form of admission, gives him a lecture on his new vocation, and recommends him to the good wishes of the rest of the brethren.

A fanatical spirit is always hostile to innocent Amus. amusements; and if Mohammed were not fanatic enough himself to debar the faithful of every relaxation of that kind, his followers contrived to do it for him. In all points, except one, St. Pachomius scarcely led a more austere life than Omar; and the Collectors of the Prophet's Sayings and Doings took care to complete the list of prohibited indulgences, by adding music and dancing to the catalogue of prohibitions. It is therefore the more extraordinary to find the exercise of those arts among the duties imposed by their rule, on several of these Orders; and adds one to the number of flagrant inconsistencies into which men are sure to be hurried as soon as they abandon the best guide, except Revelation, with which Heaven has gifted them.

Dancing, or something like it, forms an essential Dance and mu. part of the duties of the Cádiríes, Rufâíes, Khalvetíes, Beïrámíes, Sunbulíes, Gulsheníes, Oshákíes, and especially of the Mevlevíes, who hold the neï, or flute, in as much veneration as their founder did, whose beautiful verses illustrative of its spiritual application are quoted by Sir William Jones in his Essay on the Mystical Poetry of the Asiatics. (As. Res. iii. 179.)

The religious exercises practised by almost all the Religious exercises Orders commence by the repetition of the seven mysterious names, and are followed by the chanting of certain texts of the Corán. It is the Sheïkh who chants this service, while the rest of the society, collected in a knot in the centre of the room return, in chorus, either Hú or Allah. In some Orders they do this squatted on their heels, in others standing up; always with half closed eyes bent towards the ground, and with a most demure and contrite expression of face; some swing their body gently backwards and forwards one way, some another; but always in perfect time with the chaunt, and with each other. This service is called *Mucábeleh (approaching to the Divine Presence) or Tevhíd, (Confession of the Unity,) and the apartment appropriated to these rites (music-room of those who dance,) is always called the Tevhíd-kháneh, (Presence Chamber of the Divine Unity.)

The dances of the greater number are called Devr, Dances (i. e. circle,) because they consist in a movement forwards of the right foot, accompanied with violent contortions of the body, all the performers joining hand in hand, and standing in a circle. The longer the dance is continued, and the louder they shout Yá Hú, or Yá Allah ! the greater is the merit; those exercises are, therefore, often persevered in till spitting of blood or a fainting fit concludes the exhibition.

The dance of the Mevlevì differs entirely from that Mevlevi of the other Orders, and is called Semà, (Heaven;) their dancing-rooms having the appellation of Semà-kháneh. Nine, eleven, or thirteen of the Fraternity squat down upon their hams in a circle, seated on

* Was the Dervish Mokhlis, author of the Persian Tales, a Mevlevì?

* Muradjah translates this term, The Exaltation of the Glory of God, which is very probably the mystical interpretation given to it by the Súffies. On the same principle his paraphrase of the couplet cited above, may be justified, though it deviates so widely from the text.

ERVIS. sheep-skins, spread on the floor of their circular dancing-room, the design of which was evidently borrowed from a tent. They remain at least half an hour, with their eyes closed, in the attitude of profound meditation. The Sheïkh, seated on a little carpet (sejjádeh) on one side of the room, then invites his brethren to say a Fátihah, using a long peroration, an exact counterpart of the preface to the Bidding prayer used in our Colleges and Cathedrals. The Tekbír and Salavát follow the Fátihah, and then all the Dervíshes rise up at once, and begin their dance. They approach slowly in a line, on the left hand of the Sheïkh, with arms crossed and head bent towards the ground; the senior Dervísh, when nearly opposite to him, makes a very low bow to the tablet bearing their founder's name, and placed over his head, and then takes two skips to a vacant spot on his right hand, making him a bow. After three, next in seniority, have made the same evolutions, the rest begin spinning round the room on the heel of the left foot, with closed eyes and arms extended. Each follows in succession; taking care not to be too near his neighbour; so that all may spin at once without interfering with each other. In the two hours, during which this rotatory devotion is continued, there are only two pauses, while the Sheïkh chants some prayers. Towards the close, he also joins in the dance, and soon afterwards terminates the service, by singing some Persian verses, which contain a prayer for the King and Royal Family, the Ministers in Church and State, the Clergy and Laity, and especially for their Holy Order, the General, Superior, Head-Cook, and all that bear office in the same, and lastly for all true believers, living or dead, in the East or West.

ic. Most of these Devotees play well upon the neï; and the Convent where the General of the Order resides, at Cónyah, (Iconium,) has a band of no less than six instruments, the neï, tambourine, psaltery, sistrum, bass-viol, and tambour de basque. Music is said to have been first introduced among the Câdiríes by Shemsu'd-dín, successor of their founder, Abdu'l-cádir Gílání, in A. D. 1170, merely for the purpose of regulating the time of their movements, and none but the Mevleviés indulge in any variety of times. Besides the two Orders already named, music is used also by the Rufáïíes, Bedeviés, Sâdíes, and Eshrefíes.

rcises the aees. The exhibitions of the Rufáïíes are the longest and most comprehensive of all. They last for more than three hours, and are divided, like regular dramas, into five Acts. In the first, the Brethren advance in procession to their Sheïkh, the four Seniors giving him the kiss of peace, the others humbly kissing his hand, and then retiring, seat themselves in a semicircle on sheep-skins in the middle of the room, and sing the Tekbír and Fátihah in chorus; after which the Sheïkh continually repeats Lá Iláhí, &c. to which they answer "Allah!" making various gesticulations in time to the music. Hamd-Mohammedí, a hymn in praise of Mohammed, begins the second Act. It is chanted by one of the Seniors, and followed by the same responses; they then rise, stand close together, and swing their bodies and one foot, first one way, then the other, in perfect time, sobbing, shedding tears, sweating and crying out every now and then Yá Allah! or Yá Hú! After a pause of a few minutes, another of the Seniors begins the third Act, by chanting an Iláhí, or hymn, in Persian, and the Juniors recommence their movements with more vehemence than before. The fourth Act is preceded by a similar pause, after which all the Dervíshes lay aside their turbands, and forming a circle, each with his hands laid upon his neighbour's shoulder, pace round the room with a measured step, sometimes striking the ground with their feet, sometimes leaping up all at once, while Iláhís are sung alternately by the two Seniors on the left of the Sheïkh. Yá Hús and Yá Allahs resound through the chamber, intermingled with hideous groans and yells. The Sheïkh joins in the dance as soon as he sees any one flag, and is replaced by the Seniors when exhausted himself. This might be supposed sufficient to master the strength of the stoutest, but it is only preparatory to the fifth, and most terrific Act of all. The performers are then worked up into a sort of ecstasy or phrensy, which they term hálet, (state, condition.) They are by those means qualified to work wonders; for the Musulmán Saints are as determined Thaumaturgists as their Popish brethren once were. Towards the close of the fourth Act, two of the Dervíshes put spits, swords, daggers, &c. into the fire, that they may be presented red-hot to the Sheïkh when required by the appearance of the hálet in the beginning of the fifth. The Sheïkh then calls for them, says some prayers over them, invokes Sheïkh Ahmed Rufáï, Founder of the Order, blows upon the red-hot swords, &c. just touches them with his mouth, and delivers them to such of the fraternity as are most earnest in their entreaties to be allowed to enjoy the fragrances of these roses, (gul.) They are seized with apparent rapture, and after a few tender glances, licked, gnawed, and held in the mouth, till the glow quite disappears. Others of the Dervíshes seize the swords and cutlasses which are hanging by the walls of the room, and slash their sides, arms, and legs, unmercifully. If any are overcome by their excesses, they sink into the arms of their companions without uttering a groan. The Sheïkh concludes the whole by going round, examining the wounds, blowing upon them, and anointing them with his saliva, which together with a few prayers, effects a certain cure in four and twenty hours.

Sadees. The Sâdíes, who next to the Rufáïíes, are the greatest wonder-workers among the Musulmáns, pretend to an hereditary power over serpents, and eat them without any hesitation; perhaps their founder, Sâdu'd-dín Jebawí, had served his apprenticeship among the Psylli, still common in Asia and Africa. The Sheïkhs of all Orders have the credit of miraculous powers in different degrees. A Turkish bookseller who was desirous of selling a copy of the Lives of the Saints to an English traveller at Constantinople, pointed out the many wonders recorded in it, as rendering it peculiarly valuable. "Here is a full account," said he, "of a Sheïkh of the Mevleviés at Cónyah, who whenever he wished to take a sail on the lake, had only to seat himself upon a cabbage leaf, over which he had blown and said a few prayers, and it would carry him across the water in any direction he pleased!" The interpretation of dreams, the cure of diseases, and, certainly, the removal of barrenness, are the gifts for which the Dervíshes are most in repute. Prayers, insufflations, charms, and exorcisms, are the external means by which these wonders are operated. Their amulets (called yáftah, DERVIS. nuskhah, and hamáil) have no virtue, say they, unless delivered by themselves, and accompanied by an undoubting faith. The discovery of lost or stolen goods, the averting of "the evil eye," and the untying of the magic knot, so much dreaded by Turks, as well as Greeks, when preparing for their nuptials, are also privileges possessed only by these holy men, who, on the whole, in temporal matters, are not far behind their Christian compeers, and are no less skilful in commanding the veneration and the pockets of the populace.

In one respect they appear to differ wholly from Religious Orders in Christendom, they have none of that villainous esprit-de-corps which, in Italy especially, makes one Fraternity use every artifice to rise on the ruins of another, and fills even Rome itself with endless intrigues and squabbles between the Capuccini and Zoccolanti, Carmelites and Dominicans. In Turkey the Dervíshes look upon each other with a favourable eye; and as they have their regular meetings on different days of the week, can join in each others rites, which they constantly do with the best grace, so that even those who hold music in abhorrence as a transgression of the law, make no objection to the tunes of their more musical brethren, when they come and play to them while they are performing their active devotions.

Voluntary penances. The more devout Dervíshes superadd many voluntary penances to the prescribed acts of devotion, and sometimes almost rival the Hindù Jógís; especially on the seven holy nights, and on those of Thursday and Sunday, consecrated by the conception and nativity of the Prophet. Fasting and alms-giving, as well as entire seclusion from the world, are practised by others for the expiation of sins, sanctification of souls, and glory of Islamism. Those who have lived on bread and water for forty days, are called Arbáín, (Forty,) and those who give alms Saccà, (water-carriers;) for having no money, they have nothing but water to give.

Internal government Each Order has its General, (Reïsu'l-meshâïkh,) who nominates the Sheïkh of each Convent as vacancies occur; and they are all under the superintendence of the Muftí of Constantinople, (i. e. the Lord Chancellor of the Turkish Empire.) The appointment of the Sheïkhs is confirmed by the Muftí, who has the investiture of all the Generals of the different Orders, even of those of the Cádiríes, Mevleviés, and Bektáshíes, whose office is hereditary in the family of their Founders. The Sheïkhs must be chosen from the oldest and most pious members of the Fraternity; and as the choice is not made without previous prayer and fasting, it is supposed to indicate the will of Heaven, so that the Muftí never ventures to refuse investiture to the persons presented to him.

Convents. The Convents of the Dervíshes are called Tekkiyeh, Khánccáh, or Záviyeh; and the number of their inhabitants is seldom more than forty, or less than twenty. Board and lodging are all the allowances made to the Dervíshes; and such as are married are required to sleep in the Convent once or twice a week; but the Mevleviés at Cónyah will not allow a married man to pass a night under their roof. Dress and other necessaries must be provided by the Dervíshes themselves; many therefore follow some trade, especially that of a Scribe. Though all are mendicants, none except the Bek-táshíes are allowed to beg in public; but many, even of them, imitate their Founder, and live by the labour of their hands.

Monast. The richly endowed Monasteries distribute large sums in alms to the poor among the laity, and in giving assistance to their needy brethren. "The Dervíshes never indulge," says Mouradgea, (iv. 665,) "in pomp and luxury;" and his readers might be tempted to suppose that he really believed them to be as spiritual as they are demure, or that he was ignorant of what he could scarcely fail to know, the disgusting depravities with which their Convents are often polluted. The Turkish Poets are almost all Dervíshes; and the account of their lives by Latífí, a work well abridged and translated by M. Chabert, of Vienna, gives the most appalling proofs of the barefaced manner in which Saints, who in Turkey died in the odour of sanctity, practised enormities which would have brought them to the gallows in England.

Dess. None of these Orders bind their members by vows, but there can be little doubt that Apostates would be held in no esteem. Each Society has some peculiar distinction of dress, and their different costumes are faithfully represented in Mouradgea's Plates, (103—126.) Many wear their hair loose and dishevelled, in imitation of the Prophet, and all make continual use of their rosaries.

Wanting Dervish. The itinerant Dervíshes (Sayyáh) are, as before observed, either outcasts, emissaries, or foreigners. Of the latter the most remarkable are the Calenders, Calenders. whose Order was founded by Calender Yúsuf el Andalusí, (i. e. the Spaniard,) who had been expelled by Hájí Bek-tásh from his community, on account of turbulence and insubordination. He first made some ineffectual attempts to obtain admission among the Mevleviés; and then to avenge himself established his own Order, which is bound to be continually itinerant, and to bear irreconcilable hatred to the two communities by which he had been rejected. Calender and Meláméyeh, the titles which he arrogated to himself, signify "pure gold," expressive of "purity of heart," and "an undefiled inside concealed under a rude exterior," applied in the same metaphorical sense. These titles, in which his followers delight, are of themselves almost sufficient to show, that these men are some of the most determined and dangerous fanatics by whom the Mohammedan world is infested.

See D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, v. Calender, Bek-taschi, &c.; Mouradgea d'Ohsson's Tableau de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris, 1791, 8vo, iv. 616; Abdulfedæ, Annales Muslemici a Reiske, Hafniæ, 1789, 4to. ii.; Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire; Latifi, oder Biographische Nachrichten von Türkischen Dichtern, von Thom. Chabert, Zürich, 1800.

CANT

DE'SCANT, v. DE'SCANT, n. DE'SCANTING, n. Fr. deschanter; It. biscantare; Sp. discantar. Descant, Archdeacon Nares says, is now called variation in musick; and the subject varied was called the plain song or ground. The word is formed upon the Lat. cantare, to sing or chant. Dutch, Discant; singhen. See CHANT. As generally applied.

To discourse upon various topics, different heads or divisions of a subject. To discourse, make remarks or observations.

And with wresting of Scripture vnto their owne purpose, contrary vnto the processe, order, and meaning of the text, [they] would so delude them in deskanting vpon it with allegoryes, and amaze them, expounding it in many sences layed before the vnlearned laye people, that though thou felt in thy heart, and were sure that all were false that they sayd, yet couldest thou not solue their subtile ryddells.

Tyndall. Workes. Life, B. 2.

In somuch that twenty doctours expounde one text xx. wayes, as children make descant vpon playne song.

Id. Ib. The obedience of a Christian Man

For, otherwise, it had been very unequally provided that upon the descanting and flourishes of affected speeches, a man's life should be brought into danger and extremity.

State Trials. Arraignment of Edmund Campion.

Once, when this match was at a point,
They, merrily disposed,
Did descant what from vulgar tongues
Thereof would be supposed.

Warner. Albion's England.

So I at each sad strain will strain a tear,
And with deep groans the diapason bear;
For burthen-wise I'll hum on Tarquin still,
While thou on Tereus descant'st, better skill.

Shakspeare. Rape of Lucrece.

ANDI. Lingua, thou strikest too much upon one string,
Thy tedious plain-song grates my tender ears.
LIN. 'Tis plain indeed, for truth no descant needs.

Brewer. Linguia, act i. sc. 1.

In such manner ought we diligently to survey, and judiciously to estimate the effects of Divine beneficence, examining every part, and descanting upon the very circumstance thereof: like those that contemplate some rare beauty, or some excellent picture, some commending the exact proportions, some the gracefull features, some the lively colours discernible therein.

Barrow. Sermon 8. vol. i.

I soon discovered the malady, and descanted on the nature of it, till I convinc'd both the patient and his nurse, that the spleen is not to be cured by medicine, but by poetry.

Tatler, No. 47.

Let every sober, humble, and discreet Christian therefore be advised to dread all tampering with the mysteries of our faith, either by any new, and unwarrantable explications of them, or descants upon them. South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 253.

The scene is so fatally altered, that I can scarce restrain myself from giving vent to a just indignation, in severe complaints: but an historian must tell things truly as they are, and leave the descanting on them to others.

Burnet. Own Times. Queen Anne, Anno 1713.

While fields of pleasantry amuse us there,
With merry descants on a nation's woe.

Cowper. The Task, book iv.

——— For know the lively scene,
That you still more enliven, to my soul
Darts inspiration, and impels the song
To roll in bolder descant.

Mason. The English Garden, book ii.

DESCE'ND, DESCE'NDANT, DESCE'NDENT, DESCE'NDIBLE, DESCENDIBI'LITY, DESCE'NDING, DESCE'NSION, DESCE'NSIONAL, DESCE'NSORY, DESCE'NT, DESCENTI'LITY. Fr. descendre; Sp. descender, It. discendere; Lat. descendere; de, and scandere, to climb. DESCEND

To climb down; generally, to come or go down; to fall or drop down; to move or go from higher to lower, on a slope, to or towards the bottom.

To move or flow downwards; to be derived or deduced from; to follow in succession of time; sc. from generation to generation.

ȝour wrath him forgyue, ȝe trespas to amend,
In pes with ȝow to lyue, & at ȝour conseil descend.

R. Brunne, p. 134.

Alle þat Leulyn held lond & tenement,
Holy to haf þe scheld þorgh heritage descent.

Id. p. 243.

And sythen his blessed body was in a stone byried
And descended a doun to the derk helle.

Piers Plouhman. Crede, E 3.

For swifter course cometh thing yᵗ is of wight
When it discendeth, than don thingis light.

Chaucer. The seconde Booke of Troilus, fol. 165.

Ransake yet we would if we might
Of this worde the true orthographie
The verie discent of ethimologie.

Id. The Remedie of Loue, fol. 324.

And sondry vessels made of earthe and glas,
Our urinales, and our descensories,
Viols, crosletten, and sublimatories.

Id. The Chanones Yemannes Tale, v. 16260.

I wayle, I wepe, I sobbe, I sigh ful sore,
The dedely fates the dolefulle destiny
Of hym that is gone, alas without restore
Of the bloud royall descending nobelly.

Skelton. Vpon the Dethe of the Erle of Northumberland.

Therefore it shall not bee farre from our purpose to examine the first originall of these blacke men, and howe by a lineall discent they haue hitherto continued thus blacke.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Temperature of Regions, vol. iii. fol. 52.

This descending of the heuenly citie Jerusalem or holy Chrysten churche sygnifieth the comon felowshyp and participacion of the churche triumphant that reygnyth in victory, with the churche mylytant, that contyneweth and remaineth in battel and warefare.

Udall. Reuelacion, ch. xxi.

To be briefe, where it is sayde: he ascended, doth it not consequently folowe, that he before descended? And there is no descension but from aboue: so that the descencion is before, and the ascension after. Id. Ephesians, ch. iv.

At length, when most in perrill it was brought
Two angels downe descending with swift flight,
Out of the swelling streame it lightly caught,
And twixt their blessed armes it carried quight,
Aboue the reach of any liuing sight.

Spenser. The Ruins of Time.

If there had been yet an absolute necessity of visible intellectual creatures, to be participants of his goodness, and the active instruments of his glory; the same power that created men at first, could have created a new generation of men, that might have supplied the defection of our first parents and their descendants

Hale. Contemplations, vol. i. p. 202. Of the Knowledge of Christ Crucified.

Against these descendents the church doth not press the canon-law, though against the former sort it did, and had just cause given so to doe.

Hammond. Works, vol. ii. part i. fol. 593. A View of the Apology.

DESCEND There shall your lordships also find us to insist upon laws not inflicting penalties upon offenders, in malis prohibitis, but laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming, ipso facto, an inherent right and interest of liberty and freedom in the subjects of this realm, and as their birth rights and inheritance descendable to their heirs and posterity.
State Trials. Proceedings relative to the Liberty of the Subject.

Bockland (as I said) was free from all services not holden of any lord, the very same that Allodium; descendable (according to the common course of nations and of nature) unto all the sons. Spelman. On Feuds and Tenures, fol. 12. ch. v.

Your great lord Jesuit Brookes publickly said,
(Brookes, whom too little learning hath made mad)
That to correct the creed ye should do well,
And blot out Christ's descending into hell.
Repent, wild man! or you'll ne'er change I fear
The sentence of your own descending there.
Cowley. The Puritan and the Papist.

But the torrent was too strong to be resisted by any direct strength he could raise against it, and therefore he resolv'd to endeavour to divide and reduce them, by the most gracious descending to their pretended fears, and apprehensions.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part ii. p. 370.

So pure an innocent as that same lambe,
She was in life and euery vertuous lore,
And by descent from royall lineage came
Of ancient kings and queens.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 1.

So growing great through arrogant delight
Of th' high descent, whereof he was yborne,
And through presumption of his matchlesse might
All other powres and knighthood he did scorne.
Id. Ib. book i. can. 7.

As every motion is bounded with two periods and terms; the one relinquished, the other to be acquired by it; so in Christ's descension we are to consider both the place from which it did commence, and the place to which it did proceed: The place from whence, we are told, was heaven.
South. Sermons, vol. vii. p. 5.

Of these kind of men are the civil officers of this government generally composed, being descended of families who have many times been constantly in the magistracy of their native towns for many years, and some for several ages.
Sir William Temple. Works. On the United Provinces, ch. iv.

O true descendant of a patriot line,
Who, while thou shar'st their lustre, lend'st them thine,
Vouchsafe this picture of thy soul to see;
'Tis so far good as it resembles thee.
Dryden. Epistle 13.

We hear these accents in an awful sound.
Ye valiant sons of Troy, the land that bore
Your mighty ancestors to light before,
Once more their great descendants shall embrace.
Id. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

Which was, from the beginning, a very plain declaration, that God did not principally intend his promise, to take place in Abraham's descendents according to the flesh; but in those who, by a faith or fidelity like his, were in a truer and higher sense the children and followers of that great father of the faithful. Clarke. On the Attributes, p. 418.

Muse, raise thy voice to Beaufort's spotless fame,
To Beaufort, in a long descent derived
From royal ancestry, of kingly rights
Faithfull asserters.
J. Philips. Cider, book i.

I ask by what natural sagacity did the patriarch foresee that Shem's family, rather than any branch of the other two, should retain the knowledge and worship of Jehovah? that the condition of slavery should be fixed upon a particular branch of Ham's descendants. Bishop Horsley. Sermon 17. vol. ii.

Or lastly, whether it only means that, in general, those who take by the name of heirs, must take in the capacity of heirs, that is by descent; and consequently, that their ancestor must have a descendible estate.
Sir William Jones. A Commentary on Isæus.

And therefore, as the English laws still remained in force, he must necessarily take the crown subject to those laws, and with all its inherent properties; the first and principal of which was its descendibility.
Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. i. p. 199. book i. ch. iii.

The united provinces having ordered public prayer to God, when they feared that the French and English fleets would make a descent upon their coasts, it came to pass, that when these fleets only waited for the tide to land their smaller vessels, it was retarded, contrary to its usual course, for twelve hours.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 27.

DESCRI'BE, DESCRI'BER, DESCRI'PTION, DESCRI'PTIVE. Written by old writers, Descrive. It. descrivere; Sp. describir; Lat. describere; de, and scribere, to write, to grave.

To write, to mark out, to trace out, to delineate, to depicture; to define, trace or mark out the boundaries.

Þo þis August hadde y be emperour two & fourti ȝer,
He let make a descriuing, þat ymad nas neuer er.
R. Gloucester, p. 60.

Thanne cam Covetÿse ich can nat hym discrÿve
So hongerliche and so holwe.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 97.

And it was don in tho dayes, a maundement wente out fro the Emperour August, that al the worlde schulde be discryued. This first discryuyng was mad of Cyryn Justise of Syrye.
Wiclif. Luk, ch. ii.

Who could tell all or fully discrive
His wo, his plaint, his languor, and his pine
Nat all the men that han or been on line.
Chaucer. The fifth Booke of Troilus, fol. 186.

How shall fraile pen discriue her heauenly face
For feare through want of skill her beautie to disgrace.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 3.

Now to the temple of Diane the chaste
As shortly as I can I wol me haste,
To tellen you of the descriptioun.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2055.

And the mē departed & walked thorow the lande, and described it by cities into seuen parts in a boke.
Bible, Anno 1551. Joshua, ch. xxiii.

The descrybers of yᵗ primatiue church, Egesippus & Eusebius, meketh no maner of mencion of that prestysh vowe of yours.
Bale. Apology, p. 18.

And when they be ashamed of all theyr workes, then shewe theym the fourme and fashyon of the temple: the commynge in, the goynge oute, all the maner and descripcyon thereof.
Bible, Anno 1551. Ezechiel, ch. xliii.

Diligence also must be used in keepyng truly the order of tyme; and describyng lyuely both the site of places and nature of persons, not only for the outward shape of the body, but also for the inward disposition of the mynde.
Ascham. Works. Letters, p. 4.

Yet indeed the ignorance, growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time.
Ralegh. History of the World, book ii. cn. xxiii.

By strange descriptions mystically showne,
He figur'd forth the state of every age.
Stirling. Doomes-day. The eighth Houre.

In all which description there is no one passage which does not speak something extraordinary and supernatural of the person described, and withal represent the describer [Isaiah] of it in the highest degree of extasy and rapture.
South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 339.

Keill has reckoned up, in the human body, four hundred and forty-six muscles, dissectible and describable; and hath assigned a use to every one of the number.
Paley. Natural Theology, ch. ix.

Here then the Muse, tho' perfect beauty towers
Above the reach of her descriptive powers,

Yet will she strive some leading rules to draw
From sovereign nature's universal law.
Sir Joshua Reynolds. The Art of Painting, v. 92.

DESCRY', v. DESCRY', n. DESCRY'ING, n. DESCRI'ER. } Dutch, schreyer; Ger. schreier; Sw. skria, to cry out, to vociferate. A. S. schrewing, a crying out, a shrieking. Skry, Scotch, is of common occurrence in G. Douglas; and the Glossarist says, The word is frequently used on the Scottish border for cry: as to skry a fair; to proclaim it. The Fr. descrier, decrier, is applied as the English decry, i.e. to cry down. See ASCRY. Skinner says, Descry is, in common speech, merely to detect; properly, to detect, discover or make known by a loud cry; a cry of joy or encouragement. Such for instance as the Italiam, Italiam, of the comrades of Æneas; and The Sea, The Sea, of the soldiers of Xenophon, Anab. lib. iv. And thus, generally, to descry, is

To act as scout, as spy, (watching the enemy, for instance, and crying or proclaiming their approach;) to spy into, investigate or examine, detect or discover.

Thus yourselfe your counsail may descrie,
Make priuy to your deling as few as ye may,
For iii. may kepe counsel if twain be away.
Chaucer. Certaine Balades, fol. 342.

Their spials in the meane time discrying from the top of an high mountaine the Duke of Austria, the King of Bohemia, the Patriarch of Aquilea, the Duke of Carinthia, and (as some report,) the Earle of Baden, with a mightie power, and in battell aray, approaching towards them, that accursed crew immediately vanished.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Tartars, vol. i. fol. 21.

——— Others from dawning hills
Look'd round, and scouts each coast light armed scoure,
Each quarter to descrie the distant foe,
Where lodg'd, or whither fled; or if for fight,
In motion or in alt.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book vi. l. 530.

O yes. if any happy eye
This roving wanton shall descry;
Let the finder surely know,
Mine is the wag; 'tis I that owe
The winged wand'rer, and that none
May think his labour vainly gone,
The glad descrier shall not miss
To taste the nectar of a kiss
From Venus' lips.
Crashaw. Cupid's Crier.

EDG. But by your fauour:
How neere's the other army?
GENT. Neere, and on speedy foot: the maine descry
Stands on the hourely thought.
Shakspeare. King Lear, fol. 304.

Antonius caused to be fortified with bastilions, one placed so neere to another, as trumpets being appointed in each of them, the sound might be heard betwixt to warne one another vpon the first descrieng of the enimies approach.
Holinshed. History of Scotland. Donald.

Lucullus took one of the greatest of them, [boats] put it in a cart, and so carried it to the sea, and there put as many souldiers in her as she could well carry, who by night entered into the city, the skout of the enemies never discrying them.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch. Lucullus, fol. 426.

Through this we pass, and round the tow'r from whence
With unavailing arms the Trojans make defence.
From this the trembling king had oft descry'd
The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book ii.

For now, saith he, we know only in part, and we prophecy in part. Now we see through a glass darkly, as [δία ἐσοπτρου] through a descrying-glass, which makes some small and imperfect discovery of things at a great distance.
Clarke. Sermon 10. vol. vii.

As one, descrying in the woodland heights
A dreadful serpent, at the sight recoils,
His limbs quake under him, his ruddy cheeks
Turn deadly pale, he flies, he disappears.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book iii.

DE'SECRATE, DESECRA'TION. } Fr. desacrer, to unhallow. Lat. desecratus, unhallowed, prophaned. See CONSECRATE.

For it cannot with decency be imagined, that the most holy vessel, which was once consecrated to be a receptacle of the Deity, should afterwards be desecrated and prophaned by human use.
Bishop Bull. Works. Sermon 4. vol. i. p. 98.

When animosities break forth, and contentions are raised in the church, "fire is cast into the sanctuary;" when the soul sinks under a temptation, the dwelling-place of God's name is desecrated to the ground.
Horne. Works, vol. ii. p. 449. Commentary on the Psalms, Psalm 74.

Having with great concern, observed that various profanations of the sabbath have of late years been evidently gaining ground among us, so as to threaten a gradual desecration of that holy day, I must very earnestly request you to exert your utmost efforts within the precincts of your parishes that are committed to your care, to counteract, as much as possible, the progress of this alarming evil.
Porteus. Tracts. On the Profanation of the Lord's Day.

DE'SERT, v. DE'SERT, n. DESE'RT, adj. DESE'RTER, DESE'RTOR, DESE'RTION, DESE'RTNESS, DESE'RTRICE, DE'SERT-AIR, DE'SERT-BARRIER, DE'SERT-BEACH, DE'SERT-MARCH. } Fr. deserter; Sp. desertar; It. desertare; Lat. deserere, desertum; de, and serere; Gr. ἐρ-εῖν, to knit, to join. And deserere properly denotes id quod prius connexum pro derelicto habere. To disjoin what was before connected. Vossius.

To disjoin, to dissever, to sunder or separate from; to depart from, forsake, quit, leave or abandon.

A desert, (frequently, though improperly, written Desart,) any place deserted, forsaken, quitted, left or abandoned, sc. by all inhabitants, settlers, &c. And therefore,—a wilderness, a wild, waste, untilled, uncultivated or uninhabited place.

þe decyples, þat he hyder sonde, Cristendom to brynge, Byleuede in a wyldernesse, after prechynge,
þat me clepuþ now Glastynbury, þat desert was þo.
R. Gloucester, p. 232.

As it is wrytun in the book of the wordis of Isaye the profete, the voys of a crier in desert, make ye redy the waye of the Lord, make ye his pathis right.
Wiclif. Luk, ch. iii.

And whanne Jhesus had herde this thing, he wente out fro thennis in a boot into disert place bisidis.
Id. Matthew, ch. xiv.

Thou were that one shepe emongs the hundred, [which] were lost in desart, and out of the waye had erred, and now to the flocke art restored.
Chaucer. The Testament of Loue, fol. 293.

This knight the two pilers of brass,
The whiche yet a man maye fynde,
Set vp in the deserte of Inde.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 75.

And when the daye was now farre spent, his disciples came vnto him, saying: this is a deserte place, and now the day is farre passed, let them depart.
Bible, Anno 1551. Mark, ch. vii.

What flying of her company and desertnes, when euery mother will keepe not only their daughters, but also their sonnes from the inspection of such an vnthrifty maid.
Vives. The Instruction of a Christian Woman, book i. ch. vii.

The desertnesse of the countrey lying waste & saluage, did nothing feare them from coming to him.
Udall. Luke, ch. v.

DESERT. For, having made a journey to Delphos, and safely returned, within short space, he brake up his court, and retired himself, his wife and children into a certain forest hereby, which he called his desert. Sidney. Arcadia, book i.

Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable deserts wherein himself and Israel had wandered 40 years.

Ralegh. History of the World, book ii. ch. iv. sec. 2.

Hadst thou before thy flight but left with me
A young Æneas, who, resembling thee,
Might in my sight have sported, I had then
Not wholly lost, nor quite deserted been.

Denham. The Passion of Dido for Æneas.

Meanwhile this youth like a poor shepherd clad,
(Of whom such care the God of Israel had)
His father's flock was following day by day
Upon a desert near at hand that lay.

Drayton. David and Goliah.

The seuen holie iſlands are desert and breed nothing but a kind of wild sheepe which are often hunted, but seldom or neuer eaten.

Hollinshed. Description of Britaine, ch. x.

Moses compares the deserters of their brethren, to the rebels at Kadesbarnea. now none of these, by God's own decree, entered into Canaan.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty, part v. fol. 212.

Sleep hath forsook and giv'n me o'er
To death's benumbing opium as my only cure:
Thence faintings, swoonings of dispair,
And sense of heaven's desertion.

Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 632.

'Twere easie and prone (and not at all improbable) for us to glide insensibly into all rebellions and impieties, to swear fealty to Satan, that hath entertain'd us so hospitably, and suddenly to engage so deep under his colours, that there would be no retiring with honour, no returning to God without being infamous, without undergoing the brand of apostates from Satan, of a kind of fœdi-fragi, covenant-breakers, and desertors.

Hammond. Works. Sermon 10. vol. iv.

Cleave to a wife, but let her be a wife, let her be a meet help, a solace, not a nothing, not an adversary, not a desertrice.

Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

Both joyned to express the wearisomness of these tedious desart-marches.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. fol. 261. Annotations on Psalm 19.

When churls rebel against their native prince,
I arm their hands, and furnish the pretence;
And, housing in the lion's hateful sign,
Bought senates and deserting troops are mine.

Dryden. Palamon and Arcite.

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spy'd,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended dy'd.

Waller. Song.

But rough, in open air he chose to lye
Earth was his couch, his cov'ring was the sky.
On hills unshorn, or in a desart den,
He shunn'd the dire society of men.

Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book xi.

Slaves, who before did cruel masters serve,
May flie to deserts, and in freedom starve.
The noblest part of liberty they loose,
Who can but shun, and want the power to choose.

Id. The Rivals, act iv. sc. 1.

No more excuses or delays: I stand
In arms prepar'd to combat, hand to hand,
The base deserter of his native land.

Id. Virgil. Æneid, book xii.

Neither surely was it any other cause than excess of love, which made that temporary desertion [by God] so grievous and bitter to him, extorting from his most meek and patient heart that wooful complaint, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me.

Barrow. Sermon 23. vol. i.

But come my Muse, the desert-barrier burst,
A wild expanse of lifeless sand and sky:
And swifter than the toiling caravans,
Shoot o'er the vale of Sennar.

Thomson. Summer.

Moses fasted in the desert forty days and nights before he gave the law: so did Elias, the restorer of the law; and so did Christ before he entered into his ministry.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 286.

Three arrows pierc'd the desert-air,
Ere yet his tender dreams depart;
And one struck deep his forehead fair,
And one went through his gentle heart.

Langhorn. Owen of Carron.

When I questioned the petty officer concerning what had happened on shore, he told me, that neither the natives who went with him, nor those whom they met on their way, would give them any intelligence of the deserters.

Cook. Voyages, vol. i. book i. ch. xvi.

It being no uncommon thing to see malefactors die stupid and senseless, and go out of the world as wickedly as they have lived in it; and what can this be attributed to, but to the desertion of God's Holy Spirit, which will not always strive with sinners, but sometimes leaves them to perish in the hardness of their hearts.

Sherlock. On Death. Discourse 24.

They whom once the desert-beach
Pent within its black domain,
Soon their ample sway shall stretch
O'er the plenty of the plain.

Gray. The Fatal Sisters.

DESE'RVE, DESE'RVEDLY, DESE'RVER, DESE'RVERESS, DESE'RVING, n. DESE'RVINGLY, DESE'RT, n. DESE'RTFULL, DESE'RTLESS, DESE'RTLESLY. Fr. deservir, to earn by service; Lat. deservire; de, and servire, to serve.

To earn by service; to merit or to be worthy of, sc. as a reward or payment for service; for any thing done or to be done; and, generally, to merit, to be worthy of—whether good or ill.

Desert, formed from the past participle desserved, deserv'd, desert.

——————He, þat myȝtuol ȝis
Deþe [doth] after oure deserte.

R. Gloucester, p. 253.

I herd neuer telle, for what maner discert.

R. Brunne, p. 316.

Þei asken hure huyre. [their hire] er þei hit have deserued.

Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 53.

The best and greatest of valour
Didden Richesse full great honour,
And busie weren her to serue,
For that they would her leue deserue.

Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose.

Thus wicked tong, God yeve him shame,
Can put hem euerichone in blame
Without desert and causelesse.

Id. Ib. fol. 136.

For they haue pryuily layed theyr net to destroye me without a cause, yea and made a pytte for my soule, whiche I neuer deserued.

Bible, Anno 1561. Psalm 35.

For more is to be done for y^e deseruour than for the exactour, more for the louyng maister than imperious comaundyng maister.

Udall. 1 Timothye, ch. vi.

But the New Testamēt is an euerlastyng couenaūt, made vnto the children of God through faith in Christ, vpon the deseruynges of Christ; where eternall life is promised to all that beleue, and death to all that are vnbeleuyng.

Tyndall. Workes. Prologue on St. Matthew, fol. 37.

But this we must desire of his highness, and of your goodness, that you would not require more from us, by reason of his majesty's great deservings of us, that we can without offending God perform; and then you may assure yourselves of all the good offices which can be expected from us.

State Trials. Divorce of Catharine of Arragon.

It cannot be, but this so great desart
In basest breast doth breede thus due regarde,
With worlde of thankes, to praise this friendly part
And wish that woorth mought pay a iust rewarde.
E. C. in Prayse of Gascoigne's Posies.

For—thy great wonder were it, if such shame
Should euer enter in his bountious thought,
Or euer doe that mote deseruen blame:
The noble courage neuer weeneth ought,
That may vnworthy of itselfe be thought.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 2.

The valient Cecil last, for great employment fit,
Deservedly in war the lat'st of ours that rose;
Whose honour euery hour, and fame still greater grows.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 18.

And this disposition ariseth out of two things: first, a thorough conviction of a man's sins, and the offence to God in them, and obnoxiousness and deservedness to be destroyed for them.
Goodwin. Works, vol. i. part iii. fol. 170.

Besides this, to Elwes your majesty has given an estate, (which is a greater gift than life, because it extends to posterity,) who was the worst deserver in this business.
State Trials. Trial of the Murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury.

Then Sir John Bushie stept foorth, and made request on the behalfe of the communaltie, that it might please the king's highnesse for their heinous acts attempted against his lawes and roiall maiestie, to appoint them punishment according to their deservings.
Holinshed. Richard II. Anno 1397.

And also when he read the high heavens, which with your divinity do fortify you divinely with the stars, and make you deserveress of the deserts, that your greatness deserves, &c.
Shelton. Don Quixote, vol. i. book i. ch. i.

Is this the ioy of armes? be these the parts
Of glorious knighthood, after bloud to thirst
And not regard due rights and iust desarts?
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 2.

Till I be more desertful in your eye;
And till my duty shall make known I honour ye
Noblest of women, do me but this favour,
To accept this back again, as a poor testimony.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Wild Goose Chase, act iv. sc. 6.

He shew'd his generous spirit; all the town
Speak nobly of him, pity him and pray for him;
And, were he not desertful, by this time
The general vote had hang'd him.
Anonymous. The Gamester, act ii.

If mine [friend] be but so wise, and apprehensive,
As my opinion gives him to my heart,
It stayes not long on thy desertless arme.
Beaumont and Fletcher. Wit at several Weapons, act iii. sc. 1.

Bac. But now people will call you valient desertlessly I think, yet for their satisfaction I will have you fight with me.
Id. Ib. A King and no King, act iii.

If these words seem not decent enough, I will make no other apology, but that I use them because I cannot find worse: for as they are the worst of men, so they deserve the worst of language.
Burnet. Own Times, vol. iv. p. 433. The Conclusion.

If we speak of our desert, that is death, death is the only wages we have all deserved. Bishop Beveridge. Sermon 90.

And in all his illness, which lasted some yeers, she [the queen] would never leave his bed; but sat up, sometimes half the night, in the bed by him, with such care and concern, that she was looked on, very deservedly, as a pattern in this respect.
Burnet. Own Times. Queen Anne, Anno 1708.

But after-days, my friend, must do thee right,
And set thy virtues in unenvy'd light,
Fame due to vast desert is kept in store,
Unpaid, till the deserver is no more.
Congreve. To Sir Godfrey Kneller.

Among all the ancient records in the Exchequer, Doomes-day book is deservedly of the greatest reputation and value.
Priestley. On History. Lecture 31. part iv.

DE'SICCATE, v. DESI'CCANTS, DESICCA'TION, DESI'CCATIVE. Desiccare, atum; de, and siccare, to dry, to drain. To dry or become dry; to drain of all moisture.

But where there is moisture enough, or superfluous, there wine helpeth to disgest, and desiccate the moisture.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 8. part i. sec. 727.

They speak much of the elementary quality of siccity, or drienesse: and of things dessicating.
Id. Ib. The History of Life and Death. Observation 1. fol. 7.

And it is well to be noted, that the pneumatical substance is in some bodies, the native spirit of the body; and in some other, plain air that is gotten in, as in bodies desiccate, by heat or age.
Id. Ib. Cent. 9. sec. 842.

This, in the beginning may be prevented by desiccants and wasted. Wiseman.

Desiccation or consumption, in the process thereof, is finished by three actions; and all these (as was said before) have their original from the native spirit of bodies.
Bacon. The History of Life and Death. Observation 2. fol. 7.

The external aire, next unto the native spirit, (howsoever the aire may be said to animate the spirit of man, and conferreth not a little to health;) doth most of all prey upon the juices of the body; and hasten the dessication thereof. Id. Ib. fol. 36.

All those authors that have written of mineral waters, do generally agree, that they are of a desiccative or drying nature.
Ferrand. Love of Melancholy, (1640.) p. 358.

DESI'DERATE, v. DESI'DERATE, adj. DESI'DERABLE, DESI'DERATIVE, DESIDERA'TUM, DESI'DERY. Præsiderare cum maturiùs hiberna tempestas movetur, quasi ante sideris tempus. Gr. προ-χειμάζειν; sic desiderare, sit ἀποχειμάζειν, cum sideris tempus desit; unde desiderari dicuntur quæ desunt: whence those things are said to be desiderated or desired, which are wanting. Festus. See Vossius, in v. Sidus. Pliny speaks at large, lib. xviii. c. 26, of the different stars, which mark or announce to the husbandman the approach and progress of the different seasons.

To look anxiously for, to wish, seek for or covet, sc. any thing deficient or wanting; any thing whose coming promises good; sc. as certain stars or constellations to the husbandmen.

My name is True loue of cardinal desidery.
Chaucer. Certaine Balades, fol. 341.

So these are the parts which in the knowledge of medicine, touching the cure of diseases, are desiderate.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book iv. ch. ii.

Having acquired our end, if any way, or under any name, we may obtain a work so much desired, and yet desiderated of truth.
Sir Thomas Brown. To the Reader, a. 3.

And most men verily are of the same nature, passing good and desiderable things. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 124.

You may readily understand what I mean, when you meet with any particulars delivered as thoughts, or desiderata, or wishes tending to, or aiming at the improvement of medicine.
Boyle. Experimenta et Observationes Physicæ.

Pencils of light, passing through glass lenses, are separated into different colours, thereby tinging the object, especially the edges of it, as if it were viewed through a prism. To correct this inconvenience, had been long a desideratum in that art.
Paley. Natural Theology, ch. iii.

The verbs, called deponent, desiderative, frequentative, inceptive, &c. need not be considered here, being found in some languages only, and therefore not essential to speech.
Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, part i. ch. i. sec. 3.

DESIDIOUSNESS; Lat. desidia, desidiosus, a desidendo, id est, valde sedendo; sitting too much.
Slothfulness, idleness, carelessness.

DESIDIOUSNESS. DESIGN.

Now the Germans perceiving our desidiousness and negligence, do send daily young scholars hither, that spoileth them [ancient authors] and cutteth them out of libraries, returning home and putting them abroad as monuments of their own country, &c.

Leland. To Secretary Cromwell in Wood's Athenæ, p. 83.

DESI'GN, v.
DESI'GN, n.
DESI'GNABLE, DESI'GNATE, v.
DESI'GNATE, adj.
DESIGNA'TION,
DESI'GNEDLY,
DESI'GNER,
DESI'GNFULNESS, n.
DESI'GNLESS,
DESI'GNLESSLY,
DESI'GNMENT.

Fr. designer; It. desegnare; Sp. designar; Lat. designare, to mark out; de, and signum, a mark or sign. Of uncertain origin.

To mark out, to frame or form; and thus, met. to form in the mind, to scheme or plan, to intend, to purpose, to project.

And therefore, whatsoeuer wicked designement shal be conspired and plotted against her majesty hereafter, shall be thought to be conspired, plotted, and intended against the Almighty himselfe.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The honourable Voyage to Cadiz.

For as the soul's essential pow'rs are three;
The quick'ning pow'r, the pow'r of sense and reason;
Three kinds of life to her designed be,
Which perfect these three pow'rs in their due season.

Davies. The Immortality of the Soul, sec. 33.

Why do ye seek for feigned Palladines,
(Out of the smoke of idle vanity,)
Who may give glory to the true designs
Of Bouchier, Talbot, Nevile, Willoughby?

Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book v.

Since then, the power of all natural agents is limited, the mover (be it never so powerful) must be confined to observe these proportions, and cannot pass over all these infinite designable degrees in an instant.

Digby. Of Bodies, ch. ix.

He is an High Priest and a Saviour all-sufficient. First, by his Father's eternal designation, Psalm lxxxix. 90. I have laid help upon one that is mighty, &c.

Hopkins. Works. Sermon 25. fol. 521.

Again the atomick atheists further alledge, that though there be many things in the world, which serve well for vses, yet it does not at all follow that therefore they were made intentionally and designedly for those vses.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 670.

It being the usual method in which divine providence delighteth it self, to use and sanctify those very means, which ill men design for the satisfaction of private and particular ends and ambition, and other wicked purposes, to wholesome and publick ends, and to establish that good which is most contrary to the designers.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. iii. part ii. p. 743.

A very small portion of any ingenious art will stop up all those gaps of our time: either music, or painting, or designing, or chemistry, or history, or gardening, or twenty other things, will do it usefully and pleasantly.

Cowley. Essay 2. Of Solitude.

'Twere more to his purpose to demand, what advantageth it him to gain not one atome, or most diminutive part of the world, not the least acquisition of any thing desirable even to the carnal man, satisfactory to any part of his appetite, save that in a manner Platonick, designless of love of sinning, and ruining his own soul, and yet to do that as sure, as if he had Satan's totum hoc, his whole exchequer of wealth and honour in exchange for it?

Hammond. Works. Sermon 7. vol. ii.

The second bulwark was the hearing sense,
Gainst which the second troupe designment makes.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 11.

After this hee presented himselfe againe at sundry times and that to this purpose (as may probably be coniectured) to hold her still in his possession, who was not able, eyther to look further into these subtilties, then the superficiall barke thereof, or not discover the depth of his designements.

State Trials. The Case of Mary Smith.

Now what has Ajax done, or what design'd?
A noisy nothing, and an empty wind.

Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses. Speeches of Ajax and Ulysses.

To whom the Thunderer made this stern reply;
My household curse, my lawful plague, the spy
Of Jove's designs, his other squinting eye!
Why this vain prying, and for what avail?

Id. Homer. Iliad, book i.

The designable parts of these corpuscles are therefore unseparable, because there is no vacuity at all intercepted between them.

Boyle. The History of Firmness, part ii.

And a wise designation of time this is, well becoming the divine care and precaution; serving for the recruiting our bodies, and dispatching our affairs, and at the same time to keep up a spiritual temper of mind.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book ii. ch. vi.

As for the reason hereof, I shall refer to the opticians, particularly the famous Kepler, who in his Opticis Astronom. hath designedly handled this point.

Id. Astro-Theology, Ded. xxiv.

Both these, Sir William D'Avenant had began to shadow; but it was so, as first discoverers drew their maps, with headlands, and promontories, and some few outlines of somewhat taken at a distance, and which the designer saw not clearly.

Dryden. Of Heroick Plays. An Essay.

All is drawn over with dusky shades, and irregular features of base designfulness, and malitious cunning.

Barrow. Sermon 7. vol. ii.

Ignorantly thankful creature, thou beggest in such a way, that by what would appear an antedated gratitude, if it were not a designless action, the manner of thy petitioning before-hand, rewards the grant of thy request.

Boyle. Occasional Reflections, vol. ii. sec. 4. p. 359.

Since Solomon does discreetly affirm, that all the cross and happy lucks at play are not rashly or designlessly shuffled by a blind hazard, but are dispensed by an all-ruling Providence.

Id. A Dissuasive from Cursing, vol. vi. p. 80.

And the rather, because whilst men, by the coldness of the season, are more than ordinarily careful, to stop up the passages, at which the external air may get in, they do, though designlessly, stop up the vents, at which the subterraneous exhalations might go out.

Id. An Examen of Antiperistasis, vol. ii. p. 675.

We sufficiently understand that the scenes which represent cities and countries to us, are not really such, but only painted on boards and canvass: but shall that excuse the ill painture or designment of them.

Dryden. Essay of Dramatick Poesie.

Ask of politicians the end for which laws were originally designed; and they will answer, that the laws were designed as a protection for the poor and weak, against the oppression of the rich and powerful.

Burke. Vindication of Natural Society.

Is their original mode of instruction and discipline altered? By no means. Are the instructors of a different description from those designated by the founders? By no means.

Knox. Remains. On Grammar Schools.

The only difference between God's appointment of the Judges and of Saul being this, that they were chosen by internal impulse. He, by lots, or external designation.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book v. sec. 3.

The machine, which we are inspecting, demonstrates, by its construction, contrivance and design. Contrivance must have had a contriver, design, a designer; whether the machine immediately proceeded from another machine or not.

Paley. Natural Theology, ch. ii.

SIGN. — SIRE.

This designment appears both iniquitous and absurd.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, book ii. sec. 4.

DESI'NENT, DESI'NENCE, DESITI'VE. } Desinere, desinens, to leave off, to cease; de, and sinere; of unknown etymology.
Leaving off, ending, terminating.

In front of this sea were placed six Tritons, in moving and sprightly actions, their upper parts humane, save that their haires were blue, as partaking to the sea-colour; their desinent parts fish, mounted above their heads, and all varied in disposition.
Ben Jonson. Masque of Blacknesse.

In their poesies, the fettering together the series of the verses, with the bonds of like cadence or desinence of rhyme, which, if it be unusually abrupt, and not dependent in sense upon so near affinity of words, I know not what a loathsome kind of harshness and discordance it breedeth to any judicial ear.
Bishop Hall. Postscript to Satires.

4. Inceptives and desitives, which relate to the beginning or ending of any thing; as, the Latin tongue is not yet forgotten. No man before Orpheus wrote Greek verse. Peter Czar, of Moscovy, began to civilize his nation.
Watts. Logic, part ii. ch. ii. sec. 6.

DESI'RE, v. DESI'RE, n. DESI'RABLE, DESI'RABLENESS, DESI'RER, DESI'RING, n. DESI'RELESS, DESI'ROUS, DESI'ROUSLY, DESI'ROUSNESS, DESI'REFUL, DESI'REFULNESS. } Fr. desirer; Sp. desear; It. disiare or desiderare. See DESIDERATE, above.
To wish for, covet, long for, to be eager to obtain; to have a love or passion for; to ask for, intreat, require or demand.

War vore ȳch desiryȝ meast ȝyn grace & ȝyn loue.
R. Gloucester, p. 309.

Of the north Suane had a partie, ȝe south he desired.
R. Brunne, p. 42.

Ye ben of the fadir the Deuil, and ye wolen do the desires of youre fadir. Wiclif. Jon, ch. viii.

I reken also, that this booke shall be very profytable for yonge scolers of this realme which are desyrous to learn the Latin tong.
Id. J. C. To the Christen. Lewis. English Translation of the Bible.

My liege lady, generally, quad he,
Women desiren to han soverainetee,
As well over hir hosbond as hir love,
And for to ben in maistrie him aboue.
This is your most desire, though ye me kille
Doth as you list, I am here at your wille.
Chaucer. The Wif of Bathes Tale, v. 6623.

——— For my desiring
Was him to seen ouer all thing
His countenaunce and his manere.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, p. 119.

Yong, fresh, and strong, in armes desirous,
As any bacheler of all his hous.
Id. The Squieres Tale, v. 10337.

Affeccion of this instrument is a thinge, by which ye bee drawe desirously any thinge to wilne in coueitous maner, all be it for the tyme out of your mind.
Id. The third Booke of the Testament of Loue, fol. 317.

And so there whyle I me reioie,
Unto my herte a great desyre,
The whiche is hotter than the fire,
All sodenliche upon me renneth.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 128.

Wyfeles he was, Florent he hight,
He was a man, that mochell might.
Of armes he was desyrous.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 16. DESIRE.

Whereas God wil haue heuen so sore desyred and sought for, that he wyll haue the desyrers thereof, set by the pleasures of this worlde, not onely nothyng at all, but also seke for the contrary and suffer displeasure and payne.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1290. A Treatyce vpon the Passion of Chryste.

For it [the lawe] knew yᵗ theyr heartes wer desyrful of reuenging. Udall. Matthew, ch. v.

Ye haue heard it wᵗ your eares, but ye haue need of readie & desirefull heartes, if ye wil be apt to receiue so great a blissefulnes. Id. Luke, ch. iv.

A greate benefite is much the sweter that it is not obteined without great and long suit. The pleasure of a goode turne is muche diminished whan it is at first obteyned. The desirefulnesse of our mindes muche augmenteth and encreaseth our pleasure.
Id. Preface vnto the Kinges Maiestie.

Than Jesus because he would yᵉ more enkiendle desirefulnes, sẽbled & made countenaunce as though he would not make ani tariaunce at Emaus, but made as though he had yet somewhat ferther wai to goe. Id. Luke, ch. xxiii.

For the Hebrewes to expresse a thynge vehementlye, vse often tymes as it appeareth in sundrie places of Scripture, to double a word, as our Sauioure dydde here, saying: wyth desyre haue I desyred: that is to witte, very sore haue I desyred, or very desirouslye haue I longed for to eate this paschal lambe with you.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1321. A Treatice vpon the Passion of Christ.

For to the highest shee did still aspire
Or if ought higher were then that, did it desire.
Spenser. Fuerie Queene, book i. can. 4.

We could haue no way so good to efectuate that which was the common desire, as to bring in another in his room; one nail (as the proverb is) being to be driven out by another.
State Trials. Case of Archbishop Abbot, &c.

O wherefore did God grant me my request,
And as a blessing with such pomp adorn'd?
Why are his gifts desirable, to tempt
Our earnest prayers, then giv'n with solemn hand
As graces, draw a scorpion's tail behind.
Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 358.

And therefore being all of a sudden bid to hold up my hand at the bar, I cannot chuse but a little demur upon it, and yet with all respect to you, to declare my desireableness to keep within the bounds of reason, moderation, and discretion, and so carry myself as doth become a man, that knows what it is to answer for his life.
State Trials. Trial of Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburne.

He [Sir James Crofts] was an able man to manage war, and yet an earnest desirer and advancer of peace, being one of the commissioners in 1588 to treat with the Spaniard in Flanders.
Fuller. Worthies. Hertfordshire.

Every thing was either vehemently desireful, or extreamely terrible. Sidney. Arcadia, book iv.

Life is the passing of a shadow, short, troublesome, and dangerous; a place which God hath given us in time for the desiring of eternity.
Taylor. Contemplations, book i. ch. vi.

This golden show made him so desirous also of like successe, that he left off his former voyage and returned home to bring news of such things as he had seene.
Holinshed. Description of England, ch. xi.

Whome Ptolemy to cloke his deceit wythall, desirously and beyond all measure of true loue and affection, embrased and kissed a great while together.
Arth. Golden. Justine, fol. 108.

But he was content with the recouery of the cities that he had lost, and so concluding a peace, desirously tooke the occasion of quietness when it was offered him. Id. Ib. fol. 121.

DESIRE. — DESIST.

That desire is a state of uneasiness, every one who reflects on himself will quickly find. Who is there that has not felt in desire what the wise man said of hope, (which is not much different from it) that it being defer'd makes the heart sick; and that still proportionable to the greatness of the desire: which sometimes raises the uneasiness to that pitch, that it makes people cry out, give me children, give me the thing desir'd, or I die.

Locke. Works, vol. i. fol. 105. Of Power, book ii. ch. xxi.

If you demand by what impulsive force
The under Gods begin their circling course;
He says, as things desirable excite
Desire, and objects move the appetite;
So his first God by kindling ardent love,
Does all the Gods in seats inferior move.

Blackmore. Creation, book v.

But of the desirableness of the skill, and willingness to cure the sick, and relieve not only those that languish in hospitals, but those that are rich enough to build them (I have) else where purposely discoursed.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 201. Usefulness of Natural Philosophy.

If they were indeed desirous to approve themselves to God, they would strive against those sins which hold them in captivity.

Sharp. Works, vol. iii. Sermon 16.

The greatest part of the world keep the crown upon the Devil's head; they are his servants, and yield him the throne of their hearts, and he reigns in them: but those that are the people of God, they do with their hearts acknowledge his right and title to them, and do most desirously close with him.

Bates. Works, vol. iii. p. 7. The Everlasting Rest of the Saints.

Do they not rather come hither slowly, sit here uneasily, and depart desirously? all which is too evident a sign, that men repair to the house of God, not as to a place of fruition, but of task and trouble; not to enjoy, but to afflict themselves.

South. Sermons, vol. i. p. 313.

He neglects his ease and his honours together, and despises fame as well as pleasure and riches, and all mortal desirables, when they stand in competition with his immortal hopes.

Watts. Works, vol. i. Sermon 2.

As the natural man neglects the two chief spirits he has any concern with, that is God and his own soul; so fleshly objects are his chief desire, but the spiritual man despises them all, in comparison of the unseen desirables of the spiritual world.

Id. Ib. Sermon 4.

It is only the honest, sincere enquirer, who comes to his Bible with a heart desirous to learn his duty in the conscientious discharge of a good life, who can hope to find it in the words of eternal life.

Gilpin. Sermon 25. vol. iv.

DESI'ST, DESI'STANCE, DESI'STING. } Fr. desister; Sp. desistir; It. and Lat. desistere, to stand off; (de, and sistere, to stand.)

To stand off, or away from; to quit, to leave off, to cease, to give over, to stop or to stay, to forbear.

Thus Owen Glendor glorifying hym self in these two victories, laden with praies and bloudy handes returning againe into Wales neuer desistyng to do eaill.

Hall. Henry IV. The firste Yere.

The more thei here suffere for teachinge the trewth the greater ioye abydethe them: let vs not therfor desiste, nor be afraide, but let vs not neglecte our office for Crystes sake, (good Crystē brethren,) but speke and wryte as long as we may.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. xii.

And again, the going into the city was a pursuance and carrying on of the enterprise against the court, and not a desisting or departing from it.

State Trials. Trial of Sir Christopher Blunt.

——— When no persuasion
Could win him to desist from his bad practice,
To change the aristocracy of Corinth
Into an absolute monarchy, I chose rather
To prove a pious and obedient son
To my country, my best mother, than to lend
Assistance to Timophanes, tho' my brother,
That, like a tyrant, strove to set his foot
Upon the city's freedom.

Massinger. The Bondman, act i. sc. 3.

What frenzy, goddesses: what rage can move
Celestial minds to tempt the wrath of Jove?
Desist, obedient to his high command:
This is his word: and know, his word shall stand.

Pope. Homer. Iliad, book viii.

Whereas men usually give freeliest where they have not given before, and make it both the motive and excuse of their desistance from giving any more, that they have given already; God's bounty hath a very different method: for he uses to give, because he hath given, and that he may give.

Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 269. Seraphic Love.

A politician desists from his designs, when he finds they are impracticable; he renounces the court, because he hath been affronted by it, he quits ambition for study or retirement; and leaves off his attendance on the great as he becomes weary of it.

Blair. Lecture 10. vol. i. p. 200.

DESK, v. } A table to write upon. Dutch, desk;
DESK, n. } Ger. tisch, a table; perhaps from the Lat. discus, because a table resembles a discus in its broad form or shape. Skinner. Sometimes written Dess, q. v.

To desk; to shut up or enclose, as in a desk.

The egle sang Venite bodies all
And let vs ioy to loue that is our health,
And to the deske anon they gan to fall.

Chaucer. The Court of Loue, fol. 355.

And whyle he sayd his orysons for that soule and other, he layed his gloues vpon a deske by him.

Fabyan, vol. i. ch. 201.

Sir, 'tis a perspicil, the best under heaven,
With this I'll read a leaf of that small Iliad,
That in a walnut-shell was desked, as plainly
Twelve long miles off, as you see Paul's from Highgate.

Tomkis. Albumazar, act i. sc. 3.

Where (at the west end of the great hall at Westminster) the lord president, in a crimson velvet chair, fixed in the midst of the court, placed himself, having a desk with a crimson velvet cushion before him.

State Trials. Trial of Charles the First King of England.

Never can they who from the miserable servitude of the desk have been raised to empire, again submit to the bondage of a starving bureau, or the profit of copying music, or writing plaidoyers by the sheet.

Burke. On a Regicide Peace.

DESMANTHUS, in Botany, a genus of the class Polygamia, order Monoecia, natural order Mimosæ. Generic character: hermaphrodite flower, calyx five-toothed; corolla of five petals, or five-cleft; stamens ten; style one; pod two-valved: neuter flower, calyx five-toothed; corolla five petals or five-parted, or wanting; ten sterile stamens.

This genus, divided from Mimosa by Willdenow, contains ten species, natives of the East and West Indies.

DESMOS, in Botany, a genus of the class Polyandria, order Polygynia, natural order Annonæ. Generic character: calyx three-leaved, flat; corolla of six lanceolate petals; berries numerous, oblong, like a row of beads, each containing a seed.

One species, native of Cochin-China. Loureiro.

DE'SOLATE, v. DE'SOLATE, adj. DE'SOLATELY, DE'SOLATE, DESOLA'TION, DE'SOLATORY. } Fr. desoler; It. desolare; Sp. dessolar; Lat. desólare; q. solum et desertum; to make or cause to be solitary and desert. To be or cause to be solitary, lonely, desert; forsaken or abandoned; to reduce to solitude or dreariness; to lay waste, to ravage.

And Jhesus witynge her thoughtis, seide to hem ech kyngdom departid agens itself, schal be desolatid, and ech citee or hous departid agens it silf schal not stonde?

Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xii.

SO-PE. Every rewme departid agens itself schal be desolat, and an hous schal falle on an hous.

Wiclif. Luke, ch. xi.

I were right now of tales desolat,
N'ere that a marchant, goa in many a yere,
Me taught a tale, which that you shull here.

Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 4451.

Now therfor [our God] heare the supplicacion of thy seruant, hear his prayers beseching thee to showe a merciable countenaunce vpon thy holy temple, thus desolated and destroid.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. ix.

When she had passed the sea and taken lande, it was to her declared, how that King Edward had gotten again the garland, and that King Henry her husband, was desolately left post alone, and takē prisoner. Hall. Edward IV. The tenth Yere.

They came vnto Man with a mightie army and wasted all the south part of Man, spoiled the churches, and slue all the men, whom they could take, insomuch, the south part of the saide island was brought almost into desolation.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. K. of Man, vol. i. p. 14.

And because their great exployt may be the better knowne, here shall follow the names of the chief boroughs, castels, and townes brent and desolated by this royall army.

Grafton. Henry VIII. The thirty-sixth Yere.

These, all alone, she spy'd, alas, the while!
In shady darkness, a poor desolate,
That now had measured many a weary mile
Through a waste desert, whither heav'nly fate,
And his own will, him brought.

G. Fletcher. Christ's Triumph on Earth.

Though he was afterwards set at liberty, and had a pension from the king, he was in great want to the very last, living obscurely in his chambers at Gray's Inn, where his lonely and desolate condition so wrought upon his melancholy temper that he pined away. State Trials. Proceedings against Lord Bacon.

She [Lady Elizabeth] againe likewise saluting them saide, my lordes, (quoth she) I am glad to see you: for me thinke I haue been kept a great while from you desolately alone.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 1900. The Lord William Howard favourable to the Lady Elizabeth.

Let never spring visit his habitation
But nettles, kix, and all the weedy nation
With empty elders grow, sad signs of desolation.

G. Fletcher. Christ's Triumph over Death.

Who is this desolater, or maker of desolations.

Mede. On Daniel, p. 44.

Where these two things are taken by these expositors for granted. 1. That the taking away of the dayly sacrifice, and this desolatory abomination, is to be understood of the last destruction of Jerusalem by Titus.

Hall. Works, vol. iii. fol. 895. The Revelation Unrevealed.

O righteous Themis! if the pow'rs above
By pray'rs are bent to pity, and to love;
If human miseries can move their mind;
If yet they can forget, and yet be kind;
Tell how we may restore, by second birth
Mankind, and people desolated earth.

Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book i.

At length the world was all restor'd to view,
But desolate, and of a sickly hue:
Nature beheld herself, and stood agast,
A dismal desert, and a silent waste.

Id. Ib. book i.

There is an eminent instance of this in Nehemiah, whom all the pleasures of the Persian court could not satisfy, whilst Jerusalem was desolately miserable.

Bates. Works. Sermon 4. vol. iv.

If e'er the boding bird of night, who mourns
O'er ruins, desolation, graves, and urns,
With piercing screams the darkness should invade,
And break the silence of the dismal shade.

Pitt. Of Vida's Art of Poetry, book iii.

To go farther, should I lift up my voice in the most desolate solitude, to the rocks and mountains, yet should I surely see those rude and inanimate parts of nature moved with horror and indignation at the recital of so enormous an action. DESO-LATE.

Hume. Essay 13. Of Eloquence.

——— On the self-same day
When we embark'd from Greece, designing death
And desolation to the race of Troy;
Both by his right hand thunders, and the sign
Of which ye hear, Jove ratified our hopes.

Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book ii.

DESPA'IR, v.
DESPA'IR, n.
DESPA'IRER,
DESPA'IRFUL,
DESPA'IRINGLY,
DE'SPERATE, adj.
DE'SPERATELY,
DE'SPERATENESS,
DESPERA'TION,
DE'SPERADO,
DE'SPERANCE.

Fr. desesperer; Sp. desesperar; It. desperare; Lat. desperare, to be without hope; de, and sperare, to hope.

To be or cause to be without hope, hopeless.

Desperate; without hope, hopeless; and, therefore, careless, reckless, fearless, having no regard to consequences. DESPAIR.

And ich shal sende zow myselve Seynte Michel myn aungel,
That no Devel shal zow dere, ne despeir in zoure deyenge.

Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 149.

He was dispeired, nothing dorst he say
Sauf in his songes somwhat wold he wray
His wo, as in a general complaining;
He said, he loved, and was beloved nothing.

Chaucer. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11255.

And he that wil not after counsaile do,
His sute he putteth into disperaunce,
And all the good that should fal him to
Is lost and dedde.

Id. La belle Dame sans Mercie, fol. 253.

Whereof my wittes ben empeired,
And I, as who saith, all dispeired.

Gower. Conf. Am. book iii. fol. 48.

For in suche drede he shall us brynge,
That if we haden flight of wynge,
The weye one foote in dispaire
We shull leue, and flee in the ayre.

Id. Ib. book vii. fol. 164.

I am in tristesse all amidde,
And fulfilled of desperance:
And thereof yeue me my penaunce
Myn holy father, as you liketh.

Id. Ib. book v. fol. 83.

He is our God if we despayre in our selues, and trust in him: and his is the glory.

Tyndall. Workes, fol. 456. Letter to John Frith.

A mā childe was it that she despered of the Lord, and such a one as should be the firste fruit of her wobe.

Bale. Apology, p. 30.

Of these thinges springeth eyther cōtempt, or else desperance of the kingdō of heauen. Udall. Mark, ch. xiii.

Drede of desperacion þenne dryueþ a weȝ grace.

Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 336.

And the Deuel is desperate and hath not nor cannot haue faith and trust in God's promises.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 266. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

Goe soone and doe your message to a fearful people, and to a people that is further then this: To a desperate and pylled folke, whose lande is denyded from vs with ryuers of water.

Bible, Anno 1551. Isaye, ch. xviii.

But a child whē he is beaten for his faute, or whē he thinketh his father is angry & loueth him not, is anone desperate and discouraged.

Tyndall. Workes, fol. 219. Exposicion of the sixth Chapter of Matthew.

DESPAIR.

Whom when I saw assembled in such wise,
So desperately the battail to desire
Then furthermore thus sayd I vnto them.
Surrey. Æneid, book ii.

And if for desperateneese ye care not for yourselues, yet remember your wiues, your children, your countrie, and forsake this rebellion. Sir John Cheeke. The Hurt of Sedition, M. 3.

And yf we loke vnto the lande, beholde, it shall be all darckenesse and sorowe. If we loke to heauen: beholde, it shal be darcke with carefull desperacion.
Bible, Anno 1551. Isaye, ch. v.

Come, come away, fraile, silly, fleshly wight,
Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
Ne deuelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.
In heauenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why should'st thou then despaire, that chosen art.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 9.

How can I expiate my sin? or hope
Though now I write myself thy slave, the service
Of my whole life can win thee to pronounce
Dispair'd of pardon.
Massinger. The Guardian, act iii. sc. 6.

What wight art thou? a foe? or else what fawning frend?
If Death thou art, I pray thee make an end:—
With that she spake: I am (quoth she) thy friend Despaire,
Which in distresse each worldly wight with speede do aide;
I rid them from their foes, if I to them repaire.
Mirrour for Magistrates. Queene Cordila.

Which still sat waiting on that wastfull clift,
For spoyle of wretches, whose vnhappy case,
After lost credite and consumed thrift,
At last them driuen hath to this despairefull drift.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 12.

But Gynecia laying open in all her guestures to the despairful affliction, to which all the might of her reason was converted, with such like words stopped Philanax, as he was entering into his vindictive oration. Sydney. Arcadia, book v.

Whereas were there any such thing really, tis not likely but that the more cunning and subtle desperados, who might the more succesfully carry on the mischievous designs of the dark kingdom, should be oftener engaged in those black confederacies.
Glanville. Witchcraft, sec. 8. p. 34.

So Satan, whom repulse upon repulse Met ever; and to shamefull silence brought,
Yet gives not o'er though desperate of success,
And his vain importunity pursues.
Milton. Samson Agonistes, book iv. l. 23.

Then with such eager blows each other they pursue,
As every offer made should threaten imminent death;
Until, through heat and toil both hardly drawing death,
They desperately do close.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 12.

Consider, I beseech you, of the desperateness and excessive unavoidable destructiveness of these monstrous ways to the speedy peace and settlement of our church and state, and of the safety and security of the things yourselves have pitched on for peace and settlement, in and by the treaty.
Parliamentary History. Charles I. 1648. Mr. Prynne, Speech, &c.

The Lord Digby, being by himself, quickly considered the desperateness of his condition: That it would not be possible to conceal himself long, being so well known to many who were in the Providence, and the garrison quickly knowing whatsoever was spoken in the country.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part ii. p. 705.

That place for paine so fearfull to the minde,
That dreames of it have desperation wrought,
Hath beene by some (to search such deeps inclin'd)
No locall ground, but a privation thought.
Stirling. Domesday. The eleventh Houre.

The master would command, but, in despair
Of safety, stands amaz'd with stupid care,
Nor what to bid or what forbid he knows,
Th' ungovern'd tempest to such fury grows.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book x.

Despair is the thought of the unattainableness of any good, which works differently in men's minds, sometimes producing uneasiness or pain, sometimes rest and indolency. DESPAIR
Locke. Works. Of Modes of Pleasure and Pain, vol. i. fol. 96.

Nor with an idle care did he behold:
(Subjects may grieve, but monarch's must redress;)
He cheers the fearful, and commends the bold,
And makes despairers hope for good success.
Dryden. Annus Mirabilis, st. 242.

But though I thought it not amiss to make these animadvertions upon Mr. Hobbes's ratiocination, yet as to the opinion itself, for whose sake he speaks so severely and so despairingly of our society, if it be considered as I proposed it, he shews me as yet no cause at all to renounce it.
Boyle. An Examen of Mr. Hobbes's Dialogues, ch. vii. vol. i. p. 237.

For on the rocks it bore where Scylla raves,
And dire Charybdis rolls her thundering waves.
All night I drove; and at the dawn of day,
Fast by the rocks, beheld the desperate way.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xviii.

After he hath lain some time under these terrors and affrightments, and even upon the brink of desperation, it pleaseth God, at length, by his Spirit to break through this cloud, and to dar some beams of light and comfort into his conscience.
Sharp. Works. Sermon 13. vol. iii.

To whom the sire of Gods and men replied:
Juno, despair to be inform'd of all
My plans and views: Jove's consort as thou art,
Thou could'st not learn them.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book i.

Despair; this is a permanent fear of losing some valuable good, of suffering some dreadful evil, or remaining in a state of actual misery, without any mixture of hope.
Cogan. On the Passions. Fear.

It is true, indeed, that no man becomes at once desperately and irretrievably wicked.
Hurd. Works. Sermon 16. vol. vi.

This institution provides a retreat for these wretched outcasts of society,—not for those only who by a single fault, seldom without its extenuations, have forfeited the protection of their nearest friends; but even for these, generally the most unpitied, but not always the most undeserving of pity among the daughters of Eve, whom desperation, the effect of their first false step, hath driven to the lowest walks of vulgar prostitution.
Bishop Horsley. Sermon 43.

DESPATCH, see DISPATCH.

DESPECTION; Lat. despicere, despectum, to look down upon; sc. as worthless, contemptible. See DESPISE.

In other terms, Christian humilitie is a clear inspection into, and a full despection of ourselves.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 9. part ii. sec. 1.

They who take then either of these guides, reason or grace, to carry them up the cliff of meditation, may cast down their thoughts in a calm despection of all those shining attractions, which they see to be so transitory.
Id. Ib. Treat. 19. part i. sec. 6.

DESPEED, to send with speed, haste or despatch. Found only in Speed.

Out of hand they despeeded certaine of their crue, to crane both pardon of their fact, and licence for choyce of some worthier primate. Speed. King John, book ix. ch. viii. sec. 31.

But King John, being no lesse earnest to further the present general cause, then they their particular ends, delayed not their desires; and despeeding his charters and safe conducts to the Archbishop and his fellow exiles, hee as speedily arriued.
Id. Ib. book ix. ch. viii. sec. 51.

ESPI-ABLE. — SPISE.

DE'SPICABLE, DE'SPICABLENESS, DE'SPICABLY, DE'SPICIENCE, DE'SPICIENCY.

Lat. despicari, despicabilis, to look down upon, sc. as worthless. And thus, consequently, Worthless, vile, mean, contemptible. See DESPISE, infra.

But if our shepherdes had been as well willing to feede as to shere, we had needed no such dispicience, nor they to haue burnt so many as they haue.
Tyndall. Workes. The Answer to Sir Thomas More's Dialogues, fol. 287.

How have the histories of all ages, and our own experience, shown us by very frequent examples, men unexpectedly, and upon many moments and occurrences, seemingly most small and inconsiderable, tumbled in a moment from the most eminent and high degree of power, into a most despised and despicable condition?
Hale. Contemplations. Of Humility, vol. i. p. 280.

We are men, which is a mercy far above any temporal affliction that we can suffer. God might have made us worms instead of men, such despicable creatures as are below common notice.
Bishop Wilkins. Of Natural Religion, book i. ch. xvii.

Consider again, that he who is a servant to men, may be the Lord's free-man; whereas he that is free among men, may be a slave to his lusts and by them to the Devil: and therefore we ought neither to think despicably of them, nor to use them severely. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 161.

It is very probable, that to shew their despiciency of the poor Gentiles, and to pride themselves in their prerogative and discretion from them, they [the Jews] affected to have such acts there done. Mede. Diatr. p. 191.

But when my power is despicable grown,
And rebel appetites usurp the throne,
The soul no longer quiet thoughts enjoys,
But all is tumult and eternal noise.
Pomfret. Love triumphant over Reason.

And, as he says rarely well, though some creatures seem to be made of much coarser stuff than others, yet even in the vilest, the maker's art shines through the despicableness of the matter.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 13. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part i. ess. 1.

He that is but moderately skilled in androtomy, (as some of the moderns call the dissection of man's body, to distinguish it from zootomy, as they name the dissections of the bodies of other animals,) may, with due diligence and industry, not despicably improve his anatomical knowledge.
Id. Ib. p. 68. part ii. ch. i.

The affections which have their seat in the body can yield us no honour; they are capable of no improvement; the higher they rise, the more despicable we grow.
Sherlock. Discourse 23. vol. i. p. 431.

DESPI'SE, v. DESPI'SABLE, DESPI'SAL, DESPI'SEDNESS, DESPI'SEMENT, DESPI'SER, DESPI'SING, DESPI'CION.

Lat. despicere, ectum, to look down upon, sc. as worthless, contemptible.

To look at or upon with contempt, with scorn; to contemn, to scorn.

Chaucer renders Spernendus est, it is to despise; the only mode then adopted for rendering the participles in rus and dus.

Of which shrewes, all be the hoost neuer so great, it is to dispise, for it is not gouerned with no leader of reason, but it is rauished onely by fletyng errour, folily, and lightly.
Chaucer. Boecius, book i.

Of which though there be an huge armie, yet it is to be despised, because it is not gouerned by any captaine, but is carried vp and downe by phantasticall errour without any order at all.
Translation of Boecius, by I. T. 1609.

Behold ye despysers and wonder, and perishe ye: for I do a worke in your dayes, which ye shall not beleue, yf a mā woulde declare it you.
Bible, Anno 1551. Actes, ch. xiii.

For he seide, "þou ne louest me nogt as þi sostren doþ, Ac despisest me in myn olde liue, þou ne schalt never ywis Part habbe of my kyndom, ne of lond þat myn ys.
R. Gloucester, p. 31.

DESPISE.

And favel hathe wᵗ fals speche. fetted hem by þis lettere To be prynces of prude. and poverte to dispice.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 28.

Paule primus heremite, put vs hym selue
Awey into wildernesse, the world to despisen.
Id. Crede, C 2.

Wher ye han not rad this Scripture the stoon which the bilders han dispisid this is mad into the heed of the corner.
Wiclif. Mark, ch. xii.

Crist Kyng of Israel com down now fro the cros that we seen and bileeve: and thei that waren crucified with him dispisiden him.
Id. Ib. ch. xv.

God chees the feble thingis and dispisable thingis of the world: to confounde the stronge thingis.
Id. 1 Corynthians, ch. i.

Therefore se ghe that it come not to ghou that is bifore seid in the prophetis, ghe dispiseris, se ghe and woundre ghe, and be ghe scaterid abrood. Id. The Dedis of Aposlis.

For which thing I am plesid in myn ynfyrmytees, in dispiesingis, in nedis, in persecutiouns, in angwisschis for Crist.
Id. 2 Corynthians, ch. xii.

And if that any missayere
Dispise women, that thou maist here
Blame him, and bidde him holde him still.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 125.

And so my fadir in this wise
The slepy nightes I despise;
And euer a middes of my tale
I thinke vpon the nightingale.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 79.

So I say agayne, that we make none necessarye article of the fayth of our parte, but leaue it indifferent for all men to iudge therein, as God shall open his hart, and no side to condemne or despise the other but to nourish in all thynges brotherly love, & to beare others infirmities.
Frith. Workes. The Articles for which he dyed, fol. 170.

But it were rather to bee iudged, that I were a tempter of God, & a despiser of his holy ordinaunce, and would not bee content with those remedies, that God hath appointed.
Barnes. Workes. Priestes that hath not the gift of chastitie to marry Wives, fol. 337.

They shall neither be gathered together nor buryed, but shall lye vpon the earth, to theyr shame and despyesynge.
Bible, Anno 1551. Jeremye, ch. viii.

The author sheweth manye of Luther's heresies to be so abhominable, & some part also so peuish, that the very bare rehearsall is ynough without any ferther despicion therupō, to cause anye good menne abhorre them, and to be ashamed also to seme so foolyshe as to holde them.
Sir Thomas More. Workes. A Dialogue concerning Heresies, fol. 248.

Lest we ascribe to the one that which belongeth to the other, and make of Christ, Moses, of the gospell, the law, despise grace and robbe fayth: & fal from meke learnyng into idle despitions, drawling and scoldyng about wordes.
Tyndall. Workes. A Pathway into the Holy Scriptures.

For—thy, she would not in discourteous wise
Scorne the faire offer of good will profest;
For great rebuke it is, loue to despise,
Or rudely sdeigne a gentle hart's request.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 1.

The interests of religion, in the maintenance of truth, are not so despisable, as that he that hath appeared or embarked in them, can safely neglect the advantages which evil arts may yield, or furnish an adversary against him.
Hammond. Works, vol. ii. part ii. fol. 415. Of one Suggestion of the Romanist.

Therefore he sent foolishness to confute wisdom, weakness to blind strength, despisedness to vanquish pride.
Milton. Works, vol. i. fol. 62. Reason of Church Government, &c.

DESPISE. — DESPITE.

For he was a man that could tell how to humble himself towards the great (by whom he might win benefit) and know also how to creep into their credit; and in like manner was he a great scorner and despiser of such as were his inferiours.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 331. Pyrrus.

And lastly, in regard of his easie passage through Italie without resistance, hee entred into an ouermuch despising of the armies of the Italians. Bacon. Henry VII. fol. 143.

Surely it is the contempt and despisement of worldly wealth, that is a great help and meanes to learning and philosophy.
Holland. Plutarch, fol. 128.

The appearance of the service he did him was such, that the king thought it fit to treat him [Monk] with great distinction, even after he saw into him, and despised him.
Burnet. Own Times. Anno 1660.

Policy, the great idol of a carnal reason, is that which insensibly works the soul to a despisal of religion.
South. Sermon 13. vol. viii.

The waters of Jordan had no natural efficacy to cleanse a leper; in the rod of Moses there was no power to divide the sea; but, when ordained by God to these purposes, the sea fled back at the touch of Moses's rod, and the leprosy of Naaman was purged by the so much despised waters of Israel.
Sherlock. Discourse 3. vol. i. p. 73.

To such a being as I have just mentioned the difference may be as considerable and imperceptible between the despiser and the despised, as the difference between two of the meanest insects may seem to us.
Fielding. The Covent Garden Journal, No. 61.

DESPI'TE, v.
DESPI'TE, n.
DESPI'TEFUL,
DESPI'TEFULLY,
DESPI'TEFULNESS,
DESPI'TEOUS,
DESPI'TEOUSLY.

Fr. despiter; Fr. despit; It. despetto. This word is usually referred to the same origin as Despise. But the existence of the uncompounded spite in English, and spiit, spiiten in Dutch, causes Junius to hesitate. If these words be of northern origin, he fixes upon the Ger. spitten, spuere, despuere; to spit, to spit down, as the root. In Goth. spey-an; A. S. spæt-an. Spite being dedignatio et contemptus rei, ad cujus mentionem fastidiosè despuimus. Disdain or contempt of any thing, at the mention of which we spit contumeliously. A forcible illustration occurs, Mar. viii. 65, Sume agunnum him on spætan; which Wiclif renders Summe bigunnen to bispete him; manifesting their spite or despite strongly enough. And to this day, "To spit his spite" is a common expression. And see the Example from G. Douglas. The applications of despite are more various and extensive than those of despise.

To act with contempt, with malignity, with malicious anger, mischievous resentment, resistance or opposition; to harass, to vex, to cross, to thwart, to defy.

And hadden despit, þat wommon kyng schulde be.
R. Gloucester, p. 37.

Tille Emme, Hardknoute's moder, he did a grete outrage
His broþer a foule despite, him self vileyn skandre, [i. e. slander.]
R. Brunne, p. 53.

For he lithely and lovely þat Godes lawe despitely.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 116.

An hep of eremites. henten hem spades
Spitten & spradde donge. in despit of honger.
Id. Ib. p. 137.

Wher a pottere of cley hath no power to make of the same gobet oo vessel into onour, a nothir into dispyte.
Wiclif. Romaynes, ch. ix.

And whan she herde him werne her so,
She had in hert so great woo
And toke it in so great despite
That she without more respite
Was deed anon.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 123.

On which he said how that his wives three
Honged hemself for hertes despitous.
Chaucer. The Wif of Bathes Prologue, v. 6343.

Sone after cometh this constable home again,
And eke Alla, that king was of that lond,
And saw his wife despitously yslein,
For which ful oft he wept and wrong his hond.
Id. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 5025.

Where their sect hath already fordone the faith, pulled down the churches, polluted the temples, put out and spoyled al good religious folke, ioyned frers and nunes together in lechery, despited al sayntes, &c.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 284. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

The gouernour allowed vs horses and a guide vnto another towne, wherein wee found one Michaas to be gouernour, a man full of malice and despight.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Tartar, vol. i. p. 64.

First we trust that among the clergy ther be many men of that goodnes & vertue, yᵗ scante a deuyll could finde in his harte to handle them in such despitious and despightfull maner.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 308. The Supplicacion of Soules.

Thē shall they be in carefulnesse, whyche now haue abused my wayes: and they that haue cast them oute despightfully, shal dwell in paynes.
Bible, Anno 1551. The third Boke of Esdras, ch. ix.

And so shal the princesses in Persia, and Media saye lykewise vnto all the kinges prīces, whē they heare of this dede of the queue; thus shall there aryse despytefulnes and wrathe ynoughe.
Id. Esther, ch. i.

Both I and hee that nicly beast sustaine
For louing well and bearing faithfull harts,
Despitous checks, and rigorous disdaine,
Where both hath well deserued for our parts,
For friendship I, for offred service hee,
And yet thou neyther loouste the dog nor me.
Turberuile. To his Love.

While diuerse partes of Christendome, some by the cruell Turkes are assaulted, and some by sundry sectes of heretikes through inward deuisiō dispiteously mangled and torne.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1379. A Treatise upon the Passion.

Then having taken certain players and minstrels that came from Massina, he sat up a stage within the enemies countrey, made a game of forty minas for the victor, and sate a whole day to look upon them, for no pleasure he took in the sight of it, but more to despight the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger than they to make such a maygame in their own country, in despight of them.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, p. 672. Agis and Cleomenes.

Which when shee heard, as in despightfull wise,
She wilfully her sorrow did augment
And offred hope of comfort did despise.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 1.

And yet this so gracious acceptance cannot pass the pen of this unhappy libeller, but must be casten up (i. e. reflected upon) with a false and dispiteful exprobation.
State Trials. Lord Balmerino.

But chiefely Paridell his hart did grate,
To heare him threaten so despightfully,
As if he did a dogge to kennell rate
That durst not bark.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 9.

They are not pleased again, till they have gotten him into their inquisition, to examine him with despightfulness and torture.
Hammond. Works. Sermon 7. vol. iv.

Nath'lesse it fell with so despitious dreare
And heauy sway, that hard vnto his crowne
The shield it droue, and did the couering reare.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iv. can. 8.

Despiteous reproaches are never seemely and decent in the mouth of a magistrate and man of honour.
Holland. Plutarch, fol. 299.

Some of whom formerly hee had caused to bee despiteously dragged at horse-heeles, for the terrour of others.
Speed. King John, book ix. ch. viii. sec. 23.

She look'd to seaward, but the sea was void,
And scarce in ken the sailing ships descry'd
Stung with despight, and furious with despair,
She struck her trembling breast, and tore her hair.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iv.

This with the hazard of the squire,
Inflam'd him with despiteful ire;
Courageously he fac'd about
And drew his other pistol out.
Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 3.

Let the lying lips be put to silence: which cruelly, disdainfully, and despitefully speak against the righteous.
Psalm 31. v. 20.

Let us examine him with despitefulness and torture that we may know his meeknesse and prove his patience.
Bible. Modern Version. Wisdom, ii. 19.

DESPOIL, v. Fr. despouiller; It. dispogliare; Lat. despoliare. The Latin spolium, Tooke derives from A. S. spill-an, privare. Vossius merely conjectures. "Fr. despouiller; to strip, uncloath, dis-array; despoyl; take away, unfurnish, deprive or bare of, to rob." Cotgrave.

þo þe Romeyns were wyþout chef, discomfortd hii were
And to spradde hem her & þer & þe oþere after vaste.
And slowe & despoylede, and to grounde hem caste.
R. Gloucester, p. 212.

——————————— And he in derke mete
With robbours and with revers. þat riche men despoilen.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 218.

And I that am put away from good men, and dispoiled of dignities, and defouled of my name by gessyng, haue suffred turmentes for my good deeds.
Chaucer. The first Booke of Boccius, fol. 213.

And for that nothing of hire olde gere
She shoulde bring into his hous, he bad
That women shuld despoilen hire right there,
Of which thise ladies weren nothing glad
To handle hire clothes wherin she was clad.
Id. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8250.

The clothed erth is than bare,
Dispoiled is the summer fare.
Gower. Conf. Am. book viii.

Then the kynge rose and wente downe the scaffolde to the lygh auter to be sacred, at whiche consecracyon there were two archbysshoppes, and ten bysshoppes, and before the aulter ther he was dispoyled out of all his vestures of estate.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, v. ii. ch. 245.

Luc. What's that?
Lam. My poor life,
Which do not leave me as a farther torment,
Having dispoil'd me of my sword, mine honor,
Hope of my ladies grace, fame and all else
That made it worth the keeping.
Beaumont and Fletcher. Love's Cure, act v. sc. 1.

For he discomfited, put to flight and pursued in chase their whole host, slew their king in battell, and him despoiled.
Holland. Livius, fol. 9.

But that which gladded all the warrior-train,
Though most were sorely wounded, none were slain,
The surgeons soon despoil'd them of their arms,
And some with salves they cure, and some with charms.
Dryden. Palamon and Arcite.

What money was obtained is unknown, or what terms were stipulated for the maintenance of these despoiled and forlorne creatures; for by some particulars it appears as if an engagement of the kind was made.
Burke. On Mr. Fox's East India Bill.

DESPO'ND, DESPO'NDENCY, DESPO'NDENT, DESPO'NDER, DESPO'NDING, DESPO'NDINGLY. Despond is not in Junius, Skinner, or Minshew. Despond-ere, to pledge, to betroth; de, and spondere, to pledge. See to CORRESPOND. Despondere, is also, to despair of. Holland renders Livy (3, 38) desponderant animos; they let fall their hearts and were discouraged. And Varro says, Qui desponderat filiam, despondisse dicebatur, quod de sponte ejus, id est, ex voluntate exierat. And, Sic despondisse animum quoque dicitur, ut despondisse filiam, quod suæ spontis statuerat finem; because he had put an end to his own free will; his own freedom or liberty of action. And thus,

To yield, resign or abandon; sc. from hopelessness or despair; to give up or relinquish hope; to despair.

To morrow is in God's hand, and the care of it is his, and not ours, and therefore he bids us take no thought of to-morrow; that is, with no tormenting, carking, and desponding, thoughts.
Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 261.

Tho' it becomes the best of men to have a yielding and a soft spirit under the afflicting hand of God, yet be careful to bear up thyself under the power and goodness of God from fainting and despondence.
Hale. Contemplations, vol. i. p. 345. Of Afflictions.

To insist upon every particular circumstance, whereby men may aggravate their afflictions, is the ready means to add fuel to their impatience, and to drive them to despondency.
Bishop Wilkins. Natural Religion, book i. ch. xvii.

Thus mercy stretches out her hand, and saves
Desponding Peter sinking in the waves.
Dryden. Britannia Rediviva.

This [sincerity and integrity of the heart] enables a man to look back without horror, to look about him without shame, to look within without confusion, and to look forward without despondency.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 5. vol. ii.

For a despondent sinner to think thus of himself, that God will expect perfection from a man answerable to the measure of an angel, or that God will triumph in the mere torments of his creatures, or that he delights in their ruin; it is a sin equal to atheism; yea it is in some respects worse than atheism.
Bates. Works, vol. iii. p. 221. On the Fear of God, ch. xv.

I am no desponder by nature.
Swift.

We must either administer a remedy of the highest power, or, agreeably to the desponding opinion of Celsus, leave the patient to his fate, instead of teasing him with fruitless medicines, and suffer him in the forcible words of Aretorus, to sink from inextricable slumber into death.
Sir William Jones. Works, vol. iv. p. 369. On the Cure of the Elephantiasis.

How shall I from my own despair collect
Assuasive balm—within my lonely breast
Mute sorrow and despondence long have dwelt.
Smollett. The Regicide, act iii. sc. 1.

The people, when once infected, loose their relish for happiness, saunter about with looks of despondence, ask after the calamities of the day, and receive no comfort but in heightening each others distress.
Goldsmith. Citizen of the World, let. 68.

Mr. Banks set out without delay; and found his Indian friend leaning his head against a post, in an attitude of the utmost languor and despondency.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. book i. ch. xi.

Swift, without a penny in his purse, was despondingly looking out of his window to gape away his time.
Sheridan. Life of Swift.

DESPONSAGE. DESPOTIC.

DESPO'NSAGE, DESPONSA'TION, DE'SPONSORY. } Lat. desponsum, past participle of despondere, to pledge, to betroth. See DESPOND, supra. Cockeram has Desponsated, betrothed.

Of the same name there was also another Ethelbert of the East Angles, a good prince, who by the aduice of his councell persuaded to marriage (though against his will) went peaceablie to King Offa for desponsage of Athilrid his daughter.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 103. Ethelbert, King of the East Angles.

Yet she was a person of a rare sanctity, and so mortified a spirit, that for all this desponsation of her according to the desires of her parents, and the custome of the nation, she had not set one step toward the consummation of her marriage, so much as in thought. Taylor. The Great Exemplar, part i. sec. 1.

Insomuch that afterwards, upon the news from Rome that the dispensation was granted, the Prince having left the desponsories in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, in which the Infanta Don Carlos was constituted the Prince's proxy to marry the Infanta on his behalf, &c.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i. p. 36.

That in case the said Earl should insist upon the delivering of the desponsories, he would hold himself freed from the treaty by the said Earl's infringing of the capitulation.
State Trials. Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham.

DE'SPOT, DESPO'TICK, DESPO'TICAL, DESPO'TICALLY, DESPO'TISM. } Fr. despote; It. and Sp. despoto; Mid. Lat. despota; Gr. δεσπότης, δεσπόζειν, to rule or govern.

"Fr. despote; the Chief or Sovereign Lord of a Country." Cotgrave.

A husband's power over his wife is paternal and friendly, not magisterial and despotick.
Taylor. Sermon 18. part i.

Egypt another Paradise, now barbarous and desart, and almost waste by a despoticall government of an imperious Turk.
Burton. Democritus to the Reader, 48.

What Kings decree, the soldier must obey
Wag'd against foes: and when the wars are o'er,
Fit only to maintain despotick power.
Dryden. Sigismonda and Guiscardo.

Ease and plenty are therefore the great cherishers of knowledge; and as most of the despotic governments of the world have neither of them, they are naturally over-run with ignorance and barbarity. Spectator, No. 287.

This liberty is best preserved when the legislative power is lodged in several persons, especially if those persons are of different ranks and interests; for were they all of the same rank, and consequently have an interest to manage peculiar to that rank, it differs but little from a despotical government in a single person. Id. Ib.

To their favourite sons or brothers, they imparted the more lofty appellation of lord or despot, which was illustrated with new ornaments and prerogatives, and placed immediately after the person of the emperor himself.
Gibbon. Decline and Fall, &c. ch. liii.

As virtue is necessary in a republic, and in a monarchy, honour, so fear is necessary in despotic government; with regard to virtue, there is no occasion for it, honour would be extremely dangerous.
Montesquieu. The Spirit of Laws, book iii. ch. ix.

What torments then must curse their guilty hours,
Who live immur'd in citadels and towers?
Who think, mistrustful of their menial band,
Each slave conceals a dagger in his hand!
Such chastisements the Gods for those ordain
Who uncontrol'd despotically reign.
Fawkes. Fragments of Menander. Tyrants Unhappy.

Despotism—sincere, unalloy'd rigid despotism, is the only form of government which may with safety to itself neglect the education of its infant poor. Bishop Horsley. Sermon 10. vol. i.

The Republican spirit of the Greeks, it has been said, would not tolerate the usage of the title Δεσπότης as applied to Kings, and the distinction is pointed out as strongly marked by Euripides in the address of a Slave to Hippolytus: DESPOT. DESSA

'ΑΝΑΞ, Θεοὺς γὰρ ΔΕΣΠΟΤΑΣ καλεῖν χρεών,

a line the bearing of which does not appear to have been understood, either by Eustathius, nor indeed still later by Barnes, (ad. loc.) The Scholiast, however, has clearly explained it, δύναται δὲ τὸ μὲν 'ΑΝΑΞ ἐπὶ τοῦ Ἱππολύτου, τὸ δὲ ΔΕΣΠΟΤΑΣ ἐπὶ τῶν Θεῶν. Larcher, (Note on Herod. vii. 5,) is indignant at the gloss which Brumoy has given to this verse, in accommodation to the servile language of his times, Prince, égal aux Dieux, car tel est le nom que convient à nos Maitres; and he strikingly illustrates the falsehood of this translation, by a speech of Xenophon to his troops, in which he is endeavouring to animate them by an appeal to the valour of their forefathers, which by successfully resisting the Persian invasion, so firmly established their liberty, that from that time, he continues, οὐδένα ἄνθρωπον Δεσπότην, ἀλλὰ τοὺς θεοὺς προσκυνεῖτε. Anabasis, iii. 2.

The title Δεσπότης was borne by the latter Greek Emperors as analogous to the Latin Cæsar; and after the reign of Alexius Comnenus, this lofty distinction was given to the favourite son, or other relative who was next to the Throne and person of the Prince himself. Subsequently it was more extensively bestowed, and we read of Despots of the Morea, of Wallachia, of Servia, &c. Codinus, in his Treatise de Officialibus Palat. Constantinop., has described the splendid dress of the persons who held this dignity, with a particularity which it would not be easy to translate.

DESPREAD, to spread abroad. A. S. spræd-an; Ger. spreit-en; D. spreed-en; Sw. spred-a.

Her ivorie forehead, full of bounty braue
Like a broad table did itself dispred.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 3.

Her yellowe locks crisped like golden wire,
About her shoulders weren loosely shed,
And when the wind amongst them did inspire,
They waved like a penon wide despred.
Id. Ib.

DESPUME, "Fr. despumer; to clarifie, to scum the foam or froath off." Cotgrave. Spuma from spu-ere, and that from spew-ian.

Note by the way, that if honey be despumed, that is to say, skummed and clarified, it is evermore the better for any use.
Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. fol. 135.

As touching the former hydromel, if it be made as it should be, of despumed and clarified honey, it is of singular use in that exquisite and spaire diet fit for sicke persons.
Id. Ib. vol. ii. fol. 136

The fluids of the body appear to possess a power of separating and expelling any noxious substance which may haue mixed itself with them. This they do in eruptive fevers, by a kind of despumation, as Sydenham calls it, analogous in some measure to the intestine action by which fermenting liquors work the yest to the surface. Paley. Natural Theology, ch. xxvi.

DESSAU, a Duchy of Germany, occupying a part of the ancient Principality of Anhalt, which is now divided among the three branches of that House, each division taking its name from the place wherein the ruling Prince generally resides. Dessau, or Anhalt Dessau, occupies that portion of the ancient territory which lies on the banks of the Elbe, at its junction with the Mulda. It is a level country, encompassed by the dominions of Prussia, in some parts sandy, and in others marshy; but upon the whole the climate is salubrious. This District yields the common products of the adjoining countries; though cattle and wood are its chief exports. The whole extent is about 470 square miles, and the population 54,000; so that there are about 115 individuals to each square mile. Most of the inhabitants, as well as the reigning family, are Lutherans. The contingent army comprises 540 men, and the annual revenue £51,000. The Capital of this Duchy is Dessau, situated in a pleasant valley, on the banks of the Mulda, a little above its confluence with the Elbe. The population is nearly 10,000, about a tenth of whom are Jews. Dessau was repeatedly occupied and abandoned by the hostile armies towards the close of the campaign of 1813; but was ultimately left in possession of its own Princes. Latitude 51° 58′ north, longitude 12° 17″ east.

SSAU. — STINE.

DESSERT, the last course or service at table; of fruits, comfits, sweetmeats, &c. A word but lately introduced in Skinner's time. Fr. dessert; Lat. deservire.

We shall, to make amends, endeavour afterwards, in our following miscellany, to entertain him again with more chearful fare, and afford him a dessert, to rectify his palat, and leave his mouth at last in good relish.

Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, vol. iii. misc. 4. p. 190.

'Tis the dessert that graces all the feast,
For an ill end disparages the rest:
A thousand things well done, and one forgot,
Defaces obligation by that blot.

King. Art of Cookery.

DE'STINE, DE'STINABLE, adj. DE'STINABLY, adv. DE'STINATE, v. DE'STINATE, adj. DESTINA'TION, DE'STINAL, adj. DE'STINY, n.

Fr. destiner; It. destinare; Sp. destinar; Lat. destinare. De, and stare, to stand. Destinare est aliquid ad finem certum ordinare.

To stand, set or place; sc. any fixed or certain end or purpose; to ordain, to appoint, to doom, to adjudge, to determine, to devote.

Thei don men deye þorgh here drynkes. er destyne hit wolde.

Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 143.

Wherfore it is none inconuenient if in that manner bee said, God to forne haue destenied both badde; and her badde werkes, whan hem ne their yuell deedes neither amẽdeth, ne therto hem grace leaueth.

Chaucer. The Testament of Loue, fol. 313.

Lo, herof cometh & herof is doen this miracle of the order destinable. Id. The fourth Booke of Boecius, fol. 235.

And all be it so, that these things ben diuers, yet neuerthelesse, hanged that one on that other, for why, the order destinably, procedeth of the simplicitie of purueighaunce.

Id. Ib. fol. 234.

But I aske if there by any liberty of free wil, in this ordor of causes, y^t^ cleauẽ thus togither in himselfe, or else I would weten if that the destinall chaine, constraineth the mouing of the courages of men. Id. Ib. book v. fol. 237.

And if so be thou wilt not do me grace,
Or if my destinee be shapen so,
That I shall nedes have on of hem two,
As sende me him that most desireth me.

Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2325.

But nowe I am nothyng agast,
I thank God: for Lachesis.
Ne Cloto, whiche hir felawe is,
Me shopen no suche destinee,
Whan thei at my natiuitee
My wordes setten as thei wolde.

Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 78.

DESTINE.

When the chylde is borne, thou as the father shalt geue it a name, not a name after thine own fantasie, but that name that God, agreeably vnto the thyng, did destinate and appoynt vnto hym, before the creation of the worlde.

Udall. Matthew, ch. i.

Neuertheles these fortuned not vnto me either by myne owne peculyar destenye, neyther yet for any euill that I dyd.

Id. 2 Timothye, ch. iii.

The King [Edgar] inflam'd with her [Elfrida] love the more for that he had been so long defrauded and robb'd of her, resolv'd not only to recover his intercepted right, but to punish the interloper of his destin'd spouse.

Milton. Prose Works, vol. ii. fol. 95. History of England, book v.

Stage-playes they had their rise from Hell: wee Christians our natiuite, and descent from Heauen: they were at first deuoted (yea, yet continue destinated) vnto Satan: we were at first baptized into, yea, consecrated wholy vnto Christ.

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act ii.

They hold moreouer, to be no purgatorie, nor that the suffrages of the church doo auaile the dead, either to lesse the paine of them that be destinat to hell, or to increase the glorie of them that be ordeined to saluation.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 170. The Articles and Opinions of the Greek Church, &c.

For in this terrestrial state there are few things transacted, even in our intellectual part, but through the help and furtherance of corporal instruments; which by more than ordinary usage loose their edge and fitness for action, and so grow inept for their respective destination.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xii.

It is vndoubtedly true that the destinating, and deuoting of vnprofitable, pleasureable, heathenish, scandalous, and vnnecessary inventions, doeth make not onely the deuoted indiuidualls; but likewise the whole kinde it selfe, vnlawfull vnto Christians.

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act ii.

For the destinie whereof they were worthy, drew them unto this end, and made them forget the things that had already happened, that they might fulfil the punishment which was wanting to their torments.

Bible, Modern Version. Wisdome, ch. xix.

But who can turne the streame of destinie
Or breake the chaine of strong necessitie,
Which fast is tide to Joue's eternall seate?

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 5.

For 1. they might both die and be damned too, or if as Volkelius saith, the word κοιμῶνται, obdormiscunt, sleep, be never used in the New Testament, of those that are destined to eternal destruction, then still may this be very reconcileable with our interpretation that many for this cause are weak and sickly and many others sleep.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 315. Of the Word ΚΡΙΜΑ.

Mark well the place where first she lays her down,
There measure out thy walls, and build thy town,
And from thy guide Bœotia call the land,
In which the destin'd walls and town shall stand.

Addison. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book iii.

[Who can withhold love from one] resembling him not in temper of body or lineaments of face, but in conformity of judgment and practice; partner of the one inheritance, and destinated to lead a life with him through all eternity, in peacefull consortship of joy and bliss? Barrow. Sermon 3. vol. ii.

Those temporary parts appear to have been designed by nature, not so much for the personal preservation of the female as for the propagation of the species: which destination not coming to be accomplished, till a woman, for instance, has attained to a competent age, appears to have been preordained by the author of mankind for the continuation of it.

Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 423. A Disquisition about the final causes of Natural things.

DESTINE. — DESTITUTE.

But 'tis agreed, that there is Fatum Christianum, a certain destiny of every thing, regulated by the foreknowledge and providence of God.

Clark and Leibnitz. Mr. Leibnitz's Fifth Paper.

——— Hence in the race,
All emulous, he hears the clashing whips,
He feels the animating shouts: exerts
With eagerness his utmost powers; and strains,
And springs, and flies, to reach the destin'd goal.

Dodsley. Agriculture, cem. 8.

Which of us in setting out upon a visit, a diversion or an affair of business, apprehends a possibility of not arriving at the place of his destination: yet at the same time does not apprehend himself at liberty to alter his course in any part of his progress. Search. Light of Nature. Freewill, ch. xxvi.

Thus the Pagans had the same notion with that which is mentioned in Scripture, of a double destiny depending upon human choice.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 235.

Yet such the destiny of all on earth;
So flourishes and fades majestick man.
Fair is the bud his vernal morn brings forth,
And fostering gales awhile the nursling fan.

Beattie. Minstrel, book i.

DE'STITUTE, v. DE'STITUTE, n. DE'STITUTE, adj. DE'STITUTELY, DESTITU'TION.

Fr. destituer; Sp. destituir; Lat. destituere, destitutum. The Fr. and Sp. from the verb: the English from the past participle. The Lat. destituere, (composed of de, and statuere, to fix; itself from statum, the past participle, of stare, to stand,) is, defigere, deponere, to unfix, to displace or pull down; and then, derelinquere, to leave helpless.

To leave weak or helpless or in want; to desert, to forsake, to abandon, to deprive.

This faire lady on this wise destitute
Of all comfort and consolation.

Chaucer. The Testament of Creseide, fol. 295.

For the princes and magistrates ought to conuerte the goodis of these ydle erth burdens into the susteutacion of the poore, and maintayne teachers and scolers lerning the tongues and Holy Scriptures, so that the chirches and ciuile ministracion be not destituted lerned men at any tyme.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. y.

Sirs, quod the Lorde of Coucy, we repute you for good and trewe and valyaũt men, but we haue consydred dyuers thynges: wynter aprocheth, and we are destytute of vitayles and other prouysions.

Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. ch. 174.

Doubtles she that beyng destitutely lefte withoute comforte of husbande, of children, of children's children, of all the worlde's solace, hath reposed all her whole hope in God.

Udall. 1 Timothye, ch. v.

His ladie and wife destituted of all honour and livings, liueth a dolefull and miserable life.

Holinshed. Ireland, vol. vi. Epis. Ded. p. 104.

It is the sinfullest thing in the world, to forsake or destitute a plantation, once in forwardness. For besides the dishonour, it is the guiltiesse of blood, of many commisserable persons.

Bacon. Essay 33. Of Plantations.

As for the rest of the rebels, they (being destituted of their head) without stroke stricken, submitted themselues vnto the King's mercie. Id. Henry VII. fol. 183.

——— So rose the Danite strong
Herculean Samson from the Harlot lap
Of Philistean Delilah, and wak'd
Shorn of his strength. They destitute and bare
Of all thir vertue.

Milton. Paradise Lost, book ix. l. 1062.

With granted leave officious I return,
But much more wonder that the Son of God
In this wild solitude so long should bide
Of all things destitute, and well I know,
Not without hunger.

Milton. Paradise Regained, book ii. l. 306.

The understanding, when it ceases to be ennobled with excellent things, is made ignorant as a swine, dull as the feet of a rock; and the affections are in the destitution of their perfective actions made tumultuous, vexed and discomposed, to the height of rage and violence. Taylor. Sermon 19. part ii.

Sometime to gentle Tiber I retire,
And the fam'd river's empty shores admire,
That destitute of strength derives its course
From thirsty urns and an unfruitful source.

Addison. A Letter from Italy.

O, my friends, have pity on this poor destitute, for the hand of God hath touched her.

P. St. John. Sermons, (1737,) p. 224.

Giving my body to be burned—martyrdom itself—lying down my life for religion—has nothing in it acceptable to God, if it is destitute of this great principle, [charity.]

Gilpin. Sermons 6. vol. iv.

Friendship is the balm and cordial of life, and, without it, 'tis a heavy load not worth sustaining,—I am unhappy,—thy mother and thyself at a distance from me; and what can compensate for such a destitution.

Sterne. Works. Letter 91. vol. iv. p. 286.

DESTRO'Y, DESTRO'YABLE, DESTRO'YER, DESTRO'YING, DESTRU'CT, v. DESTRU'CTIBLE, DESTRU'CTION, DESTRU'CTIVE, DESTRU'CTIVELY, DESTRU'CTIVENESS, DESTRU'CTOR.

Fr. destruer; Sp. destruir; It. distruggere; Lat. distruere, distructum; de, and struere, which Vossius thinks is from στερεόειν; i. e. firmum solidumque reddere; and thus, equivalent to the English verb, to build. See to CONSTRUCT.

To pull down any building or structure; any thing built or constructed; to demolish; to overthrow, to subvert, to lay waste, to ruin; to put to death, to kill.

Edwyne wende þo anon out of þe more lond,
And destrude wyde-aboute.

R. Gloucester, p. 242.

Laste þe hye emperour for his outrage
Come and distruye al hys lond. Id. p. 46.

Þe ferthe sorow of his lond cam þorgh þe Danes,
Þe folk of the north-lond, destroied þer wanes.

R. Brunne, p. 8.

My castels he takes, & seises my citez
Destruction he makes of reuteȝ and fees.

Id. p. 208.

And the Fariseis weenten out and maden a counseil ageins him: how thei schulden distrye him.

Wiclif. Matthew, ch. xi.

And thei hadden on hem a kyng the aungel of depenesse to whom the name bi Ebrew is Lastadon, but bi Greek Appollioun, and by Latyn he hath a name Exterminans that is a destrier.

Id. Apocalips, ch. ix.

The time eke that chaungeth all
And all doeth waxe, and fostred be
And all thing destroyeth he.

Chaucer. The Romaut of the Rose, fol. 118.

Upon a tyme as it befelle
Ayenst Jude and Israëll,
Whan sondry kynges come were
In purpose to destroie there
The people, whiche God kept the.

Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 163.

For ye Romains ar but destroyers of possible people, and theues to rob from other, that they sweate for.

Golden Boke, ch. xxxi.

DESTROY

Loe good readers, nowe haue you a great high tragicall warning with not a little tast but a gret tunne fulle at once, of my mischeuious pernicious false pestilent peruertinge and destroyinge of the pure sense of Goddes holye woordes in this one place, which he wil shal stãde for a playne profe that I dooe the same in all other places.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1103. A Treatise vpon the blessed Sacrament of ye Aulter.

For if I schal glorie ony thing more of oure power which the Lord ghaf to us into edifying and not into ghoure distrucioun I schal not be schamed. Wiclif. 2 Corynthians, ch. x.

But how this toune came to destruction
Ne falleth not to purpose me to tel
For it were a long digression.
Chaucer. The first Booke of Troilus, fol. 153.

Wherof it melt, and from the hight
Withoutten helpe of any slight,
He [Icarus] fell to his destruction.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 69.

O come hither, and behold the workes of the Lorde, what destructions he hath brought vpon the earthe.
Bible, Anno 1551. Psalme 46.

——————————— And now
Through all restraint broke loose he wings his way
Not far off heav'n, in precincts of light
Directly towards the new created world,
And man there plac't, with purpose to assay
If him by force he can destroy, or worse
By some false guile pervert.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book iii. l. 91.

Whatsoever is in the world is but ὕλη πῶς ἔχουσα, matter so and so modified or qualified, all which modifications and qualifications of matter are in their own nature destroyable and the matter itself (as the basis of them, not necessarily determin'd to this or that accident) is the only ἀγένητον καὶ ἀνώλεθρον, the only necessarily existent. Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 70.

Hugo amongst these troops spy'd many more,
Who had, as brave destroyers, got renown;
And many forward wounds in boast they wore,
Which if not well reveng'd, had ne'er been shown.
Davenant. Gondibert, book i. can. 2.

What little ground there is to persuade a man, left to his own free reason, that God should be pleased with the killing and burning of beasts, or with the destroying of such things by fire of which better use may be made, if they were disposed of some other way.
Bishop Wilkins. Of Natural Religion, book i. ch. xii.

The world which perished by water, was no other than the sublunary world; the heaven whereof is that which we call air, but the Scripture heaven; which sublunary heaven, together with the earth, was marred by that general deluge; and the creatures, belonging to them both, either wholly destructed, or marvellously corrupted from that they were before.
Mede. Paraphrase on St. Peter, (1642,) p. 12.

We fear'd, that the fanatic war,
Which men against God's houses did declare,
Would from the Almighty enemy bring down
A sure destruction on our own.
Cowley. Ode, upon his Majesty's Restoration and Return.

Thou fly'st thy country and more happy state,
To seek in some strange land a stranger fate,
And under foreign climes and unknown stars,
T' encounter hazards and destructive wars.
Sherburne. Translations. Forsaken Lydia.

The main of our affliction raiseth from the destructiveness of the sentence, as being therein contrary to that other our fundamental native right which enjoins, That fines should have regard to the qualities of the persons.
State Trials. Trial of John Lilburne.

That heavenly virgin, that exalted goodness
Could see me tortur'd with despairing love,
With artful tears could mourn my monstrous sufferings,
While her base malice plotted my destruction.
Smith. Phædra and Hippolitus, act iii.

Loaded with gold, he sent his darling, far
From noise and tumults, and destructive war:
Committed to the faithless tyrant's care.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

And first, for the doctrine that states the time of repentance destructively to a pious life. South. Sermon 6. vol. vii.

DESTROY — DESULTORY.

Consider I beseech you, of the desperateness and excessive unavoidable destructiveness of these monstrous ways to the speedy peace and settlement of our church and state, and of the safety and security of the things yourselves have pitched on for peace and settlement in and by the treaty.
Parliamentary History, Anno 1648. Mr. Prynne's Speech, &c

Helmont doth somewhere wittily call the fire the destructor and artificial death of things.
Boyle. The Sceptical Chymist, vol. i. p. 527.

Why should we not rather permit men to use their understandings as well as they can; and where they fail of the truth, to bear with them, as God himself without question will; than by stickling for every unnecessary truth, destroy that peace, and love, and amity, that ought to be among Christians.
Sharp. Works. Sermon 1. vol. i. p. 16.

The dry land surface we find naturally every where almost carpeted over with grass, and other agreeable wholesome plants; propagating themselves in a manner every where, and scarcely destroyable by the weather, the plough or any art.
Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. xi.

A victory so early, so complete and so cheaply purchased, that we have some reason to hope it may fix the fortune of the war, and put an end to the destructions of the destroyer.
Atterbury. Sermon 1. vol. i.

Sweet nature, stripp'd of her embroider'd robe,
Deplores the wasted regions of her globe;
And stands a witness at truth's awful bar,
To prove you there destroyers as ye are.
Cowper. Heroism.

Therefore forms, qualities and essences are producible by composition, destructible by dissolution, and interchangeable among one another by the various stationing of the materials composing them. Search. Light of Nature, vol. ii. part i. ch. ii.

DESUETUDE; de, and suere, quasi usu ire, to go by use or usage, to accustom. Disuse; neglect or forbearance of use.

It is easily seen, that those things whiche a man useth himself unto, so that they seem to become another nature; yet some desuetude from them evidences to him, that they are not so necessary and unseparable as he once thought them.
Hale. Contemplations, vol. ii, p. 57. Of Self-denial.

As this assistance of Presbyters was at first for necessity, and after by custom it grew a law; so now retro, first the necessity failed, and then the desuetude abrogated the law, which before, custome had established.
Taylor. Polemical Discourse, fol. 147. Episcopacy Asserted.

A defect or desuetude of these latter [confirmations] must no less starve and alter, than a superfluity of the former [ordinations] overstock the church. Both of them, I am sure, likely to prove fatal to it. South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 35.

This is the only instance in which wise laws have suffered a sort of tacit repeal by a general consent in the neglect of them, and have passed into desuetude; and in such cases the old law cannot safely be restored but by new enactments.
Horsley. Speeches, p. 277.

DESU'LTORY, DESU'LTORILY, DESU'LTORINESS, DESULTO'RIOUS. } Desilire, -sultum; de, and salire, to leap. Desultor, qui binos trahens equos, ex uno mira celeritate in alterum transiliret. Vossius.

Leaping, starting, moving quickly from one thing to another; moving by fits and starts; unsteady, inconstant, unsettled, wavering.

For as it happens in dreams and madnes, where the argument is good, and the discourse reasonable oftentimes; but because it is inferred from weak phantasms, and trifling and imperfect notices of things, and obscure apprehensions, therefore it is not only desultorious and light, but insignificant, and far from ministering to knowledge. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, book i. ch. ii.

Most readers, and even many learned men, peruse the Scripture so slightly and desultorily, that so transient and superficial a view makes them overlook in it, a multitude of excellent and instructive things.
Boyle, vol. vi. p. 786. The second Part of the Christian Virtuoso.

DESULTORY. — DETACH

I say therefore, in which epistles, are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable (that are unlearned, i. e. unskilled and unversed in divine things: unstable i. e. of light, desultory, unbalanced minds,) wrest as they do other Scriptures, to their own destruction.

Atterbury. Sermon 9. vol. iii.

Much of the seeming desultoriness of my method, and frequency of my rambling excursions, have been but intentional and charitable digressions out of my way, to bring some wandering friends unto theirs, and may closely enough pursue my intentions, even when they seem most to deviate from my theme.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 254. To the Reader.

This makes my reading wild and desultory: and I seek refuge from the uneasiness of thought from any book, let it be what it will, that can engage my attention.

Warburton. Works, vol. i. p. 112. Life.

DESUME, desumere; de, and sumere, to take. See CONSUME.

To take away.

It is not with intent to reproach the Scripture, or those phrases that are desumed from it, but to shew the boldness and mistakes of them that have misapplied or abused them.

Hale. Contemplations, vol. i. p. 408. Of Religion.

Nor is this Salamander's wool desumed from any animal but a minerall substance, metaphorically so called from this received opinion. Sir Thomas Brown, book iii. ch. xiv.

Every man must needs see that in the natural course of things this pebble doth suppose, as preexistent to it, the more simple matter out of which it is desumed, the heat and influence of the sun, and the due preparation of the matter; which takes up a competent time, and that necessarily, before this pebble had its complete being.

Hale. Origin of Mankind, fol. 76. sec. 1. ch. iii.

In some cases this kind of vessel is inferiour to those tubulated retorts, that were of old in use, and mentioned by Basilius Valentinus, and from which Glauber probably desumed that, which we have been speaking of.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 140. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5.

Which may appear by that part of our eighteenth experiment whence the matter of fact is desumed.

Id. vol. i. p. 132. Touching the Weight and Spring of Air, part i. ch. v.

DETA'CH, DETA'CHED, DETA'CHEDLY, DETA'CHMENT. } De, and tach, from the A. S. tæcan, capere, to take. To remove any thing attached, (q. v.) any thing fixed, fastened, united or conjoined.

To disunite, disjoin, separate, send part away.

The Elector sent Count Mercy with a considerable body, to pass the Rhine near Basil, and on design to break into Frenche Comte: but a detached body of the French lying in their way there followed a very sharp engagement.

Burnet. Own Times. Queen Anne, Anno 1709.

Brief notices of different particulars of this case, are given detachedly by Rushworth and Whitelocke; and the judge himself has left us some very bold and spirited accounts of his bold and spirited carriage, and arguments in the course of it.

State Trials. The Case of Judge Jenkins.

It was pretended that he [the Duke of Marlborough] ought to have sent a force to support Opdam, or made an attempt on Villeroy's army, when it was weakened by the detachment sent with Bouflers.

Burnet. Own Times. Queen Anne, Anno 1703.

They are, in short, instruments in the hands of our Maker, to improve our minds, to rectify our failings, to detach us from the present scene, to fix our affections on things above.

Porteus. Sermon 1. vol. ii.

'Tis not for our own strength, brother Shandy; a centinel in a wooden centry-box might as well pretend to stand it out against a detachment of fifty men. We are upheld by the grace and the assistance of the best of beings.

Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. vii.

DETA'IL, v. DETA'IL, n. } "Fr. detailler; to piecemeal, to cut into pieces or parcels. Tale, the past participle of the A. S. verb tell-an; something told; to tell by tale, i. e. by numeration, not by weight or measure, but by the number told. Retail, told over again." Tooke, ii. 352.

To detail, to tell or enumerate the particulars, to particularize, to state minutely.

As if a man would say, that necessary it is for him to offer wrong in detaile, who mindeth to do right in the gross.

Holland. Plutarch, fol. 306.

But I shall not enter into a detail of the arguments of the earth's motion, and the objections made against it because I have done this in the preface.

Derham. Astro-Theology, book iv. ch. iii.

I mean not to write his [Evelyn] life, which may be found detailed in the new edition of his Sculptura, in Collins's Baronetage, in the General Dictionary, and in the New Biographical Dictionary. Walpole. Catalogue of Engravers, vol. v. p. 145.

Though Homer describes Laertes in his rural occupations as busied in this part of agriculture; yet Hesiod, in a professed and detailed poem on the subject, never once mentions the method of dunging the land.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book iv. Notes to p. 83.

He [Job] makes a transition from the singular to the plural, and back again, a remarkable amplification intervening, expressive of his desire of death, the force and boldness of which is incomparable; at last, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he returns to the former subject, which he had apparently quitted, and resumes the detail of his own misery.

Lowth. Lecture 14. vol. i. The Sublime in General.

DETA'IN, DETA'INER, DETA'INING, DETA'INMENT, DETE'NTION. } Fr. detenir; It. detenere; Sp. detenar; Lat. detin-ere, detentum, (de, and tenere, to hold.) To hold from, or withhold; to hold or keep back, sc. from going away; to stop, stay, retard, delay.

Thomas Archbishop of Yorke, of his great goodnes
Unto this place did restore willingly again
Those lands, which Aldred his precessor dubtless
By 29 yeare wrongfully did detayne.

R. Gloucester, p. 582.

There is not so ranke a traytor, nor so arrant a thiefe, nor so cruel a murderer, which is apprehended and deteigned in prisone for his offence, but he shal be brought before the iustice to heare his iudgemente. Hall. Henry IV. The firste Yere.

For some of thē be fayne for their soluciō, to graunt almost that their paine in the fire wer but a detayning therin by some strenger power then themselfe, & then wer the pain but as a prisōment and restraint of lybertie, if the fyre burn them not.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 386. The first Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

And lest, some bad and untrue conceits might be had as well of the cause of the earl's detainment, as of the manner of his death, it was therefore thought necessary to have the truth thereof made known in that presence.

State Trials. Inquisition upon the Death of the Earl of Northumland.

So craving expedition of his demand, minding to proceede further south without long detention in those partes, he dismissed them after promise given to their best endeauour to satisfie speedily his so reasonable request.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Sir H. Gilbert, vol. iii. fol. 150.

For pity now she can no more detain him;
The poor fool prays her that he may depart:
She is resolv'd no longer to restrain him;
Bids him farewell, and look well to her heart.

Shakspeare. Venus and Adonis.

The commandment of the writ being to shew the cause of his detaining in prison, the keeper of the gate-house doth not give a full answer unto the writ, unless the cause of the detainment in prison be returned.

State Trials. Proceedings on the Habeas Corpus brought by Sir T. Darnel and others.

That no freemen ought to be committed or detained in prison by the command of the king or privy council, or any other unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained.

State Trials. Proceedings in Parliament relating to the Liberty of the Subject. 3 Charles I.

'Twere better and safer to venture the casting away one almes sometimes, then by scruples and prudence to endanger the detaining a thousand, when they are due and necessary.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 295. Of Fraternal Admonition.

In regard whereof there was nothing could assure the quiet of both realms in their opinions but their detention under safe custody, which could not be esteemed dishonourable, the just causes and occasions being published and made manifest to the world.

Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, book v. Anno 1570.

His pious mother, anxious for his life,
Detain'd her son; and me, my pious wife.
To them the blossoms of our youth were due;
Our riper manhood we reserv'd for you.

Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book xiii.

He has granted many petitions: denies encroaching upon any man's freehold, unless in forcible detainers.

Parliamentary History. Charles II. Anno 1668.

When the same eye, without the least detainment in any of the particular parts, and resting, as it were, immoveable in the middle, or center of the tablature, may see at once, in an agreeable and perfect correspondency, all which is there exhibited to the sight.

Shaftesbury. Works, vol. iii. p. 437. The Judgment of Hercules, ch. v.

That which is got by those means [fraud, &c.] is not our own; nor is the possession of it truly wealth, but usurpation, and detention of spoil and rapine which we ought to disengage.

Barrow. Sermon 5. vol. i.

But I'll play fast and loose with you yet, if there be law; and my Minor and writings are not forth coming, I'll bring my action of detinue or trover.

Wycherley. The Plain Dealer, act iii. sc. 1.

Most pressing instances were still made that the canoes might be restored and having now the greatest reason to believe, either that the things for which I detained them were not in the island, or that those, who suffered by their detention, had not sufficient influence over the thieves to prevail upon them to relinquish their booty, I determined at length to give them up.

Cook. Voyage, vol. i. book i. ch. xiv.

For there can never be a deposit without the owner's consent, and a depositary would be chargeable only for gross negligence, whereas the pawnee, whose special property is determined by the wrongful detainer, becomes liable in all possible events to make good the thing lost, or to relinquish his debt.

Sir William Jones. Works, vol. viii. p. 409. The Law of Bailments.

Southcote declared in detinue, that he had delivered goods to Bennet, to be by him safely kept: the defendant confessed such delivery, but pleaded in bar, that a certain person stole them out of his possession.

Id. Ib. vol. viii. p. 368. On Bailments.

DETINUE, in Law, as used in the above citation from Wycherley, is a Writ which lies against a man, who having goods or chattels delivered to keep, refuses to redeliver them; it answers in some measure to the Actio depositi of the Civilians. It is necessary to ascertain the thing Detained in such manner, that it may be specifically known and recovered: thus it cannot be brought for money, corn, or the like; for they cannot be identified, unless by being in a bag or sack they may be distinguishably marked. In order to ground an Action of Detinue, the following points are requisite: That the Defendant came lawfully into possession of the goods, either by delivery to him or by finding them; that the Plaintiff have a property; that the goods themselves be of some value; and that they are ascertained in point of identity. Upon this the Jury, if they find for the Plaintiff, assess the value of the things Detained, and damages for such Detention. The judgment is conditional, that the Plaintiff recover the goods, or, if these cannot be had, their value and damages for Detaining them. There is one disadvantage which attends this Action, that the Defendant is permitted to exculpate himself by oath, which privilege is grounded on the confidence originally reposed by the lender in the borrower, whence arose strong presumptive evidence, that in the Plaintiff's own opinion the Defendant was worthy of credit. (Co. Litt. 395.) For this reason this species of action is of late much disused, and has given place to the action of Trover. Wentworth, System of Pleading, vii.; Selwyn, Abridgement of Law of Nisi Prius.

DE'TECT, v. DE'TECT, adj. DE'TECTOR, DE'TECTION. Detegere, detectum, to uncover; (de, and tegere, to cover. Gr. στέγ-ειν.) To uncover, to discover, to lay bare, to expose; to bring to light; to see or search through any concealment.

If he that weareth [an auncient robe] it be vyciouse, it more detecteth howe moch he is vnworthy to wear it;—the remembraunce of his noble auncetour makynge men to abhorre the reproche gyuen by an yuell successour.

Sir Thomas Elyot. Gouernour, book ii. ch. iv.

But the wiely & wicked thoughtes of such, the light of the truth of the Gospel when it ariseth, shal plainly find out & detect.

Udall. Luke, ch. ii.

This ix. yere, aboute Mydlent a preest named Sir Thomas Bagley, and vicar of a vyllage in Essex, called Manuedern, a lytell from Walden, was detect of heresy, vpon the whiche he was degrated, and then brent in the place of Smythfielde.

Fabyan. Anno 1531.

He sheweth incidētly wherfore it were not reason in a detection of heresy, to suffer, the witnesses published and the crime wel proued, any new witnesses to be receiued for the partie that is accused.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 211. A Dialogue concerning Heresies.

I mean not in speaking this to upbraid or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a fair house the Syracusans gave him in the city, and a goodly mannor also in the countrey: for in such cases there is no dishonesty in receiving, but yet it is greater honesty to refuse then to take.

Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 237. The Comparison of Pavlus Æmylivs with Timoleon.

Now before I leave this, I shall take the opportunity, which this head offers, to endeavour the detection of some grand prejudices of sense, in two instances.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. ix.

In which bargain, that the city might receive no loss, the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Ralegh. History of the World, book v. ch. iii. sec. 18.

——— While he with watchful eye
Observes, and shoots their treasons as they fly:
Their weekly frauds his keen replies detect;
He undeceives more fast than they infect.

Dryden. Absalom and Achitophel.

And that no man whatsover, so presented and detected by the virtue of the oaths of such questmen, shall molest or trouble at the law any of the questmen for such presenting, upon pain that every such detected offender commencing any such action against the detector in such case, shall forfeit to the queen's majesty's use ten pound.

Strype. Life of Grindal. An Appendix of Original Papers, book i. No. 6.

These things so happily meeting, may argue God (who mouldeth the hearts, who guideth the hands, who enlighteneth the minds of man) to have been engaged in the detection of this day's black conspiracy.

Barrow. Sermon 11. vol. i.

DETECT. — DETERGE

For were not such miracles and oracles at last generally believed? or, if several impostures were detected, does the author imagine that such detection would utterly sink the credit of all future miracles.
Hurd. Works, vol. viii. p. 174. Remarks on Mr. Weston's Enquiry.

The Romans were plagued with a set of public officers, belonging to the emperor's court, called Curiosi, and Imperatoris oculi, part of whose employment was to go about as detectors of frauds and misdemeanors.
Fortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 13.

DETENEBRATE; de and tenebræ, darkness, which Vossius thinks is from ten-ere, to hold; because men in darkness (in tenebris) are held, (quasi teneantur,) and dare not move themselves freely least they strike against any thing, or fall from an eminence.

Yet are their tractates little auxiliary unto ours, nor afford us any light to detenebrate and clear the truth.
Sir Thomas Brown, book vi. ch. vi.

DETE'R, v. DETE'RMENT, DETE'RRING. Deterrere, to frighten from; de, and terrere; Gr. ταράσσ-ω, to frighten.
To frighten from (sc. doing any thing;) to cause to cease or desist; and thus, to hinder, to prevent.

So much the horror of so vile a deed,
In vilest minds, deters them to proceed.
Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book iii.

C. It is, first, a determent from this sin; secondly, a direction how to avoid it. The determent this; to consider how fearful a thing it were, if God should judge us without mercy; and how reasonable it is, that he should so do, if we be so unmercifull to other men.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 91. Practical Catechism.

For although on her head there seems to be crownes of gold, and her haire like the haire of women, yet her teeth appeare as the teeth of lions and her sting like that of scorpions; so that the deterrings and disabuses appeare together with the delectations.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 10. sec. 4.

So that upon consideration of the whole matter, there is no reason why any man should be deterr'd from a holy and virtuous life for fear of the labour and pains of it. Because every one that is wicked takes more pains in another way, and is more industrious only to a worse purpose.
Tillotson. Works. Sermon 7.

As piety doth require duties somewhat high and hard, as much crossing the natural inclinations and desires of men, it particularly for the over-ruling such aversion, doth need answerably great encouragements to the practice, and determents from the transgression of what it requireth.
Barrow. Works. Sermon 32. vol. ii.

Behaving with the agility and boldness peculiar to sailors, they were rather animated than deterred by the flames and falling buildings amongst which they wrought.
Anson. Voyage round the World, book iii. ch. x.

DETE'RGE, DETE'RGENT, adj. DETE'RGENT, n. DETE'RSION, DETE'RSIVE. Detergere, detersum, to wipe away; de, and tergere, tersum, to wipe, which Vossius thinks is from τέρσ-ω, Æol. for τείρ-ω, which signifies ξηραίν-ω, or siccare, to dry; and, consequently, to wipe or rub dry. And thus,
To wipe off or away, to cleanse, to purify.

When it is burnt, there is made of the ashes a strong leie, very detersive, and scouring. Holland. Plutarch, fol. 667.

Sea salt preserves bodies, through which it passeth, from corruption, and it detergeth the vessels, and keeps the fluids from putrefaction. Arbuthnot.

The food ought to be nourishing and detergent. Id.

The virtues of the most valuable preparation, I mean salt of amber, are in a great degree answered by tar-water, as a detergent, diaphoretic, and diuretic. Bishop Berkeley. Siris, sec. 23.

I endeavoured detersion; but the matter could not be discharged.
Wiseman.

DETE'RIORATE, DETERIORA'TION. "Fr. deteriorer; to impair, make worse, mar, spoyl, (destroy.)" Cotgrave. Deterius a terendo; because things are the worse, the more they are worn.

And besides, the refined gold, there lay upon the cavity of the coppel some dark-coloured excrements, which we concluded to have proceeded from the deteriorated metal, not from the lead.
Boyle. Works, vol. iv. p. 367. Historical account of a Degradation of Gold.

It is not, therefore, without deep concern that I observe a measure proposed to the legislature which has a direct tendency to degrade grammar schools; and, if not absolutely to abolish them or diminish their number, yet to alter and deteriorate their constitution.
Knox. Works, vol. iv. p. 286. Remarks on Grammar Schools.

Such changes are falsely imputed to levity, falsehood, or caprice in the patron, since they may be more justly ascribed to the client's gradual deterioration.
Goldsmith. Citizen of the World, let. 99

DETE'RMINE, DETE'RMINABLE, DETE'RMINATE, DETE'RMINATELY, DETERMINA'TION, DETE'RMINATIVE, DETE'RMINATOR, DETE'RMINATING, n. DETE'RMINATEDLY. Fr. determiner; Sp. determinar; It. determinare; Lat. determinare, terminum dare, to bound, to fix the bound or terminus. Gr. τέρμων, ων. To bound, to limit, to define, to end; to confine, fixor settle the bounds, the limits, the ends; and thus, met. to conclude, to decide, to resolve.

But I sei as longe tyme as the eyr is a litil child, he diuerith no thing fro a seruant whanne he is lord of alle thingis, but he is vndir keperis and tutouris into the tyme determined of the fadir.
Wiclif. Galathias, ch. iv.

As Tullius can determine
Which in his time was full sage.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 139.

Have ye than a figure determinat
In helle, ther ye ben in your estat?
Id. The Freres Tale, vol. 7041.

But nowe to enforme thee, that yee been lich to Goddes, these clarkes sain, and in determinacion shewen, that three things hauen the names of Goddes been cleaped, that is to saine: Man, Deuill, and Images. Id. The Testament of Loue, fol. 294.

——————— They determine,
That in the maner as it stoode,
They wolde hym bath in childes blood
Within seuen winter age.
Gower. Conf. Am. book. ii. fol. 46.

For I am determined to gather the people and to brynge the kyngdomes together that I maye poure out myne anger, yea all my wrathful displeasure vpon them.
Bible, Anno 1551. Sophony, ch. iii.

And so the matter was a determynge (concernynge the men that had outlandysh wyues) vntyll the new moone of the fyrst moneth.
Id. Ib. The third Boke of Esdras.

The 15 day in the morning the captaine came downe with 100 men with him and brought his wife, and many others brought their wiues also, because their towne was 8 miles vp in the countrey, and they determined to lie by the sea side till they had bought what they would.
Hakluyt. Voyages, &c. M. W. Tourson, vol. ii. p. 2. fol. 35.

Another is that he sayth ye nunne was kept in ple in ye spiritual law for a matter determinable in ye kinges court.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 298. The Supplication of Soule.

TER-INE.

Item, that he contrary to the great Charter of England caused diuers lustie men to appele diuers olde men, vpon matters determinable at the common law, in the court marciall, because that in that court is no triall but onely by battaile.

Hall. Henry IV. The Introduction, fol. 8.

Therefore I have not thought amisse now to finish and pece up the said Complaynt of Philomene, observing neuertheless the same determinate inuention which I had propounded and begonne (as it is saide) twelue yeeres now past.

Gascoigne. The Complaynt of Philomene.

But whē it [a kynge to raygne ouer thē] was ones determinatly graunted them, what was more earnestly requyred of God in that magnifycent mynystracyon, then were the necessary affayres of relygion. Bale. Apology, p. 1. Epistle Dedycatorye.

At such time as Alexander assembled the Grecians in Isthmos for the determinacion of his iourney into Perse, many oratours & philosophers came to visite him, onely Diogenes that remayned about Corinth, kept him selfe away.

Brende. Quintus Curtius, book iii. fol. 15.

Then y^e^ iiii. day of May was an Oyer & determiner at Londō before y^e^ Mayre, the Duke of Norffolke, the Erle of Surrey and other. Hall. Henry VIII. The ninth Yere.

He said likewise, he would undertake (and he could not but be believ'd from the reasonableness of it,) that his presence, would in a moment, determine the restitution of the Palatinate to his brother and sister.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i. p. 13.

The circuit thereof, through divers creeks, is not well determinable; but as astronomers use to measure the stars, we may account it a city of the first magnitude.

Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 215.

And it seemeth that upon this aduise they tooke their determinate resolution for this course, and to put it into execution with all speede, eyther that night or the next at the furthest.

Stow. Queene Elizabeth. Anno 1601.

And the necessitie which might have secured more the creature, would not have honoured so much the creator; God would have receiv'd no voluntary love for his only creatures indued with that capacitie, if the affections of angels and men had been determinately fix'd by their creation.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 3. sec. 1.

Why do we stick in this point [in reforming the church] and not rather proceed in it with all expedition? For indeed according to the laws of this kingdom, as it hath the dignity of preeminence, so let us give it the priority in our determinations.

State Trials. Proceedings against the Bishop of Ely.

Upon the same account, as our Lord Christ's body could not be longer detained under the power of death, then the determinative time of three days, because the debt which he undertook was paid: so that "it was not possible he should be holden of it." Acts, ii. 24.

Hale. Contemplations, vol. ii. p. 363. The Knowledge of Christ Crucified.

The last thing I came to in the last discourse, is this, [Vs,] Hath loved us, He hath not only put forth an act or purpose of love at random, indefinitely, that he would love some of us, or that he would love mankind; but [us] determinately.

Goodwin. Works. Sermon 11. vol. i. p. 2.

From whence notwithstanding we cannot conclude the non-existence of the rainbow; nor is that chronology naturally established, which computeth the antiquity of effects arising from physical and setled causes, by additional impositions from voluntary determinatores. Sir Thomas Brown, book vii. ch. iv.

So that the Sanhedrin and Congregation of the people were the highest soveraigne power, and principall determiners of publike matters concerning warre and peace.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty, &c. part v. fol. 141.

Amongst the rest for the determining of quarrels that might arise in case of doubtful title, or of false accusation or the like, they put themselves upon many unusual forms of tryal; as to handle red hot iron, to walk bare foot on burning coals.

Hale. Rem., part i. p. 92.

But the answer to this, is not difficult, viz: That the point now before us is not wholly determinable from the bare grammatical use of the words; but the sense of these words must be sometimes also determined, by the particular state and circumstance of the objects to which they are applied. DETERMINE. — DETEST.

South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 253.

Now measure alone in any modern language, does not constitute verse; those of the ancients in Greek and Latin, consisted in quantity of words, and a determinate number of feet.

Dryden. Essay on Dramatick Poesie.

But if a competent quantity of that water be boiled (or permitted to exhale) away, and the remaining liquor be suffered to rest awhile, especially in a cool place the saline particles will by reuniting themselves, and by the exclusion of the aqueous parts constitute stable and determinately-figured icicles of crystals.

Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 420. History of Firmness.

The parliament having received an account of the hopeful condition of their affairs in Ireland, and of the great appearance there was of a speedy determination of that war, appointed a committee to summon before them those adventurers who, in the year 1641, had advanced monies upon the lands in Ireland.

Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. i. p. 339.

We own it [Scripture] to be the rule of our lives, and the foundation of our faith, and in all our considerable controversies we place it in the throne (as the councils of Ephesus and Aquileia did) for the moderator and determiner of such doubts and differences.

Comber. Companion to the Temple. The Lessons, part i. sec. 9.

By determining the will, if the phrase be used with any meaning, must be intended, causing that the act of the will or choice should be thus, and not otherwise: and the will is said to be determined, when, in consequence of some action, or influence, its choice is directed to, and fixed upon a particular object.

Edwards, (Jon.) On the Freedom of the Will, part i. sec. 2.

Their true and real character, as to virtue and vice, is determinable only by their inward principles and sentiments, which are known to God alone, who searcheth the heart and reins.

Sherlock. Discourse 25. vol. i.

We perceive the distance of visible objects more exactly and determinately with two eyes than with one.

Reid. Enquiry, ch. vi. sec. 22.

As when we speak of the determination of motion, we mean using the motion of the body to be such a way, or in such a direction rather than another.

Edwards, (Jon.) On the Freedom of the Will, part i. sec. 2.

But if the term, added to make up the complex subject, does not necessarily or constantly belong to it, then it is determinative, and limits the subject to a particular part of its extension; as, Every pious man shall be happy.

Watts. Logic, part ii. ch. ii.

——————— And where is he,
So stubborn and determinedly stiff,
But shall at some time bend the knee to love,
And make obeisance to his mighty shrine?

Cumberland. From Alexis. The Observer, No. 143.

To talk of the determination of the will, supposes an effect, which must have a cause. If the will be determined, there is a determiner.

Edwards, (Jon.) On the Freedom of the Will, part i. sec. 2.

DETE'ST, DETE'STABLE, DETE'STABLY, DETE'STABLENESS, DETE'STATE, DETESTA'TION, DETE'STER, DETE'STING, n. } Fr. detester; It. detestare; Sp. detestar; Lat. detestari. Obtestatio est cum Deus testis in meliorem partem vocatur. Detestatio, cum in deteriorem. Festus. Deum testari hoc vel illud mihi odiosum. To call God to witness that this or that is odious or hateful to me. And, generally,

To loathe, abhor, hate, abominate; dislike in a great degree.

DETEST. But I finde in Erasmus my derlyng y^t he detesteth and abhorreth the errours & heresies that Tyndall plainly teacheth and abideth by, and therefore Erasmus my derlyng shalbe my dere derlyng stil.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 422. The first Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

And doubtlesse if you bryng not foorth the holy fathers that make for you, you shall not alonely bee taken for abhominable and open lyers, but also for shameful and detestable sclaunderers both of holy church, and also of holy fathers.

Barnes. Workes, fol. 302. On receiving the Holy Communion.

Yet it hath been tolde vs by diuers great clerkes that neither she is our lawful doughter nor her mother our lawful wife, but that we liue together abhominably and detestably in open adultery. Hall. Henry VIII. The twentieth Yere.

How dare he bee so impudente as to embrace and wurshippe this holie booke, the whiche in all kinde of liuing and conuersacion is vtterly geuen and married vnto this worlde, whiche as a mortall enemy the doctrine of the Ghospel dooeth detestate & abhorre. Udall. John, Pref. fol. 303.

For if an open sinner be found among vs, we must immediatly amende him or caste him out of the congregation with defiance and detestation of his sinne.

Tindall. Workes, fol. 426. Exposition vpon the first Epistle of Saint John, ch. v.

Daily he tempted her with this or that,
And neuer suffred her to be at rest:
But euermore she him refused flat
And all his fained kindnesse did detest.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book iii. can. 8.

By reason of his cruelty, he became detestable, not onely to his owne subjects but also to his neighbours round about.
Usher. Annals. Anno Mundi 3867.

Lycurgus detestably abhorring this brutish and savage unnaturalness of the woman, did not reject her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to dislike it.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 34. Lycurgus.

Well therefore might the lord president, whom I shall always mention with as much honour, as you with contempt, nay whom your contempt confirms to me to be the more honourable, well might he detestate star-chamber examinations, as they had been abused in the late king's days.
State Trials. The Trial of Colonel John Lilburne.

The Earle of Kildare being charged before King Henry the Seauenth, for burning the metropolitane church of Cassillis in Ireland, and many witnesses procured to auouch the trueth of the article against him, he sodainly confessed it to the great wondring and detestation of the councel.
Camden. Remaines. Wise Speeches, p. 284.

Which is nothing else but to rob men, and make God the receiver, who is the detester, and will be the punisher, of such crimes. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 94.

And yet this is not enough to inferre, that we consent with the Lutherans, eyther in their abhorring and detesting of it, or in those opinions which they hold against it; except there could be given, Nihil tertium. Mountague. Appeale to Cæsar.

Amidst our course Zacynthian woods appear;
And next by rocky Neriots we steer:
We fly from Ithaca's detested shore,
And curse the land which dire Ulysses bore.
Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book iii.

All that had made defection from their cause, or that were thought indifferent as to either side, which they call detestable neutrality, were put out of commission.
Burnet. Own Times, vol. i. p. 64.

Other occasions will put us upon this thought; but chiefly a strong view of merit in a generous character, oppos'd to some detestably vile one.

Shaftesbury. Essay on Freedom of Wit and Humour, part iv. sec. 2.

Under the strong image of the unfitness and abominableness, and detestableness and profaneness of any uncleanness or impurity appearing in the Temple of God; the odiousness of all moral impurity, of all debauched practices whatsoever, in any person who professes himself to be a worshipper of God, is set forth after a more lively and affecting manner.
Clark. Sermon 6. vol. iii. DETH-DETH

But here I had a lingering view of approaching death, and little or no hopes of escaping it; and I must confess that my courage, which I had hitherto kept up, failed me here; and I made very sad reflections on my former life, and look'd back with horrour and detestation, on actions which before I disliked, but now I trembled at the remembrance of.
Dampier. Voyages, Anno 1688.

It grew high time for the English nation to think of recovering itself from some of that infamy and loud reproach, that the spilling of innocent royal blood, and the prophane invasion of all that was sacred or civil had brought upon it, in the opinion of all the nations round about, that stood as spectators and detesters of those religious barbarities, those villanies cloaked and sanctified with the name of reformation.
South. Sermon 4. vol. ix.

For as the gates of Hades I detest
The sordid wretch, whom want can tempt to lie.
Cowper. Homer. Odyssey, book xiv.

In our country, great numbers have been condemned to die at different times, after a public trial, by the most eminent judges of the kingdom: and in some places, for a perpetual memory of their diabolical practices, anniversary sermons and solemnities have been piously instituted, and subsist at this day, to propagate a detestation of them to all posterity.

Middleton. Works, vol. i. p. 180. An Enquiry into the Miraculous Powers.

DETHRO'NE, DETHRO'NIZE, DETHRONA'TION, DETHRO'NEMENT. } Ger. thron; Dutch, troon; Fr. throne, thron; Sp. trono; It. throno; Lat. thronus; Gr. θρόνος, from the unused θρά-ειν, sedere, to sit. See THRONE.

To remove from the Throne.

The king in signe of amitie stayed his cosen the Earle of Derbie (the same who afterward dethroned him) to supper.
Speed. Richard II. book ix. ch. xiii.

As for the queene, when shee was (God knows how farre guilty) aduertised of her husband's dethronization, shee outwardly expressed so great extremity of passion (notwithstanding that at the same time shee was tolde of her sonnes surrogation) as if shee had beene distraught of her wittes.
Id. Edward II. book ix. ch. xii. sec. 73.

——— Sesostris; (proud Egyptian King,
That monarchs harness'd to his chariot yok'd,
Base servitude! and his dethron'd compeers
Lash'd furious; they in sullen majesty
Drew the uneasy load.)
J. Philips. Blenheim.

In December 1647 he [Silas Titus] was taken into favour for a time by Ol. Cromwell and the army, to persuade the king, then in the Isle of Wight, to consent to the 4 votes of dethronizing him.
Wood. Athenæ Oxonienses, vol. ii. fol. 1036.

The question of dethroning, or, if these gentlemen like the phrase better, "cashiering kings," will always be, as it has always been, an extraordinary question of state, and wholly out of the law; a question (like all other questions of state) of dispositions, and of means, and of probable consequences, rather than positive rights. Burke. On the Revolution in France.

The contingency of uniting France and Spain under the same prince appeared more remote, about the middle of the last great war, when the dethronement of Philip in favour of Charles was made a condition of peace sine qua non, than the contingency of a union of the Imperial and Spanish crowns.
Bolingbroke. Works. Letter 8. vol. iv. p. 91.

DETOMB, v. Fr. tombe; It. tomba; Sp. tumba; Lat. tumba; Gr. τύμβος, a tumendo, to swell, to rise up. To remove from the tomb. See TOMB.

Crownes, throwne from thrones to tombes, detomb'd arise
To match thy Muse with a monarchicke theame,
That whilst her sacred soaring cuts the skyes,
A vulgar subject may not wrong the same.
Stirling. To the Author of the Monarchicke Tragedies.

E-ATE. —RACT

DE'TONATE, DETONA'TION, DE'TONIZE. } De, and ton-are; Gr. τον-οειν, intendere, sc. vocem, to stretch the voice, to shout.

To make a loud noise, to crack, to explode. A word brought much into use lately by the invention of Detonating balls.

For the clear comprehending of this experiment, you may be pleased Pyrophilus to take notice, i. That a new coal is not to be cast on the nitre, till the detonation occasioned by the former be either quite or altogether ended.

Boyle. A Physico-Chymical Essay, relating to Salt-petre.

DETO'RT, DETO'RSION. } Detorquere, detortum; de, and torquere, to twist, to wrest. See DISTORT.

But [the author] hath only wrested and detorted such actions of state, as in times of his service have been managed.

Bacon. Works, vol. ii. p. 26. Observations on a Libel.

The Arians opposed the apostolick tradition, and by corrupting detorted the words of Scripture to their sence.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 475. Of Fundamentals.

And 'tis worth observing that many authorities, which the Papists produce for the external sacrifice of the body of Christ in the masse, are but the detortion and disguising of those places which belong to the offertory of the people.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 375. View of the New Directory.

His ninth section hath somewhat new in it (but perfectly agreeable to the mistakes and detortions gleaned from the Catholick gentleman. Id. Ib. vol. ii. part ii. fol. 76.

It is of great moment to take off all possible misconstruction that can be wrested or detorted from the tenor and expressions of the libelled explication.

State Trials. The Earle of Argyle, 33 Charles II. 1681.

Thus much is intimated by the original word στρεβλοῦν which signifies, either to detort or turn away, or to torment, and put to the question. Atterbury. Sermon 11. vol. iii.

DETOURS, "Fr. detours; a turning, by-way, crooked way; also, a cunning shift, a subtile evasion, crafty avoidance." Cotgrave. See DETURN.

The ablest advocates of necessity now inveloping it in systems; and insinuating it in all the artful detours of what they call a sufficient reason.

Warburton. Works, vol. ii. p. 18. Defence of Mr. Pope.

DETRA'CT, DETRA'CTER, DETRA'CTION, DETRA'CTIVE, DETRA'CTOR, DETRA'CTORY, DETRA'CTRESS. } Fr. detracter; It. ditrahere, ditrare; Sp. detratar, detractar. Lat. detrahere (ctum), aliquid de famâ alterius trahere. Minshew. To draw or take away from the fame of another. Literally,

To draw or take away from; to traduce, to withdraw; and met. with a subaudition of the fame or reputation of another.

Detraction; slander, calumny.

Bacon, in his judicial Charge upon the Commission for the Verge, is (in an old edition) made to use the word detraction, literally, viz. "The detraction of the eggs of wild fowl." The Quarto edition of his Works, iii. 559, reads "Destruction."

Lest peraventure stryuyngis, enueyes, sturdinessis, dissencioums, and detractiouns, priuy spechis of discord, bolnyngis bi pride, debatis ben among ghou.

Wiclif. Galathies, ch. xii.

Priuy backbiteris, detractoris, hateful to God, debatouris, proude and highe ouer measure. Id. Romaynes, ch. i.

Forsoth Salomon sayth, That flaterie is werse than detraction: for sometime detraction maketh an hautein man to be the more humble, for he dredeth detraction, but certes flaterie maketh a man to enhaunce his herte and his countenance.

Chaucer. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 335.

This sinne of backbiting or detracting hath certain spices, as thus: som men preiseth his neighbour by a wicked intente, for he maketh alway a wicked knotte at the laste ende: alway he maketh a BUT at the last ende, that is digne of more blame, than is worthe all the preising. DETRACT

Chaucer. The Persones Tale, vol. ii. p. 322.

Touchend as of enuious brood
I wote not one of all good.
But netheles suche as thei bee,
Yet there is one, and that is hee
Which cleped is detraction.

Gower. Conf. Am. book ii. fol. 30.

And thus it appeareth that the souldiars wages, and the transportation may be defrayed for farre lesse summes of money, then the detractours of this enterprise haue giuen out.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Westerne Planting, vol. iii. fol. 178.

We that calumnious critic may eschew,
That blasteth all things with his poison'd breath,
Detracting what laboriously we do,
Only with that which he but idly saith.

Drayton. Moses his Birth and Miracles, book ii.

For Scipio African on the other side, if we shall rather credit the best authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious writers, we may say he was a bountiful and temperate captain, and not onely lively and valient in fight, but also courteous and mercifull after victory.

Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 910. Hannibal and Scipio.

And at the rear of these in secret guise
Crept thievery and detraction, near akin
No twins more like: they seem'd almost the same;
One stole the goods, the other the good name:
The latter lives in scorn, the former dies in shame.

P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, can. 7.

From whence we may not improperly derive this enquirie, (admitting the being of evil not at all detractive from God) whether the properties of God are not detrimental to the nature of the wicked. Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 3. sec. 2.

Here no detractor wounds who merits best,
Nor shameless brow cheers on impiety.

Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book v.

For this is not onely derogatory unto the wisdom of God, who hath proposed the world unto our knowledge, and thereby the notion of himselfe; but also detractory unto the intellect, and sense of man, expressedly disposed for that inquisition.

Sir Thomas Brown, book i. ch. v.

It infinitely concerns us to hold stedfastly that faith which Christ thus deliver'd, and the Apostles preach'd, and the Scriptures contain, (as, God be thank'd, That and no other is the faith which our church holds forth) and by no means to add to it, or detract from it. Sharp. Works. Discourse 1. vol. v.

Oates and Bedlow did, by their behaviour, detract more from their own credit, than all their enemies could have done.

Burnet. Own Times. Charles II. Anno 1678.

But, oh! what transports did the heart invade,
When first he saw the lovely royal maid!
Fame, that so high did her perfections raise,
Seem'd now detraction, and no longer praise!

Duke. Upon the Marriage of Captain W. Beloe.

Some base detractor has my honour stain'd
And in your easy heart a credit gain'd;
Abus'd, and told you Titus was unjust.

Otway. Titus and Berenice, act ii. sc. 1.

Wonder not, Lindamor, that in mentioning the joys of heaven, I use the expression I find less detractory from a theme, as much above our praises, as the heaven they are enjoyed in is above our heads. Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 283. Seraphic Love.

If any shall detract from a lady's character unless she be absent, the said detractress shall be forthwith ordered to the lowest place of the room. Addison.

I know it has been the fashion to detract both from the moral and literary character of Cicero: and indeed neither his life nor his writings are without the characteristics of humanity.

Knox. Works. Letter 8. vol. v.

Knows he, that mankind praise against their will,
And mix as much detraction as they can.

Young. The Complaint. Night 8.

DE-TRENCH. DETRENCH, "Fr. trencher, to cut or carve, slice, hack or hue." Cotgrave.

DE-TRUDE. For if your bodie were detrenched, or youre bodie maymed with some sodaine stroke, what profite were it for you to weepe vpon your wound, and when the harme is done, to lament still the sore.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorike, fol. 71.

DE'TRIMENT, DETRIME'NTAL, DE'TRIMENTED, DETRI'TION. Fr. detriment; It. and Sp. detrimento; Lat. detrimentum, (usu tritum, Vossius,) from deterere, detritum quòd ea quæ trita sunt, minoris pretii sunt. Minshew. Because things which are worn are of less value.

Lessening or loss, or diminution of value; damage, injury, mischief.

Mr. Steevens, in Note 2 on King Henry VI. Second Part, act v. sc. 3, has introduced the word Detrition. The Brush of time, he says, is the gradual Detrition of time.

But the euill chaunce of the Frenche nacyon was to hys purpose a barre and a lette, because they were predestynate to suffre yet more plagues and detrymentes of thenglishe people then before they had tasted. Hall. Henry V. The fourth Yere.

For yf it shuld be withdrawen in time of syckenesse, nature shulde susteyne treble detrement.
Sir Thomas Elyot. The Castel of Helth, book ii.

First, I say, all private property must give way to the public; and therefore a trespass to private men may be punished by indictment, because it is an offence of the public weal: and though every man hath a property in his goods, yet he must not use them in detriment of the commonwealth.
State Trials. Hampden. In the Case of Ship Money.

One preached before the judges on this text, "And let judgement run down like waters, and righteousnesse as a mighty stream;" at what time the draining of the fens was designed, suspected detrimental to the university.
Fuller. Worthies. London.

As for the proprietaries of such (or rather of the ground surrounding such,) medical waters, as I would not have them detrimented in the least degree by the conflux of people unto them; so it is injurious in my judgement for them to set them to sale, and make gain of God's free gift therein.
Id. Ib. vol. i. part iii. ch. ii.

Let us view therefore the necessary parts of theology itself, wherein the teacher cannot be ignorant or uninstructed, but to the very great detriment of his disciples, and his own greater shame and hazard. Bishop Bull. Works, vol. i. p. 149.

Well therefore did St. Paul in respect to the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ his Lord esteem all such things (all worldly privileges and benefits) as loss, and as dung; as things detrimental and despicable. Barrow. Sermon 22. vol. ii.

A present personal detriment is so heavy, where it falls, and so instant in its operation, that the cold commendation of a public advantage never was, and never will be a match for the quick sensibility of a private loss. Burke. On Economical Reform.

DETRU'DE, DETRU'SION. Detrudere, to thrust down; de, and trudere, to thrust.
To thrust or push down.

And theim to cast and detrude sodaynly into continual captiuitie and bondage. Hall. Richard III. The third Yere.

But such as are detruded down to hell,
Either for shame, they still themselves retire;
Or ty'd in chains, they in close prison dwell,
And cannot come, although they much desire.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, sec. 32.

And if it be true, that philosophy would inform us of, it turns a man a witch, and leaves him not, till it leads him into the very condition of Devils, to be detruded heaven for his meerly pride and malice. Feltham. Resolve 56.

At that very time did this Hildebrand (otherwise Gregory) by the instigation of the Devill (as himselfe confessed at his death,) (witnesse Cardinall Benno and Sigebert) trouble the Church; belike with the violent obtrusion of this doctrine of Devils (prohibition of marriage) and insolent detrusion of imperiall authority. Hall. The Honour of the Married Clergy.

That way of speaking would agree yet worse with the notions of those philosophers who allow of transmigration, and are of opinion that the souls of men may, for their miscarriages, be detruded into the bodies of beasts, as fit habitations, with organs suited to the satisfaction of their brutal inclinations.
Locke. Of the Human Understanding, book ii. ch. xxvii.

He may feed him well, clothe him well, work him moderately; but my lords, nothing that the master can do for his slave, short of manumission, can reinstate him in the condition of man, from which man ought not to be detruded.
Bishop Horsley. Speeches, p. 522.

DETRU'NK, DETRU'NCATE, DETRUNCA'TION. Lat. truncus; that which is left of the tree, when the boughs or branches are lopped off. Vossius. Cockeram, Detruncate; to cut or lop boughs. Detruncation; a lopping or cutting.

Yet to my selfe I seme not nudde nor from my witte a lette.
No more semed Agaue to her selfe
when she of dolefull chylde,
The head detruncte, dyd beare about;
she thought her selfe full mylde.
Drant. Horace. The third Satyr.

This can never prove either any interpolations in the former, or detruncations in the latter.
Biblioth. Bibl. (Ox. 1720,) p. 52.

The examples, thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments or doctrine of their authors; the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty detruncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his texts, or the philosopher his system.
Johnson. Preface to his Dictionary.

DETUMESCENCE; detumere, to cease to swell; de, and tumere, to swell.

Where it is observable also, that the wider the circulating vent grows, still hath it the more subsidence and detumescence, together with an abatement of celerity; till at last all becomes plain and smooth again. Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 561.

DETURBATE; de, and turba; Gr. τύρβη, a tumult. See DISTURB.

And where is now (Maister Cope) this your reiecting, expeling, remouing, expulsing, exempting, deturbating, and thrusting out of Anatholius, Sanct Dorothæ, and other holie saints out of catalogues, fastes, and calendars.
Fox. Martyrs, fol. 535. A Defence of the Lord Cobham against Alanus Copus.

DETURN, "Fr. destourner; to turn, divert, distract, avert, withdraw, dissuade," &c. Cotgrave. See DETOUR.

While the sober aspect and severity of bare precepts detur many from lending a pleased ear to the wholesome doctrine; and, what men swallow with delight, is converted into nourishment. Digby. Of Man's Soul, ch. iii.

DETU'RPATE, DETURPA'TION. Fr. deturper; de, and turpis. Of uncertain origin.
To defile, to pollute, to contaminate.

(The Church of England) being ashamed of the errors, superstitions, heresies, and impieties, which had deturpated the face of the Church; looked in the glass of Scripture and pure antiquity, and wash'd away those stains with which time, and inadvertency and tyranny had besmear'd her.
Taylor. Polemical Discourses, fol. 312. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. ch. i.

And the remaining part have passed through the limbecks and strainers of hereticks, and monks, and ignorants, and interested persons, and have passed through the corrections and deturpations and mistakes of transcribers.
Id. Rule of Conscience, fol. 372. book ii. ch. iii.

AST. — E-OPE.

DEVA'ST, DEVA'STATE, DEVASTA'TION. } Devastare; de, and vastare, to waste, to lay waste. Of Vastare, Vossius gives no satisfactory account; it is probably of Northern origin. A. S. westen, desertum, a desert. Ger. wusten, werwuesten; Dutch, woesten, ver-woesten, to lay waste. Fr. guster; It. guastare; Sp. gastar.

To lay waste, to ravage, demolish, destroy, plunder.

——— Can they
Look on the strength of Cundrestine defac'd?
The glory of Heydon-hall devasted? that
Of Edington cast down.
Ford. Perkin Warbeck, act iv. sc. 1.

And after seventeene yeares civill wars, to the devastation of the realme, King Stephen and Henry the sonne of Maude came to a treaty at Wallingford, where by the aduise of the lords they made this accord; that Stephen if he would, should peaceably hold the kingdome during his life.
Prynne. Treachery, &c. part i. fol. 94.

He with the rest of his Almains, in their journey had devoured and consumed it, with over-doing every kind of service, by raising great displeasure, devasting and spoiling the emperor's country of Leige, and his subjects there.
Strype. Memorials. Edward VI. Anno 1552.

His fierce anger kindled a fearful fire amongst us, which hath laid the honour of our nation, one of the greatest and richest cities in the world, in the dust; and that by so sudden and irresistible, so dismal and amazing a devastation, as in all the circumstances of it is scarce to be parallel'd in any history.
Tillotson. Sermon 9.

The thirty years' war that devasted Germany, did not begin till the eighteenth year of the seventeenth century, but the seeds of it were sowing some time before.
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. iii. p. 462. On the Study of History.

The countries devastated, the cities laid in ruins, and none of the colleges of the learned to be found.
Id. Ib. vol. vi. p. 46. Essay 2. Human Reason.

If the passion of the ministers lie towards peace, our political writers breathe nothing but war and devastation, and represent the pacific conduct of the government as mean and pusillanimous.
Hume. Of the Liberty of the Press, vol. i. ess. 2.

DEVASTAVIT, in Law, a Writ which lies against Executors or Administrators for paying debts upon simple contract, and legacies before debts on specialties, &c.; for in this case they are as liable to action, as if they had squandered away the goods of the deceased, or converted them to their own use; and are compellable to pay such debts by specialty out of their own goods, to the value of what they so paid illegally. (Dyer, 232.) But if an Executor pays debts upon simple contract, before he hath any notice of bonds, it is no Devastavit; and regularly this notice is by an Action commenced against him; for the Law doth not oblige him to take notice of it himself, nor of a judgment against his Testator, because he is not privy to acts done either by or against him.

Executors keeping the goods of the deceased in their hands, and not paying the Testator's debts, or selling them and not paying off debts, or not observing the law which directs them in the management thereof, or doing any thing by negligence or fraud, whereby the estate of the deceased is misemployed, are guilty of a Devastavit or waste, and they shall be charged for so much de bonis propriis, as if for their own debt; but the fraud or negligence of one Executor is not chargeable upon his Co-executor.

DEVE'LOPE, DEVE'LOPEMENT. } A word which Skinner had seen only in the Dictionary. "Fr. developer, developper; to unwrap, unfold, undo, open, shew forth, display, spread abroad." Cotgrave.

Perhaps from devolvere, deorsum volvere, to roll back; and thus, unfold, open, any thing rolled up, a volume. Esolvere, is suggested in Menage. Invelope, from involvere, to roll in.

DE-VELOPE. — DEVIATE.

Then take him to develop if you can
And hew the block off and get out the man.
Pope. The Dunciad, book iv.

To develope the latent excellencies, and draw out the interior principles of our art, requires more skill and practice in writing, than is likely to be possessed by a man perpetually occupied in the use of the pencil and pallet.
Sir Joshua Reynolds. The fifteenth Discourse.

But I must here, once for all, inform you, that all this will be more exactly delineated and explained in a map, now in the hands of the engraver, which, with many other pieces and developements of this work will be added to the end of the twentieth volume.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. xiii.

DEVE'ST, DEVE'STURE. } Devestire; de, and vestire, to clothe. See DIVEST. "Fr. desvester, devestir; to uncloath, despoyle, deprive; disseise, dispossess of." Cotgrave.

And though she were by Powlet her keeper devested of all the badges of dignity and royalty, and made no more account of them the poorest woman of the meanest condition; yet she endured it with great patience of mind.
Camden. Elisabeth, fol. 369. Anno 1586.

(The very disadvantage we have more then pure spirits [have] in the devesture of self-respects) may be converted into a conducement to the value of our purity.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 14. sec. 3.

DEVEX, a. devehere, devexum, to carry down; de, and vehere, to carry. Fr. devexité, Cotgrave interprets Eng. "devexity, a hollowness, bowing, bending, hanging double or downwards." Devexity occurs in Davies's Wit's Pilgrimage.

——— Vpon the westerne lands
(Following the world's devexe) he meant to tread,
To compasse both the poles, and drinke Nile's head,
But Death did mete his course.
May. Lucan, book x.

DE'VIATE, DEVIA'TION, DE'VIOUS, DE'VIOUSLY. } Fr. devier; to mislead or put out of the way. Lat. de, and via, from or out of the way. To go out of the way, to err, to go astray, to wander.

Dame (said I) I dare well saie
Of this auaunt me well I may
That from your schole so deuiaunt
I am, that neuer the more auaunt
Right nought am I through your doctrine.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 138.

I now could wish (but that utinam is too late) that God with his outward goodness towards me had so commixed his inward grace that I had chused the medium path, neither inclining to the right hand, nor deviating to the left.
State Trials. The Trial of the Earl of Strafford.

Now me thinks I am called upon, as one that hath advised a traveller not to loose his way, to give some nearer directions for the finding it, as a further contribution towards the securing his journeyes end, then a simple caution against the danger of deviations.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 8. sec. 1.

We would therefore heartily wish both for prince and people, if either of them should be guilty of any irregular deviations from their own channels, that they who are injured would content themselves with gentle applications, and moderate remedies, lest the last error be worse than the first.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i. Preface, vii.

DEVIATE. DEVIL.

Whose heart is so estranged from reason, so devious from the truth through perverse error, that he may not understand it to be lesse evill to goe to plow, or to digge, to sow, or do other country workes on the solemnities of the saints, then not to honour, but to prophane their solemne festivals with such horrible obscenities?

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act vi. sc. 12.

——— Then easterly
He turns his course, paths devious marching over,
Where regions vast Candauia does discouer.

May. Lucan, book vi.

But where nature any way deviateth from this method, either by denying motion to the eyes, or the head, it is a very wonderful provision she hath made in the case.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. ii.

Like my fellow Miscellanarians, I shall take occasion to vary often from my proposed subject, and make what deviations and excursions I shall think fit, as I proceed in my random essays.

Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, ch. i.

For while o'er devious paths I wildly trod,
Studious to wander from the beaten road,
I lost my dear Creusa, nor can tell
From that sad moment, if by fate she fell.

Pitt. Virgil. Æneid, book ii.

The advocate for the authority of pronunciation found it sometimes deviating so capriciously from the received use of writing, that he was constrained to comply with the rule of his adversaries, lest he should lose the end by the means, and be left alone by following the crowd.

Johnson. The Plan of an English Dictionary.

The captain's solicitude to arrive at Otaheite time enough to observe the transit of Venus, put it out of his power to deviate from his direct track, in search of unknown lands that might lie to the south-east of that island.

Cook. Voyage. Introduction to vol. v.

They [rules] bring into view the chief beauties that ought to be studied, and the principal faults that ought to be avoided; and thereby tend to enlighten taste, and to lead genius from unnatural deviations, into its proper channel.

Blair. Lectures, vol. i. Introduction, lect. 1.

These are the materials on which Genius is to work, and without this the strongest intellect may be fruitlessly or deviously employed. Sir Joshua Reynolds. Discourse 1.

In the Law of Marine Insurance DEVIATION is an unnecessary departure from the usual course of the voyage insured; necessary causes of departure from the customary line, are, stress of weather, want of repair, joining convoy, danger from an enemy, mutiny, &c.; and even in these cases the shortest and easiest possible courses must be taken, or a new Deviation will be incurred. Deviation, from the moment at which it commences, discharges the insurer from all subsequent responsibility, and entitles him to retain the premium. Marshall's Treatise on the Law of Insurance.

DE'VIL, DE'VILING, n. DE'VILISH, DE'VILISHLY, DE'VILISHNESS, DE'VILISM, DE'VILIZE, DE'VILRY, DE'VIL-SHIP, DE'VIL-GOD, DE'VIL-IDOL, DE'VIL-MONK, DE'VIL-PORTER, DE'VILISH-HOLY.

Devil, frequently by our old authors written Divell. Fr. Diable; Sp. Diablo; It. Diavolo; Lat. Diabolus; Gr. Διάβολος, a traducer, a calumniator. Introduced into the northern as well as southern languages. Goth. Diabulus; A. S. Deoful; Dutch, Dieffle; Ger. Duyvel; Sw. Diefwul. The Gr. Διάβολος, from διαβάλλ-ειν, trajicere; and met. traducere, to traduce, to calumniate. And thus the Devil is appropriately and emphatically, the Father of lies. See the Example from Wiclif.

He sywep purlyche God þat zef ys own lyf here,
To sauy vs synneuol men fram þe Deuil's poer.

R. Gloucester, p. 173.

And after sewed an helle brethe as hit seemed, and darkenesse so that the monckes toke holy water, and drof away the mayer deuelnesse. R. Gloucester, p. 415. n.

May no deþ þis lord dere. ne no Deoveles queyntise.

Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 355.

Ye ben of the fadir the Deuel, and ye wolen do the desiris of your fadir; he was a mansleer frō the begynning, and he stood not in the treuthe, for the treuthe is not in him. Whanne he spekith lesyng, he spekith of his owne: for he is a liere and fadir of it. Wiclif. John, ch. viii.

Ye are of youre father the Deuyll, and the lustes of your father ye wyl do. He was a murtherer from the beginnynge, and abode not in the trueth, because there is no trueth in him. When he speaketh a lye, thē speaketh he of his owne. For he is a lyar, and the father therof. Bible. Anno 1551. John, ch. viii.

Yet women woll her bodies sell
Soch soules goeth to the Deuill of helle.

Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 143.

——— For if ye wist
How dangerous it were to stande in his lyght
Ye would not deale wyth him [Enuious rancour] though that ye might
For by his deuillishe drift and graceles provision
An holle realme he is able to set at dyuision.

Skelton. The Crowne of Laurell, p. 243.

So that if we sinne not deuilishly against the Holy Ghost, refusing the doctrine which we cannot improue that it should not be true; but after the frailtie of man, there is no cause to dispair. Tindall. Workes, fol. 393. An Exposition vpon the first Epistle of St. John, ch. ii.

And thys was to terryfy, captiue, and snare the wretched consciences of mē even to vtter desperatyon. And wher coulde hase bene sought oute a practyse of more dyuelyshnesse.

Bale. English Votaryes, part i. p. 47.

Now touching y^e^ second point, where he calleth the Catholike church the Antichristian synagogue, and the vnwrytten verities starke lyes and deuilry: he hath already shewed & declared partly which thinges they be y^t^ himself meneth by that name.

Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1129. Answere to the Poysned Booke, &c.

——— Engender young deuilings.

Beaumont and Fletcher. Knights of Malta, act v. sc. 2.

For he that hath the Devill to his father must neede haue devillish children. Latimer. Sermons, p. 9.

This Garnet, together with Catesby and Tesmond, had speech and conference together of these treasons, and concluded most traitorously and devilishly.

State Trials. Trial of Henry Garnet.

We are sure that all those that go about to breake peace between realmes, and to bring them to warre are the children of the Deuill, what holy names soeuer they pretend to cloke their pestilent malice withall: which cloking vnder hypocrisie is double deuilishnes.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 970. Tonstal's Sermon against the Pope.

Unjust favours are no less injurious than derogations; he that should deify a saint, should wrong him as much, as he that should devilize him. Bishop Hall. Remains, p. 13.

It is all one as if they had said; Baudry, heathenry, paganisme, scurrilitie and divelry it selfe is equall with God's word; or that Sathan is equipolent with the Lord.

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, act viii. sc. 6.

When as there was a great plague in Rome, which could not be aswaged by any diuine or humane helpes, the Romans to appease the wrath of their enraged deuill-gods, sent into Tuscanie for stage players. Id. Ib. part i. act i. sc. 2.

And aboue all things, my bretheren, sweare not; no, not by the name of God, unlesse we are lawfully called to it; much lesse, by the names of pagan Deuill-idoles.

Id. Ib. part i. act iii. sc. 3.

HEL. You doe aduance your cunning more and more,
When truth kills truth, O diuelish-holy fray!

Shakspeare. Midsummer Night's Dreame, fol. 154.

At which appear'd against him, his surueyor
Sir Gilbert Pecke his chancellour, and John Car,
Confessor to him, with that Diuell-monke,
Hopkins, that made this mischief.
Shakspeare. Henry VIII. fol. 212.

Ile Deuill-porter it no further.
Id. Macbeth, fol. 137.

They are to try the Devil by holy water, incence, sulphur, rue, which from thence, as we suppose, came to be called Herb of Grace, and especially St. John's wort, which therefore they call Devil's-flight.
Taylor. Polemical Discourses, fol. 334. A Dissuasive from Popery.

I answer; that though the Devils believed, yet they could not be saved by the covenant of grace; because they performed not the other condition required in it altogether as necessary to be performed as this of believing, and that is, repentance.
Locke. Works, vol. ii. fol. 516. The Reasonableness of Christianity.

San. The rogue's malicious, and wou'd have me marry her in spight, besides he's off and on at so devilish a rate, a man knows not where to have him.
Dryden. Love Triumphant, act iv. sc. 1.

Hor. I beg your pardon, ladies, I was deceiv'd in you devilishly; but why, that mighty pretence to honour?
Wycherly. The Country Wife.

His works are these: "Dæmonium meridianum. Satan at noon, or Anti-christian blasphemies, antiscriptural divilisms, &c. evidenced in the light of truth, and punished by the hand of justice." Wood. Athenæ Oxonienses, vol. ii. fol. 578.

——————— I think one sneezes.
Bell. One of the Devils, I warrant you, has got a cold with being so long out of the fire.
Alon. Bless his Devilship, as I may say.
Dryden. An Evening's Love.

They believe that the Devil whom they call Satan, is the cause of all sickness and adversity, and for this reason, when they are sick or in distress, they consecrate meat, money and other things to him as a propitiation.
Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. book iii. ch. ix.

It is observable, that Herodotus, in particular, scruples not, in many passages, to ascribe envy to the Gods; a sentiment, of all others, the most suitable to a mean and devilish nature.
Hume. Essays, vol. ii. p. 441. The Natural History of Religion.

Doubtless the very Devils themselves, notwithstanding all the devilishness of their temper, would wish for a holy heart, if by that means they could get out of hell.
Edwards, (Jon.) On Freedom of Will, part iii. sec. 5.

The restlessness of imagination has never been satisfied with the very limited and confessedly dark intimations which Scripture affords of the modes of existence and agency of the Devil. Little more is to be deduced from Revelation, than that a certain number of wicked Angels, who were expelled from Heaven for disobedience to the Almighty, are permitted, until the day of their final sentence, to operate in some manner, of which we are uninformed, upon the human mind, as tempters to evil. Of their method of action we know nothing; but with the extent of their power we are, to our consolation, more completely acquainted. The Devil may entice, but he never can compel mankind to sin; and, as far as he is concerned, we are in all respects free agents. No text can be expressed more strongly than that of St. James to this purpose, Resist the Devil and he will flee from you. iv. 7.

The various opinions which Divines have held respecting these ill Angels, will find a more fitting place for discussion in other portions of our Work; so also the paper in which we shall hereafter consider the particulars of that intercourse, which it has been supposed possible for mankind to establish with the infernal world, will necessarily include an investigation of the principal attributes with which superstition, from time to time, has invested these formidable enemies of our race. In the meantime, the reader who wishes for a general knowledge of Diabolism may turn to the volume of a Calabrian Friar, which once was in no small repute, De naturâ Dæmonum, Libri iv.; Jo. Laurentii Ananiæ Tabernatis, Theologi. 1581. We have not met with any fuller manual relating to Pandæmonium; and there can be little doubt, that those who refer to it will soon possess as intimate and as authentic an acquaintance with the secrets of the nether kingdom, as the Author himself attained, after his very laborious and most satisfactory inquiries.

DEVI'RGINATE, DEVIRGINA'TION. } Low Lat. devirginare, atum; de, and virgo, virginis, a maid or virgin.

To cause to be no longer a virgin. To deprive or rob of virginity.

By this grave learned father's verdict then it is most evident; that stage-playes devirginate unmarried persons, especially beautifull tender virgins, who resort unto them.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, act vi. sc. 3.

He counterfeited the noise and cries of maidens, when they bee forced and suffer devirgination.
Holland. Suetonius, fol. 192.

DEVISE.

DEVI'SE, v. DEVI'SE, or DEVI'CE, n. DEVI'SER, DEVI'SEFULLY, DEVI'SING, n. DEVI'SOUR. } Fr. deviser, to invent. Skinner says Divisare, sc. visum, i. e. oculos circumferre; to throw or cast around the sight, i. e. the eyes. Hickes, Gram. Fran. Theo., p. 92, and Waehter, (v. Weissen,) think that Advise, is from the A. S. wiss-ian; Gr. weiss-en, to show, teach, instruct, direct; Old English, to wisse, to wist; of the same opinion is Junius; and he refers Devise, excogitare, comminisci, to the same origin; and indeed in our older Writers there is very little difference in the usage.

To invent, to contrive, to plan, to scheme, to lay or form plans, schemes or intentions; to imagine.

Whan he sauh he ne myght passe on non wise,
In þre parties to fight his oste he did deuise.
R. Brunne, p. 187.

Saith R. "þou salle haue at þin owen deuys þi life I salle þe saue." Isaac he did vprise.
Id. p. 167.

In alle kynne craftes. þat he couthe devjse.
Piers Ploukman. Vision.

All these things well auised
As I haue you er this deuised.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, p. 118.

For certes at my deuise
There is no place in Paradise,
So good in for to dwell or be
As in that gardin thought me.
Id. Ib. fol. 119.

DEVISE.

This cowe to stele he [Mercurie] cane disguised,
And had a pipe well deuised
Upon the notes of musike,
Whereof he might his eres like.
Gower. Conf. Am. book iv. fol. 82.

As thou shalt here my deuise
Thou might thy selfe better auise.
Id. Ib. book iii. fol. 47.

And ouer that was saide them eke,
That whan men wolde vertue seke,
Men shulde it in the prestes fynde,
Their order is of so high a kynde
That thei be diuisers of the weie.
Id. Ib. book i. fol. 14.

Whereby it appeareth wel that al their deuises of an vnknowen church, is but a very fantastical imaginacion.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 817. The second Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall, book ix.

Wo be vnto you that make vnryghteous lawes, and deuyse thinges whiche be to harde to kepe.
Bible, Anno 1551. Isay, ch. x.

And in lyke maner, Kyng Dāpeter dyde to hym vpon certayne cōposicyons that were ther ordeyned, of the whiche the Prince of Wales was a mean bytwene them, and chefe deuyseur thereof.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. ch. 231.

But Godde hath not without our frute left such thinges vnknowen vnto vs, to quicken and exercise as Saint Austin saith, some mennes myndes in the study and deuising therevpon.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 497. The first Part of the Confutacion of Tyndall.

Pompey had shewed him all the stratagems and policies of war possible for a good captain to deuice.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 493. Sertorius.

He then deuide himselfe how to disguise;
For by his mighty science he could take
As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,
As euer Proteus to himselfe could make.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 2.

After he had studied awhile about the performance of his deuise, and had set downe suche orders as he himselfe inuented concerning the same, he proclaimed a roiall feast to be holden at Windsore, whither all his nobilitie resorted with their ladies.
Holinshed. Description of Ireland, ch. v.

Who sate on high that she might all men see,
And might of all men royally be seen,
Vpon a throne of gold full bright and sheen
Adorned all with gemmes of endless price,
As either might for wealth haue gotten beene,
Or could be fram'd by workman's rare deuice.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book v. can. 9.

Some clarks doe doubt in their deuiceful art
Whether this heauenly thing, whereof I treat,
To weeten mercy, be of iustice part,
Or drawne forth from her by diuine extreat.
Id. Ib. book v. can. 10.

——— Vnder which was spred
A carpet, rich, and of deuicefull thred.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, book i. fol. 6.

I had not taught thee then the alphabet
Of flowers, how they deuisefully being set
And bound up, might with speechless secresy
Deliver errands mutely and mutually.
Donne. Elegy 7.

Now this was much misliked of the people, that a law enacted, and that had been of such force, should by the self same maker and deuiser of the same be again revoked and called in.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 148. Pericles.

I thought, deuis'd, and Pallas heard my prayer,
Revenge, and doubt, and caution work'd my breast;
But this of many counsels seem'd the best.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book ix.

It was not consistent with these designs nor with the arts used to promote them, to let the Scriptures be much known: therefore legends and strange stories of visions, with other devices, were thought more proper for keeping up their credit, and carrying on their ends.
Burnet. History of the Reformation. Anno 1536.

May, perhaps, if one should demand, why some of those operations should be used at all, the deuisers of those unskilful processes would possibly as soon be able to finish their operations, as to give a satisfactory answer.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 134. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5.

Of all the spectacles to mend the sight
Devis'd by art for viewing objects right,
Those are most useful, which the prudent place
High on the handle of the human face.
Fawkes. A Pair of Spectacles.

It was every where adorned with angels supporting the arms of Richard the Second, or those of Edward the Confessor; as is the stone moulding that runs round the hall, with the hart couchant under a tree, and other devices of Richard II.
Pennant. London, p. 116.

The Art of making Devises was profoundly studied by the learned Italians of the XVIth century, and was esteemed by many leading Members of their fanciful Academies among the choicest pursuits of human intellect. Paulus Jovius found time to cultivate this Art amid his other various labours in Medicine, Theology, and History; and he has left the earliest Treatise which was published upon the subject, Ragionamento sopra i motti e disegni d'armi e d'Amore chi commenerò chiamano Imprese. Jovius died in 1552, and his Treatise appears soon to have acquired favour in England, since but little more than thirty years after his death we find it translated under the Title of The worthy Tract of Paulus Jovius, conteyning a Discourse of rare Inventions, both militarie and amorous, called Imprese; whereunto is added a Preface, conteyning the Arte of composing them, with many other notable Devises, by Samuell Daniell, late Student at Oxenforde, 1585.

The following are the rules which Jovius established. After premising that a perfect Devise should consist of a Motto, which he terms its Soul, and a Figure, which he considers its Body, he thus proceeds: I. It should contain a just proportion or relation of the Soul to the Body. II. It should not be so obscure as to need a Sibyl to interpret it, nor yet so plain as the common people may comprehend it. III. It should by all means have a sweet appearance, which shall succeed by inserting therein either Stars, Sun, Moon, Fire, Water, Green Trees, Mechanical Instruments, Diversified and fantastical Beasts and Birds; howbeit that coloured figures are not receivable in the Bodies of Devises. IV. It must not have any human figures. V. The Motto must be in a strange language, or other than that which is used in the Country wherein the Devise is made, to the end that the intention of it may be a little removed from common capacities. Besides these leading principles, there are five conditions more recounted by Jovius: I. That the Motto be concise or brief, but not doubtful; insomuch that the Soul shall be the more perfect when it exceeds not the number of two or three words, unless it be of an hemistich, or a whole verse. II. That the Body and Soul (being very complete) do not produce too ambitious a conceit, lest he for whom it is made be accused of vanity and presumption. III. That it relish somewhat of magnanimity, generosity, and sublimity. IV. That it satisfy the eye by the Body, and yield content to the mind by the Soul. V. That those Devises which have only one word or syllable are very absurd. Notwithstanding this display of science, Jovius confesses that he himself never made any Devise with which he was entirely satisfied.

These Canons, however, have formed the base on which, with certain modifications, most subsequent writers on Devises have raised their structure. Scipione Ammirato, who not long after directed his attention to the subject, and who probably submitted it largely to the discussion of the Transformati, an Academy which he employed much time and trouble to incorporate in his native town of Lecce, between 1556 and 1560, has left behind him a Dialogue, Il Rota o vero delle Imprese. In this, he aptly terms his Art The Philosophy of Cavaliers. He holds that it is best to consider the Motto as the Major proposition of a syllogism, and the Figure as the Minor; from the conjunction of which, the meaning of the Author results as the Conclusion; so that the Motto is the interpreter of the Body, not that the interpreter of the Soul; only it is necessary that from the conjunction of the Soul with the Body the reader may draw the mystical sense. He admits no prodigious things nor unknown beasts in his Figures; nor things too vile and abject, as Kettles, Frying-pans, Dripping-pans, Chafing-dishes, and Bellows. He considers that the conjunction and copulation of the Body and Soul is very handsome, when it is made by comparison either of its like, greater, lesser, or contrary; and that the encounter of words alike in termination or sound, and unlike in signification, is commendable. When a Motto is used without a Figure, he will not permit it to be called a Soul, but a facetious conceit, a witty saying, a proverb, or a sentence; so a Figure without a Motto is not a Body but a Picture, a Phansie, or such like thing. Finally, the Bodies which are taken from Art are not always so beautiful, nor in every part so intelligible, as those which are borrowed from Nature.

It is not easy to arrange the cloud of writers on this Art chronologically, and we must content ourselves with mentioning some few more names as they happen to occur to us. In 1574 we meet with Ragionamento de Luca Contile sopra la proprietà delle Imprese. This writer, like Ammirato, banishes all monstrous and disagreeable objects; and specifies, among such as he esteems in especial abhorrence, Pigs, Wolves, Foxes, Vipers, Moles, Basilisks, and Dragons. His definition of a Devise requires profound meditation. It is, he says, a thing compounded of Figures and Words which discover some gallant and heroic design; and in order to explain himself more fully, he adds, that "the terms of composition holds the place of a Genus and Predicament in this definition." Respecting languages to be employed, he recommends Spanish for love matters, Tuscan for pleasantry and conceit, German for heroic and grave thoughts, Greek for fictions, and Latin for all, especially serious and majestical. From the Dialogo delle Imprese of Simeone; the Trattato di M. Francesco Caburacci da Immola, dove si dimostra il vero e novo modo di fare le Imprese, 1580; and I discorsi de M. Andrea Palazzi, recitati nell' Academia d'Urbino, 1575, little of moment is to be culled, save that the latter, oddly enough for an Academician, who it would be supposed was thoroughly versed in these mysteries, confounds a Devise with a Livery.

Tipotius, a name which we find cited on these matters, but with whose works we are unacquainted, calls the Art of Devises Hagiographie; deeming it sacred, because it was, as he believed, the invention of the Egyptians, and also because it is formed after the manner of mysteries, concealing more than it discovers. Ruscelli, who annexed a discourse to the Ragionamento of Jovius, and likewise published in 1584 a collection of Devises of Illustrious Italians, Le Imprese Illustri, assures us that it belongeth only to the most excellent wits and best refined judgments to undertake this study. In opposition to Jovius, and others of his predecessors, he denies that the Motto can be considered the Soul of a Devise; for if it be so, he argues then must there be as many Bodies without Souls, as there are Devises without Mottos. A Devise, he says, should be composed with conveniency, quaintness, security, and to the glory of its author; it must have clearness and brevity, so that the Body must not have more than two parts, nor the Words be more than three, unless they make half or a whole verse. Nevertheless this limit of numbers applies to species, not to individuals; so that if it be necessary to introduce the firmament, countless stars may be scattered over it. Things hard to be distinguished from each other are not to be used, as Parsley and Hemlock, a Linnet and a Sparrow. Again, he contradicts Jovius respecting the nonadmission of the human figure; he shows that the Historian himself has violated this precept in some Devises of his own invention; and he especially approves of the introduction of women, whether they be naked or clothed; as also of Nymphs, Satyrs, Terms, and such like Divinities which are not usually in our sight. He draws a sound distinction between an Emblem and a Devise: the first is of general application, and may teach some abstract moral truth; the last is appropriate to the individual only who bears it, and betokens something peculiar to himself. Yet he adds, (and perhaps with some consciousness that he needed the permission, for the Authors in this Art appear to have enjoyed a large community of goods,) that there is neither vice nor theft in appropriating to oneself the Devise of one already dead, so that something be added or changed in it. In Emblems, moreover, there may be many Figures; whereas Devises should be regularly confined to three. The Motto if disunited from the Figure ought not to have any meaning, and it is always best if it do not contain a Verb expressed.

The collection of Imprese by Bargagli, who writes himself Gentilhuomo Senese, is the last of the Italian School which we shall mention. His definition is the fullest with which we have met. A Devise, he says, is no other thing but a particular and rare conceit of wit, which is made by means of a similitude or comparison, having for that purpose the figure of something either natural (so it be not human) or artificial; accompanied, of necessity, with acute, subtle, and concise words. No Professor of the Art has exceeded this writer in the enthusiasm of his praises. It is, he asserts, the most compendious, most noble, most pleasing, and most efficacious way of expressing oneself of all that human wit can invent. It enlightens our whole understanding, and, by dispelling the darkness of error, fills it with true piety and solid virtue. In a short tract of time, and with much ease, it imprints in our minds all the rules both of Moral and Civil life. To the contentment of the sight it adds a ravishing of the mind, and that to the satisfaction both DEVISE. of the one and of the other. It much excelleth Poetry, in that it joyneth profit with pleasure; begetting content by its gentilesse, and yielding profit by its doctrine. The Art is, in truth, one of the most difficult that any wit that is acute, and rich in invention, can practise.

Bargagli would fain divest his favourite study of much of the mystery in which others appear solicitous to involve it. He wishes that Devises should be understood without difficulty and with delight, not only by the learned, but also by all those who (besides a good common understanding) have knowledge of things natural and artificial, and of the languages which are used in the Motto; and these he wishes never to be Persian, Turkish, Moldavian, or Polonian. It importeth not much, however, if ideots or gross ignoramuses do not at all conceive the meaning of Devises, since such dainties are not intended for vulgar appetites.

Henri Estienne. None of the works however which we have hitherto mentioned can compete, either in copiousness or clearness, with a French Treatise by Henri Estienne, (better known as Stephens,) Lord of Fossez. This Art of Making Devises, &c. was translated into English by Thomas Blount, of the Inner Temple, Gentleman, in 1646. Henri Estienne had been originally instructed by his uncle Robert, and was so enamoured of the pursuit, that, knowing its excellency and subtilty, after twenty-eight years study of it, he could never allow even the exercise of arms to divert him from so noble an employment. By Devises, he says, the most pregnant wits discover to their like all the motions of their soul; their hopes, joys, fears, doubts, disdains, affrights, anger, pleasures and joys, anguishes and sorrows, hatred and love, desires and other heart-possessing passions. He assures us, that those whose scrutiny soars highest trace the Art to the Creator himself, who planted the Tree of Life as a Figure in the Garden of Eden, and added the Motto Ne comedas; and who afterwards framed Figures in the Tabernacle and the Ark of Covenant, in the Altar of Cedar, which knew no corruption, and in the Pomegranates on the borders of the Sacerdotal robe, which implied concord and union. Thus deeply impressed with the excellence of the Art, he commences a Discourse, in which he treats of Hieroglyphics, Symbols and Reverses of Medals, Ænigmas, Emblems, Gryphes and Parables, Arms, Cimiers,* Blasons, Cyphers, and Rebuses, which the unknowing confound with Devises; and he opens their definite Etymology, Origin, Antiquity, Utility, and final end, all summarily.

His rules, in some respects, are different from those which have been laid down before him. He vehemently objects to the usage of the human figure; nevertheless, he treats as an unnecessary refinement the exclusion of separate parts of the human body, in favour of the rejection of which some had argued; for how can we represent a hammer striking upon an anvil (which is an unexceptionable Devise) unless a hand be bestowed upon it? and to what difficulties shall we not be reduced in depicting the winds, unless we add a head to them? We dare not point out the substitute which, as Estienne continues to relate, was proposed in this last case to "a learned Doctor," who "was answered smilynglye in a merry and jovial humour" by the cunning artificer whom he employed. DEVI

Estienne's chief precepts are the following: Do not mix things natural with things artificial in the same Devise; nor divers natural accumulated on one another; nor divers artificial which have no relation. Thus, a Tortoise with wings, and the Motto Amor addidit, is manifestly forced. So also is that which, according to Paulus Jovius, was the Devise of Vespasian, and afterwards was used by the Aldi, an Anchor and a Dolphin, with Festina lentè. Do not destroy essential properties by wresting them to your purpose, as in a Bat looking at the Sun, ad insueta fevr. Observe decency and civility. Do not use such things as neither Draught, nor Sculpture, nor Painting can represent. In Mottos, avoid decyphering and demonstrating terms, as hic, hinc, hoc pacto, qui, quæ, hoc, sic. Do not be metaphorical. Use not synonymes, connotatives, epithets, and other adjuncts. Admit not two verbs to discover the same conception, unless (as in the formula of the mock oath which used to be administered at Highgate) one be not enough. Fly from Abstracts and Absolutes. Employ Prosopopœia to all kinds of Beasts and Mechanical Instruments. Let not the comparison derived from the quality of the Figure be expressed in the Motto. The Motto is better couched in the first or third person, than in the second; if it can be thrown into both these it is far best. The Indicative Mood is most proper; the Imperative is sometimes used, to good purpose; but the Optative, Subjunctive, and Infinitive have neither certainty nor constancy enough to express our opinions. Interrogatives are better than Affirmatives. Two Adverbs, but no more, may have place. Negatives are most becoming; and, lastly, the whole Motto should be brief, subtle, and energetical, giving a smart pleasing touch to the understanding, not long, languishing, drayling, and vulgar.

Estienne, like Bargagli, approves the free use of Rhetorical Figures in Mottos; as of those words which counterpoise one another, which fall in like cadences, which end in a like termination, and which carry a like tone, though they have a different signification. The Treatises which he recommends, as proper to suggest Devises, are those which discourse on the nature and propriety of Animals, Plants, Minerals, Precious Stones, Parts of the Heaven and Earth, Liberal Sciences, Mechanical Arts, and other subjects, as well natural as artificial. In arranging Devises, he permits the use of appropriate Garlands and Coronets, Chaplets and Bordures; and after a very goodly caution, that calumnious Devises and Devises of detraction are never allowable, he adds some advice relative to the places in which they may most fittingly be displayed. Thus Devises, he says, are very seemly in Ladies' Pictures; for as that table represents the exterior part of the body, or the features of the face, even so the Devise represents the inclinations of the person, and virtues of the Lady. And as the instruments proper to every profession are the places befitting a Devise, as their Swords, Pistols, and Headpieces for men of war, so the most proper place for a Lady's Devise is her Looking-glass; for it is no less necessary for a Lady to contemplate her interior, and to examine the motions of her soul, than to consider her visage, and preserve it immaculate; since by the mirror she sees only the exterior quality of her face, whereas by the Devise

* "Cimiers derive their name from nothing else than from the name of the place where they are set, that is, upon the Cimier or summit of the tymbre of the helmet." Estienne, ch. xxiii.

DEVISE. DEVIZES.

she discovers the inclination of her mind, and excites herself more often to the exercise of virtue, or to the execution of some noble design, whereof the Devise renews the memory as often as she beholds it. Ladies may also place their Devises on their Coaches, Cabinets, Beds, Hangings, Cushnets, Carcanets, and on other parts of their ornaments and apparel.

From Blount's Preface to this Tract by Estienne, and from a Chapter on Impreses in Camden's Remains concerning Britain, may be gathered many Devises connected with English History. King Stephen bore the sign Sagittarius, under which he obtained the Crown. Henry II. painted in his great chamber, at Winchester, an Eagle with four young chickens; three of these (under which the unhappy Monarch designed to represent his three eldest sons) were pecking and scratching at him; the fourth, (John,) as the most ferocious, was picking out his eyes. Henry III., "as liking well of remuneration," set up this Motto in his chamber at Woodstock, Qui non dat quod amat, non accipit ille quod optat.

His second son, Edmund Crouchback, first Earl of Lancaster, assumed the well-known Red Rose. Edward III. bore the Rays of the Sun shining from a Cloud. Edmund de Langley, Duke of York, his fourth Son, a Falcon with a Fetterlock, signifying that he could have no hopes of the Crown. When this Devise was afterwards adopted by Richard, Duke of York, (one of the Princes murdered in the Tower,) Edward IV., his father, commanded him to unloose the fetterlock. Richard II. bore a White Hart couchant, with a chain about the neck; also a Peascod Branch open, with the peas falling out. Henry IV., a Foxtail dependent. Henry V., a Burning Cresset, with the Motto Une sans plus, (not appropriate thereto, as the commentators remark.) Henry VI., two Feathers in saltire. Edward IV. after the Battle of Mortimer's Cross, three Suns conjoined in one, as they were said to be seen during the engagement. Richard III., a White Boar. Henry VII., a Red and White Rose conjoined, sometimes in the Sun; a Portcullis, as of the House of Somerset; or a Hawthorn Bush, with the Crown in it as it was found on Bosworth Field. Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, the Mother of this Prince, three White Daisies growing upon a Turf. Henry VIII., in whose time Devises began to be more cultivated, in his interview with Frances I. at the Field of Cloth of Gold, bore an English Archer drawing his arrow to the head, with Cui adhæreo præest. The Devise of the French King, invented by himself, does not appear to have been so pregnant with meaning: it was a Salamander in the flames, Nutrisco et extinguo. Ann Boleyn, a white crowned Falcon, holding a sceptre in her right hand, and standing upon a golden trunk, out of which sprang red and white Roses, with Mihi et meæ. Mary bore Time drawing Truth out of a well, with Veritas Temporis filia. Elizabeth, so many, says Camden, as would require a volume; among them a Sieve, without a Motto. Video, Taceo. and Semper eadem. without Figures. James I., the Thistle and Rose surmounted by a Crown, with Henricus Rosas, Regna Jacobus. His son, Prince Henry, Fas est aliorum quærere regna. Charles I., Christo auspice regno; and, lastly, during the Great Rebellion, one of the Parliamentarians, an Armed Man presenting a sword at a Bishop's breast, with a label from his mouth, Visne Episcopari; to which the Bishop replies, Nolo! nolo! nolo! Another Roundhead took an Armed Man, hewing off the corners of an University Cap, with Muto quadrata rotundis.

One Devise assumed by a Duke of Milan has given him a name by which he is distinguished in History, and which is often ascribed to a wrong cause. Ludovico Sforza, the More, (or l'Ethiopien, the Moor, as Moreri, with others, has been misled into calling him,) when he fancied himself possessed of the balance of power in Italy, assumed a Mulberry Tree, (Moro,) which Pliny, (xvi. 1,) terms Sapientissima arborum, because it never blows till the frosts are ended. Ludovico Sforza.

DEVI'SE, or DEVI'ZE, DEVI'ZEE, DEVI'ZOR, DEVI'ZABLE. Fr. diviser; Lat. dividere, isum; to part or divide; and thus applied to the partition of property, which a testator appoints by his will or testament; and also to the testament itself. Spelman. The application of the word is quite technical.

DEVISE, in Common Law, was formerly used, in a confined sense, for a Bequest of land; but it is now, used generally, for the Gift of any legacies whatever.

DEVIZES, or THE VIES, a Borough in Wiltshire, on the Kennet and Avon Canal, concerning the antiquity of which many conjectures have been hazarded, but which, as it is not mentioned in Domesday Book, is more reasonably believed not to claim any origin antecedent to the Conquest. Stukely, in his Itinerarium Curiosum, p. 136, considers Devizes to have been a Roman Town, the Punctuobice of Ravennas; and on this supposition, he gives an etymology of its modern name, not perhaps deduced in his happiest moments. "I suppose here is a remnant of the former part of the word Punctuobice in Poulsholt, a little village hard by, Pottern another, Pottern Wood, and the name of the Hundred Pottern, taken in the first times of their divisions from such a corrupt appellation of this place. The last syllable bice subsists in the present name Devizes, vulgarly called Vies." Others again have traced it to divisio, from a division of lands between King Stephen and Roger Bishop of Salisbury. It was in the reign of Henry I. that this Prelate built a Castle in this Town, which is described by ancient writers as having been a most splendid edifice, and the strongest fortress in Europe, (Hen. Huntingdon, 389; Will. Malm. 181;) but as early as the time of Leland it had fallen to decay. (Itinerary, vii. 80.) This decay, however, either was only partial, or the fortress must afterwards have been restored; for, in 1643, it stood a bombardment of many hours from the Parliamentary forces under Cromwell, and did not capitulate without very favourable and honourable terms. A copy of a Letter announcing the transaction, read before the House of Commons, and printed by its order, may be found in the British Museum. Devizes

DEVIZES. returned two Members to Parliament, as early as the reign of Edward I. The Town is irregularly built on elevated ground. The Church of St. John is a magnificent specimen of more than one age of the Gothic style. That of St. Mary is partly early Norman, and partly rebuilt in 1436. Devizes is called by Fuller, in his Worthies of England, "the best and biggest Town for trading in its shire." At present it only manufactures woollens. Population in 1821, 4208; eighty-nine miles west by south from London. Roundaway Hill, about three miles north-east from the Town, was the scene of the total rout of the Parliamentary forces under Sir William Waller in 1644, by the Cavaliers under Prince Maurice and the Marquis of Hertford. (Clarendon, History of the Rebellion, book vii.)

DEVOCATION, devocare, to call away; de, and voca're, to call.

A calling away, inviting away.

He that makes it his business to be freed and released from all its [sorcery's] blandishments and flattering devocations, and endeavours wholly to withdraw himself from the love of corporiety, and too near a sympathy with the frail flesh; he by it enkindles such a divine principle, as lifts him up above the fate of this inferiour world, and aderns his mind with such an awfull majesty as beats back all enchantments.

Hallywell. Melampr. p. 97,

DEVO'ID, v. } It. voto; formed from vacuus;
DEVO'ID, adj. } thus, according to Menage, Vacuus, vacus, vocus, votus, votare. Gall. vuide, vuiden. Wachter thinks that the Fr. is formed from Ger. ode, (Goth. authid) desolate, from odan, ver-oden, to desolate. See AVOID.

To render destitute or desolate; to deprive of; to be, or cause to be, vacant or free from.

Yet I him require as rightful iuge
To deuoid fro me the inward sorow
Least I liue not to the next morow.
Chaucer. The Lamentation of Marie Magdaleine, fol. 320.

But knoweth well, that certainly
She was arraied richely,
Deuoid of pride certaine she was.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 133.

How irreligious he hath bene
deuoyde of godly feare.
Drant. Horace. The Arte of Poetry, p. 28.

Why be not damned souls devoyd of sense,
If nothing can from wickednesse reclaime,
Rather then fry in pain and vehemence
Of searching agony?
More. On the Soul, book iii. can. 4. st. 29.

A third is Phantasm, whose actions roll
On meaner thoughts, and things devoid of soul,
Earth, fruits, and flowers, he represents in dreams,
And solid rocks unmov'd and running streams.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book x.

To be entirely devoid of relish for eloquence, poetry, or any of the fine arts, is justly construed to be an unpromising symptom of youth.

Blair. Lecture 1. vol. i. Introduction.

DEVOIR, Junius says, is used by Chaucer for endeavour. "Do thou thy dever at the beste weie." Clerkes Tale, v. 8843.

"Fr. debvoir, or devoir; duty, endeavour; a service, good office, obligation." Cotgrave. From Lat. debere, to be due.

To while þat he was fresch þei fond him falle austere, þei felt of his prouesse, als knyght did his deuere.
R. Brunne, p. 71.

þat dos not his deuere with dedis no with rede
R. Brunne, p. 158.

——— The sonne and þe mone
Don her devor day and nygth.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 220.

Let him with ful intencioun
His deuer done in ech degre,
That his frend ne shamed be.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 141.

Tho were the gates shette, and cried was loude;
Do now your devoir yonge knightes proude.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2600.

RAFE. Madam, if any service or devoir
Of a poor errant knight may right your wrongs
Command it, I am prest to give you succor,
For to that holy end I bear my armour.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Knight of the Burning Pestle, act ii. sc. 1.

You, unenslav'd to Nature's narrow laws,
Warm championess for freedom's sacred cause,
From all the dry devoirs of blood and line,
From ties maternal, moral and divine,
Discharg'd my grasping soul.
Savage. The Bastard.

And what if in order to compass such things, some little devoirs and assiduities are expected? is it not the general practice? And what every body submits to, can it be ignominious.

Hurd. Works, vol. iii. p. 147. On Retirement, dial. 2.

DEVO'LVE, } Lat. devolvere, lutum, to roll
DEVO'LUTE, } down; de, and volvere, to roll. And DEVOLU'TION. } generally,
To drop down, to fall down, to descend.

And thus was the worlde 47 yeres before Crystis birth devolued into the fourth monarchie called the Romane and last empyre.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, ch. ii.

And therfore when the seculare Anticristen kingdoms are begun in the Cristen emprour kings and princes be devolued into the Turkis imperie, the shal that daye begin to springe, when the dead yet a slespe shal awake.

Id. Ib. ch. xii.

Wherfore regarde well my soueraigne Lorde your just and true title to the realme of Fraunce, by Goddes lawe and mannes lawe to you lawfully diuoluted, as very heire to Quene Isabell your greate graundmother.

Hall. Henry V. The second Yere.

And if he either died or resigned, or forfeted the same, for infringing any poynt of this concorde, then the sayed crowne and auctoritie royall, should immediatly bee diuoluted to the Duke of Yorke.

Id. Henry VI. The thirty-eighth Yere.

To whom by a moste iust and ryghte deuolucion, and dyscent of inheritaunce of the croumes of Englande, Fraunce, and Irelande, the tytle also of Defendour of the Feith, dooeth moste nerely, most peculiarely, most specially, and moste directely beelong.

Udall. Preface Unto the King's Maiestie.

When he [Cromwell] had finished his discourse, he deliver'd to them an instrument engrossed in parchment under his hand and seal, whereby, with the advice of his council of officers, he did devolve, and intrust the supreme authority of this Commonwealth into the hands of those persons therein mention'd.

Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. iii. part ii. p. 483.

And last of all by the meanes of the Machabees, the kingdom and gouernment was deuoluted and brought into the priestes handes, who were the kinges and captaines ouer the people.

Fox. Martyrs, fol. 329. Answer of the Prelates, &c.

For then might he as next heyre to his brother, haue lawfully and by iust title claymed the sceptre and diademe royall, which was his fathers, and after diuoluted to his elder brother.

Grafton. Henry VII. The ninth Yere.

Which was augmented by the alteration of the state of the sayd Richard, and the deuolution of the same, to Henry the Fourth.

Id. Henry VIII. The thirty-fourth Yere.

DEVOLVE — DEVONSHIRE.

Which line of Ahiud falling in Joseph, as having no issue, the right of inheritance devolved upon one of the younger line, viz. upon Mary, and consequently upon Jesus her son and legal heir.
South. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 276.

Nay, the King, and also the people in general, might have gained by either a devolution or extinction of some payments, whereof the right discontinued, but an hour, were irrecoverably lost to the city.
State Trials. Charles II., Anno 1682. Proceedings between the King and the City of London. Note.

He hath by reservations, provisions, collations of vacancies apud sedem, resignations, devolutions, and other such tricks extremely encroached on the rights of all, to the infinite vexation, damage and mischief of Christendom.
Barrow. Works, vol. i. part iii. fol. 216. Of the Pope's Supremacy.

The education of youth of both sexes principally devolves upon the women, not only in their infancy, but during that period, in which the constitution both of body and mind, the temper and dispositions of the heart, are in a great measure formed.
Gregory. Comparative View, p. 93.

Wherever there is a house, the stranger finds a welcome, and to the other evils of exterminating tacksmen, may be added the unavoidable cessation of hospitality, or the devolution of too heavy a burden on the ministers.
Johnson. Journey to the Western Islands.

on, ries tent.

DEVONSHIRE, a County in the West of England, bounded by Dorsetshire and Somersetshire on the east, Cornwall on the west, the English Channel on the south, and the Bristol Channel on the north. The British name of this County was Dyvnaint, and that of the inhabitants Dyvnonwyn; and it formed a part of the district called Damnonium. During the Roman period it constituted a part of Britannia Prima; and subsequently it made part of the Kingdom of Wessex. This County is nearly of equal extent from north to south, and east to west, being about seventy miles each way; and the entire circuit nearly 290 miles. Its area, as stated in the record of the last Population Returns, is 2579 square miles, ion. or 1,650,560 English acres. The population in 1821 was 447,900; which had increased in the following ratio, viz.

Year.	Population.	Increase.
In 1700	248,200
1750	272,200	10 per cent.
1801	334,400	30 per cent.
1811	396,100	12 per cent.
1821	447,900	13 per cent.

Of these there were employed,

	Families.
In agriculture	37,037
In trade and manufactures	53,985
In other occupations	19,692

As Devonshire is the largest County but one (Yorkshire) in England, and occupies so extensive a portion of the western promontory, it must necessarily present a great diversity of surface. Much of the land is open and uncultivated, and in some places rises to ins. a considerable elevation. The most elevated summits according to the late trigonometrical survey are,

	Feet.
Bolt Head	1680
Bullenten Hill	1903
Cawsand Beacon	1792
Rappin Tor, Dartmoor	1549

Towards the English Channel there are extensive tracts partially covered with large fragments of rocks, and contributing but little to the support of animal life. On the north and north-west wide tracts of swampy ground and peat bogs are met with. A considerable portion of the County however consists of fine vales, some of them of great fertility. That of Exeter, containing about 200 square miles, is most of it excellent land; and the district called South Hams is so fertile and beautiful, as to be called the Garden of Devonshire. The soil of these vales possesses much variety. A strong red loam is the most common, while in some places this is changed into clay, or is mixed with ironstone, sand, and gravel. Towards the northern coasts a peat soil is often met with. The western part of the County is very uniform, both as it respects the soil and surface. The soil of this part often consists of crumbled slate stone, intermixed with rubble and a portion of loamy mould. In this part the land is chiefly enclosed, and villages and farm-houses are common. North Devon is in many places both beautiful and productive. DEVONSHIRE. Soil.

Devonshire is intersected by numerous rivers and streams; but from its contiguity to the sea, few of them attain much extent before they are lost in that general receptacle. The principal of these are the Exe, the Dart, the Taw, the Torridge, and the Tamar. The Exe is a beautiful river, rising in the elevated regions of Exmoor, in Somersetshire, which after being augmented by several other streams passes Tiverton, Exeter, and Topsham, and falls into the sea at Exmouth. It is navigable for vessels of considerable burden to Topsham, and was so formerly to Exeter. The Dart rises in Dartmoor, and at first flows towards the south, but afterwards bending to the east it follows a winding course past Totness to the English Channel. This river resembles the northern streams in the boldness of its character, more than any of the southern rivers. The Taw and the Torridge open communications between the Bristol Channel to Barnstaple and Biddeford. The Tamar flows down the western side, forming the boundary between Devon and Cornwall, and with the Plym ultimately forms the Hamoaze, or harbour of Plymouth. The salmon fishery of some of these rivers, especially of the Exe and Tamar, is particularly valuable. The streams of Devonshire abound also with a variety of other fish, among which are the trout, plaice, torpedo, and king fish. Many of the Devonshire rivers are navigable for short distances, and some of them are connected by canals. The Grand Western Canal connects the English with the Bristol Channel. It extends through the south-east district of this County, commencing at the mouth of the Exe at Topsham, and entering Somersetshire ends at Taunton. Its waters are supplied by four reservoirs, two in the valley of Culm, and two in that of Tone. The whole length is thirty-five miles. The Tavistock Canal commences at that Town, and extends through a few miles to the river Tamar, with a lateral branch of about two miles in extent. It has a tunnel at Morwelham, which is 460 feet below the surface of the ground. Rivers. Fish. Canals.

Devonshire has long been noted for its mineral production; but the mines are now less worked than formerly. These include gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, iron, manganese, bismuth, cobalt, and antimony. Gold has been found only in very small quantities; and the silver is separated from the lead, one species of the ore being rich in this valuable metal. Tin is supposed to have been worked in this County previous to the arrival of the Romans; but is now nearly aban- Mineral products.

DEVONSHIRE.

doned, in consequence of the superiority of the Cornish mines. Copper, as well as iron and cobalt, is still found in considerable quantities. Limestone of almost every description, marble, and gypsum, abound. The first varies from the nature and appearance of chalk to that of Italian marble; and is also of different colours, both plain and variegated. Fluor spar is produced in great quantities in the mines at Beer-Ferris. Pipe clay, potter's clay, and good slate are likewise obtained in several parts. Quartz, firestone, and granite are met with in several districts; the latter chiefly in Dartmoor, and the ridges that run into Cornwall. Coal of different kinds is found, and that called the Bovey Coal, which we have already described, is peculiar to the County.

Climate.

The climate of Devonshire has long been so noted for its salubrity, as to render it a resort for invalids from most other parts of the Kingdom; especially for those who are afflicted with pulmonary complaints. The situation of the County greatly exposes it to the influence of the south-west wind from the ocean, and the diversity of surface causes the climate to vary considerably in different parts, but in general it is milder than any other County of Great Britain; and even the most elevated tracts are rather subject to moisture than to cold. Near the southern coast, myrtles flourish during the winter without shelter; and such delicate plants as require great care and attention in other Counties, grow without trouble in the mild and genial atmosphere of this.

Agriculture and vegetable products.

Considerable attention has for many years been paid to the encouragement of agriculture in this County; and the state of its cultivation, therefore, surpasses that of several other districts. The vale of Exeter, and the western districts, produce wheat, barley, beans, peas, oats, and flax. Much of the pasture lands are appropriated to the dairy, and large quantities of good butter are made. Turnips, potatoes, and the different species of artificial grasses are objects of attention with the Devonshire farmer. One process now in general use, that of cutting off the turf of land, and when dry laying it in heaps and burning it to ashes, was first invented in this County, from which it has taken its name Denshiring, a corruption of Devonshiring. But in addition to these, the production of cider from the apple-trees planted in the hedge-rows and orchards deserves notice. The quality varies according to the district, but in general the cider of this County is not much esteemed. That made in the vale of Exeter is the best.

Live stock.

The cattle of Devonshire have long been celebrated in most parts of England, both for their beauty and utility. The milk is rich, the butter good, and the average produce of each cow is about a pound a day. The Devonshire cattle are of a deep red colour, with fine bones, a clean neck, a dun-coloured circle about the eyes, and horns turned gently upwards. The hair is fine, and the skin has a silky feel. The meat is fine grained; they feed at an early age, and being very active the oxen are in much repute for labour, both in the team and at plough. They arrive at perfection about the fifth year. The horses are small and hardy; and the breed of sheep is principally the same as that of Dorsetshire, but improved by various crosses.

Manufactures and commerce.

At Exeter and in its vicinity, the manufacture of woollens, serge, and kerseymere, constitute one of the most important branches of industry; and considerable quantities of these are annually exported, chiefly for the Indian market. The cotton manufacture, as well as that of lace, has been introduced, though yet less extensive than the woollen. Shalloons, silk stockings, baize, and waistcoating, are also made in different parts of the County. Much of the trade of Cornwall and Somersetshire centres in Exeter; where their manufactures are principally finished and exported, and much of the raw material of which these articles are composed is received in return.

The Isle of Lundy, situated in the Bristol Channel, forms a part of Devonshire, and is about three miles long from north to south, but little more than one at its greatest breadth. The whole surface is computed at 2000 acres, about a fifth part of which only is cultivated. It is encompassed by rocks, and is accessible only by an entrance on the east, scarcely admitting two persons abreast. It contains the remains of a chapel, and of a castle, called Morisco's Castle, from a pirate of that name, who made it his residence till he was executed temp. Henry III. At present the whole Island is occupied by a single family only.

The following are among the places of chief note in Devonshire, which we have not mentioned separately. Chudleigh, near the river Teign, nine miles south from Exeter, which still contains the ruins of a once magnificent Episcopal Palace. Population in 1821, 2059. The Town gives the title of Baron to the Clifford family, whose seat at Ugbrook, about a mile from it, is among the most beautiful spots in the County. Teignmouth, as its name implies, at the estuary of the river Teign, a Town of remote antiquity; divided into two parts, East and West, by a small rivulet. The trade is considerable, and of late years it has been much frequented as a watering place. Population of both Towns in 1821, 3770. Fifteen miles south from Exeter. Torbay, a commodious Harbour, about twelve miles in extent, sheltered on all sides by rich woods; five miles north-east from Dartmouth, and celebrated as the landing place of William III. The extensive waste of Dartmoor, formerly a forest, extends about twenty miles, between Chegford and Tavistock, comprising not less than 100,000 acres. Its surface is covered in many places by huge masses of granite, called Tors, on one of which, Crockern Tors, situated in a most wild and dreary spot, is still held the session of the Stannary Parliament. Moreton Hampstead, on the borders of Dartmoor, fourteen miles south-west from Exeter, stands on a gentle eminence. Near it are the remains of two Castles, a Druidical Temple, and a Cromlech. Population in 1821, 1932. Chegford, three miles south-west from Moreton Hampstead, near the Teign, contains 1503 inhabitants. Great Torrington, ten miles south-west from Barnstaple, stands on the river Torridge. Up to the time of Henry VI. it returned two Members to Parliament. Population in 1821, 2538. Little Torrington, one mile south from it, 505. Ilfracombe, the most northerly Town in the County, stands ten miles north from Barnstaple. It has a commodious haven, and an extensive trade. It is also a favourite watering place. Population in 1821, 2622. Crediton, pronounced Kirton is seven miles south-east from Exeter, on the streamlet Crede. It was once the See of a Bishop, till Edward the Confessor referred it to Exeter. The Church

ON- is a splendid Gothic structure. The manufacture of
TE. the place is serge, in making which 3166 inhabitants
TE. out of a population of 5515 were employed in 1821.
ary Ottery, St. Mary, is a large irregular Town on the
y. river Otter, eight miles from Honiton. Population in 1821, 3522, chiefly engaged in woollen manufactures.
Church a Vicarage in the patronage of the Crown.
th. Exmouth, as its name implies at the mouth of the river Exe, is now a largely frequented watering place.
Distant eight miles south from Exeter. Population
th. in 1821, 2841. Sidmouth, at the mouth of the Sid, is also a favourite place of resort for bathing. Distant twelve miles south-east from Exeter. Population in ster 1821, 2747. Axeminster, on the river Axe, twenty-six miles south-east from Exeter, is celebrated for its carpet manufactory. A Minster was erected here by Athelstan, after a victory which he gained over the Danes in a neighbouring spot, still called King's-field.
Population in 1821, 2742.

Sir William Pole's Collections towards a History of Devonshire, 1791; The Chorographic Description or Survey of the County of Devon, collected by the Travel of Tristram Risdon, 1714, a portion of which work has been enlarged under the title of a Review of part of Risdon's Survey, &c. 1785; Danmonii Orientalis Illustres, or the Worthies of Devon, by John Price, 1701; Polwhele, History of Devonshire.

DEVO'TE, v.
DEVO'TE, n.
DEVO'TE, adj.
DEVO'TARY,
DEVO'TEDNESS,
DEVOTE'E,
DEVO'TEMENT,
DEVO'TER,
DEVO'TING,
DEVO'TION,
DEVO'TIONAL,
DEVO'TIONALIST,
DEVO'TIONIST,
DEVO'TIOUSNESS,
DEVO'UT, adj.
DEVO'UT, n.
DEVO'UTFUL,
DEVO'UTFULNESS,
DEVO'UTLESSNESS,
DEVO'UTLY,
DEVO'UTNESS.

Fr. devouer; Lat. devovere, otum; de, and vovere, to vow or promise; from the Gr. βεβαιόειν, firmare; or from βοάειν, to call or cry aloud, as properly spoken of those, who promise or pledge any thing to God, with a raised voice. Vossius.

To pledge or promise, dedicate or destine, or addict, yield, consign, or give up to.

A devote or devout man is a man devote, sc. to godliness. Fr. devot; Sp. devoto; It. divoto.

In chyrche he was devout ynow, vor hym ne ssolde non day abide,
Þat he ne hurde masse & matyns, & eueson, & eche tyde.
R. Gloucester, p. 369.

Þe Kyng Steuene azen Þys dede, to holy chyrche drou,
And hys mass hurde vorst, myd deuocyon ynou.
Id. p. 456.

Fiue zere he gaf pardoun, of peyns to be free,
Þat for him with deuociouu said Pater and Aue.
R. Brunne, p. 341.

And ich myself Cyvyle. and Symonye my felawe
Wollen ryden upon rectours. and ryche men devoutours.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 33.

Prelates and preestes prayen. and by seche
Devoutliche day and nygt.
Id. Ib. p. 299.

Habite ne maketh neither monke ne frere,
But cleane life and deuocion
Maketh good men of religion.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 145.

As custome was, the people ferre and nere
Before the noone, vnto the temple went
With sacrifice deuout in their manere.
Chaucer. The Testament of Creseide, fol. 195.

DEVOTE

All this I put in his seruage
As to my lord, and did homage
And ful deuoutly I praid him.
Id. The Dreame, fol. 242.

And thus this double hypocrisie,
With his deuote apparancie
A vyser set upon his face.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 11.

Yet, as she is, I humbly desire you to receiue her with your wonted and accustomed fauour at my handes, who always wil remaine most ready and deuoted to do your honour any poore seruice that I may.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Epistle Dedicatorie.

Pure deuociō and vndefiled before God the father, is this; to visite the fatherlesse and wyddowes in theyr aduersitye, and to kepe hym selfe vnspotted of the worlde.
Bible, Anno 1551. James, ch. i.

And hauing made his vowes vnto S. Mary of Hall in Henault (whom he went to visite for his blinde devotions sake) he returned towards Bruges the 28th of July.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. The Spanish Armada, vol. i. fol. 600.

Wherefore I trust now by God's grace, somethyng more temperately to speake, desiring euery good man of hys charitie to help mee wyth his deuote prayer.
Barnes. Workes, fol. 318. Priests that hath not the gift of chastitie to marry Wives.

I might diuide godlinesse into the hearing of God's worde, into praying deuoutly, and charitable dealing with all the world.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, fol. 112.

The last point of this armour be the darts of devoutlessnes, unmercifulness, and epicurisme; which fly abrode in every place; for few or none there be that serve God devoutly.
Bishop of Chichester's Two Sermons, (1576,) sign c. 6. 6.

You see I have but two, a son and her;
And he is so devoted to his book,
As I must tell you true, I doubt his health.
Should he miscarry, all my hopes rely Upon my girl.
Ford. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, act i. sc. 3.

All his cares, actions, all his thoughts, are subordinate to her will and commandement; her most devote, obsequious, affectionate servant and vassall.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, fol. 519.

Onely (good master) while we do admire
This vertue, and this morall discipline,
Let's be no Stoickes, nor no stockes I pray,
Or so deuote to Aristotle's checkes
As Ouid be an out-cast quite abjur'd.
Shakspeare. Taming of the Shrew, fol. 210.

One professeth himself a devote, or peculiar servant to our Lord.
Sir E. Sandys. State of Religion.

And then afford a liberal allowance to so many several idolatrous priests and devotaries for their several worships.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. part i. fol. 447.

The reason given by divines is, because thou hast devoted it to the Lord, the gift remains holy, and might not return to the world; for though thy person be not accepted, yet thy gift by thy devoting, is holy to the Lord, as were the censers, in the day of Corah. Spelman. Works. Preface, fol. xv.

On top whereof a sacred chappell was,
And eke a little hermitage thereby,
Wherein an aged holy man did lie:
That day and night said his deuotion,
Ne other worldly business did apply.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 10.

There is another devotional passage cited out of Euripides, which contains also a clear acknowledgment of one self-existent being, that comprehends and governs the whole world.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 364.

This point being once admitted, it is but to give a religious turn to this natural softness, and you have the complete image of a French devotionalist.
Coventry. Phil. to Hyd. Conn. 1

DEVOTE. I am not now urging you to that churlish and rigorous way of mortification, consisting only in a froward abstinence from the comforts and conveniences of this life, which some perhaps blind devotionists have too rigidly exercised themselves with.

Hopkins. Works. Sermons, fol. 757.

By which 'tis clear what notion they had of θελοθρησκεια to wit, that of devotiousness, piety.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 234. Of Will-Worship.

'Tis done; his sacred hand he lifted up
And round about on his devoto's dealt
His bouuteous blessing.

Beaumont. Psyche, can. 9. sec. 139.

Many ages after that, in the time of our Saviour lived old Simeon, to the age of ninety years: A devout man and full both of hope, and expectation.

Bacon. Natural History, part iii. Of Life and Death.

For matters of religion, hee shewed himselfe a well deuouted Christian, and in each respect obedient and cheerefull in his prayers. Stow. King James, Anno 1603.

Him Richard follows in the government,
Who much the glory of our arms increas'd,
And all his father's mighty treasure spent,
In that devoutful action of the east.

Daniel. History of Civil Wars, book i.

Whose twilights were more clear than our mid-day,
Who dream'd devoutlier than most use to pray.

Donne. Funeral Elegies.

With flashing flames his ardent eyes were fill'd,
And in his hand a naked sword he held:
He cheer'd the dogs to follow her who fled,
And vow'd revenge on her devoted head.

Dryden. Theodore and Honoria.

At riper years he [Edward Dyer] studied and laboured much in chymistry, was esteemed by some a Rosie-crucian, and a great devotee to Dr. Job Dee and Edward Kelly astrologers and chymists. Wood. Athenæ Oxonienses, vol. i. fol. 322.

The true care of our souls consists in the constant and daily exercise of piety and devotion, both in private, and in public if there be opportunity for it, especially at proper times and upon more solemn occasions. Tillotson. Sermon 34.

The devotional as well as the active part of religion is (we know) founded in good nature; and one of the best signs and causes of good nature is, I am sure, to delight in such pious entertainments. Atterbury. Sermon 9. vol. iv.

He informs us, that the baptized were taught to say it [the Lord's prayer] by heart. And it is plain in many places of his works, that it was repeated once at least in every assembly of the faithful, the devouter sort of which met at all the hours of prayer, thrice a day at least, and so often used the Lord's prayer in publick. Comber. Companion to the Temple, ch. v. sec. 17.

But if so many examples out of all mankind will not suffice to make us praise him devoutly, and acknowledge him faithfully, let us lift up our eyes to the heavens, which are replenished with creatures more noble and glorious than we; yet all these make it their employment, and account it their delight to glorifie his name. Id. Ib. vol. i. part i. sec. 10.

Is it possible for a prince or state, by calling upon or devoting themselves to God, to engage him to take upon himself the absolute, immediate, and as it were personal direction of their particular affairs.

Middleton. Miscel. Tracts, vol. ii. p. 204. Defence of the Letter to Dr. Waterland, &c.

All objects are therefore to be excluded, so far as attachments to them would be inconsistent with devotedness to our Maker.

Secker. Works. Sermon 6. vol. i.

So that it was not merely the conjecture of theoretical divines, or the secret expectation of a few recluse devotees, but it was become the popular hope and passion, and like all popular opinions, undoubting, and impatient of contradiction.

Paley. Evidences, part i. ch. i.

Her devotement was the demand of Apollo, and the joint petition of all Greece.

Hurd. Works, vol. i. p. 132. Notes on the Art of Poetry.

——O how loud
It calls devotion! genuine growth of night!
Devotion! daughter of Astronomy!
An undevout astronomer is mad.

Young. The Complaint. Night 9.

When the devotional spirit falls in with a melancholy temper, it is apt to depress the mind entirely, to sink it in the weakest superstition, and to produce a total retirement and abstraction from the world, and all the duties of life.

Gregory. Comparative View, p. 238.

You must seize with eagerness, and employ with alacrity, the few moments, you have to spare from business, in cultivating devout sentiments and virtuous habits, and sowing silently and imperceptibly, in your soul the seeds of eternal life.

Porteus. Sermon 16. vol. ii.

Thus we see the devoutness of his mind, in his frequent retirement to solitary prayer; in his habitual giving of thanks; in his reference of the beauties and operations of nature to the bounty of Providence; in his earnest addresses to his Father, more particularly that short but solemn one before the raising of Lazarus from the dead; and in the deep piety of his behaviour in the garden, on the last evening of his life.

Paley. Evidences, vol. ii. p. 76. part ii. ch. ii.

DEVOU'R, DEVOU'RER, DEVOU'RINGLY, DEVORA'TION. Fr. devorer; Sp. devorar; Lat. devorare; de, and vorare, which means to feed or eat like a beast. Vossius. From Gr. βορὰ, food or fodder.

"Fr. devorer; to ravine, devour, inglut; eat greedily, swallow whole, gulp or let down without chawing." Cotgrave.

Holy churche and charitie. ȝe chewe þ and deuoure þ.

Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 31.

And he seide to me take the book and deuoure it, and it schal make thi wombe to be bittir, but in the mouth it schal be swete as hony. Wiclif. Apocalips, ch. x.

Mannes sone cam etinge and drinkinge: and ye seyen lo a man deuourer and drinkinge wyn, a frend of pupplycans and of synful men. But wisdom is justified of her sones.

Id. Luke, ch. vii.

Thou root of false louers, Duke Jason
Thou sleer, deuourer, and confusion
Of gentill women.

Chaucer. Of Hypsiphile and Medea, fol. 294.

So that the hors of thilke stode
Deuoureden the mannes bloode,
Till fortune at last came,
That Hercules hym ouercame.

Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 162.

Thus it hath pleased God to fight for vs, and to defend the iustice of our cause against the ambicious and blody pretences of the Spaniards, who seeking to deuoure all nations, are themselues deuoured.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Sir Richard Greenwill, vol. ii. part i. fol. 173.

They be great deuourers of flesh, which they cut in smal piecys, and eat by handfuls most greedily, & especially the horse flesh.

Id. Ib. M. Anth. Jenkinson, vol. i. fol. 329.

Tho, vnder colour of shepheardes, some while
There crept in wolues, full of fraud and guile,
That often deuoured their own sheepe,
And often the shepheards that did hem keepe.

Spenser. Shepheards Calendar. May.

Then summe up all this lost, this mispent time together; we shall soone discerne we must needs acknowledge, that there are no such helluoes, such canker-wormes, such theevish devourers of men's most sacred (yet undervalued) time, as stage-players.

Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, act vi. sc. 1. part i.

I haue read that they [bear-wards] haue either voluntarilie, or for want of power to master their sauage beasts [the bears,] beene occasione of the death and deuoration of manie children in sundrie countries by which they haue passed, whose parents neuer knew what became of them.

Holinshed. Description of England, ch. x.

Fierce o'er the pyre, by fanning breezes spread,
The hungry flame devours the silent dead.

Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xii.

Instant, O Jove! Confound the suitor train,
For whom o'ertoil'd I grind the golden grain:

Far from this dome, the lewd devourers cast,
And be this festival decreed their last.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xx.

While Semele, on high Olympus plac'd,
To heavenly zephyrs bids her tresses flow
Once by devouring lightnings all defac'd.
West. The second Olympic Ode.

To Bacchus styl'd Devourer, on this isle,
Amid surrounding gloom, a temple hoar
By time remains; to Bacchus I devote
These splendid victims.
Glover. The Athenaid, book vi.

DEVO'W, } Devovere; see DEVOTE. To pledge
DEVO'VE. } or promise, dedicate or destine, or addict, yield, consign or give up to.

There too the armies angelic devow'd
Their former rage, and all to mercy bow'd,
Their broken weapons at her feet they gladly strow'd.
G. Fletcher. Christ's Victory and Triumph.

Having made this praier, hee willed the sergeants or lictours to go to Manlius, and with all speed to tell him, that his colleague was devowed for the armie.
Holland. Livius, fol. 287.

'Twas his own son, whom God and mankind lov'd,
His own victorious son, that he devov'd,
On whose bright head the baleful curses light.
Cowley. The Davideis, book iv.

DEUSE. Isidorus, in Gloss., Dusius, Dæmon. And Augustin, de Civitate Dei: Quosdam dæmonas, quos Dusios Galli nuncupant. And Isidorus, in his Glossary (annexed to Martinius,) suggests that Dusius may be a corruption of Drusus, (son of Tiberius;) referring to the Commentary of Lipsius upon Tacitus, whence (p. 163,) it appears (upon the authority of Dion Cassius, lib. 57,) that the sharpest swords, gladii acutissimi, were proverbially named Drusiani gladii; and Isidorus also suspects, that hence the word droes, used as we use Deuce, remains to the Dutch. De droes wal wait het hard. The deuce, how it does blow. Kilian thinks droes, which he interprets, Gigas, homo valens, &c. may be from this Drusus; because he was Domitor acerrimus. This Drusus was famous, or rather infamous, for his Germanic victories; and his name may have been perpetuated as a name of terror among that people: and from the corruption, Dusius our word may have sprung.

He prays—O bless me! what shall I do now?
Hang me, if I know what he prays, or how!
And 'twas the prettiest prologue as he wrote it!
Well, the deuce take me, if I ha'n't forgot it.
Congreve. Prologue to the Old Bachelor.

DEUTERO'GAMY, } Gr. δεύτερ-ος, second, and
DEU'TEROGAMIST. } γάμ-ειν, to marry.
A second marriage.

You here see that unfortunate divine, who has so long, and it would ill become me to say, successfully, fought against the deuterogamy of the age.
Goldsmith. Vicar of Wakefield, ch. xiv.

I immediately recollected this good-natured man's red pimpled face; for he had published for me against the deuterogamists of the age, and from him I borrowed a few pieces, to be paid at my return. Id. Ib. ch. xviii.

DEUTEROSCOPY, Gr. δεύτερος, second, and σκόπ-ειν, to look.
A second sight, second inspection; or, as Brown explains it, second intention.

For not attaining the deuteroscopy, and second intention of the words, they are fain to omit their superconsequencies, coherencies, figures, or tropologies.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, book i. ch. iii.

DEUTZIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Decandria, order Trigynia. Generic character: calyx bell-shaped, five-cleft; corolla of five petals, obtuse, undivided; filaments three-cleft; capsule three-awned, three-celled, three-valved, bursting at the base, many-seeded. DEUTZIA. — DEW.

One species, D. scabra, native of Japan. Thunb. Jap.

DEUX PONTS, a Principality of Germany, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, now included in the Kingdom of Bavaria. It is composed of the ancient County of the same name, with that of Veldentz; and is bounded on one side by the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, and on the other by what was the Electorate of Treves, and the Lower Palatinate. This Duchy is sometimes called Sweybrucken, as it formerly belonged to the Kings of Sweden, of the House of that name, which became extinct in 1731. The succession of the Duchy was then contested by the Elector of the Palatinate and the Count of Birkenfeldt, and the latter obtained possession in 1733. It was still much intersected by the possessions of other Princes. It was given up to France at the peace of Luneville, in 1802, and comprised, with part of the Archbishopric of Treves, in the Department of Sarre. It was then resigned to Austria at the general Peace of 1814, and subsequently exchanged with Bavaria for some other districts. When Deux Ponts was a separate Principality, it was supposed to contain a population of about 60,000 individuals; and though a mountainous region, many parts of it are productive in both corn and wine.

The Town of LES DEUX PONTS, the Capital of the preceding Duchy, is situated on the right bank of the little Erlbach, having a good Castle, which was formerly the Ducal residence. The chief objects of interest there, are the spacious Church and its fine organ, the new Lutheran Church and Academy, and the Orphan House. It was at this place that Stanislaus Leczynsky, King of Poland, took up his residence in 1709, and built the Palace of Schunchflick, in a valley at a short distance from the Town; this is now suffered to decay. Deux Ponts was once particularly distinguished for its editions of the Greek and Latin classics, but the printing establishment has now been removed to Strasburg. The population is about 5000. This Town is about forty-five miles west of Manheim, and nearly sixty east of Mentz; in latitude 49° 16′ north and longitude 7° 25′ east.

DEW, v.
DEW, n.
DE'WY,
DE'WINESS,
DEW-BATHED,
DEW-BEDABBLED,
DEW-BENT,
DEW-BERRY,
DEW-BESPANGLED,
DEW-BESPRENT,
DEW-BRIGHT,
DEW-DROP,
DEW-DROPPING,
DEW-GIVER,
DEW-IMPEARLED,
DEW-LAP,
DEW-LAPT,
DE'WY-FEATHERED,
DE'WY-SKIRTED.

Dutch dauwen; Gr. tawen; A.S. deaw-ian, rorare. Alludit, says Skinner, Gr. δεύ-ειν, rigare, and in this the Etymologists agree.

Dew-lap of a beast, because it hangeth down so much that it seemeth to lap the dew. Minshew and Skinner. The latter adds, perhaps deep lap; deop læppe. A.S. deop, profundus, and læppe, ora, pars dependens.

DEW.

Marie Magdalene by mores levede and dewes.
Piers Ploughman. Vision, p. 286.

With bitter teares, dewed all her face
Full oft sithes, swouning in the place.
Chaucer. The Story of Thebes, part ii. fol. 380.

And the erth wexeth proud withall
For swote dewes that on it fall.
Id. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 116.

The firste periferie of all
Engendreth mist, and ouermore
The dewes, and the frostes hore.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 143.

The sunne through nature's might, doth draw away the dew,
And spreads the flowers where he is wont, his princely face to shew.
Vncertaine Auctors. The Nature which worketh all Things, &c.

And thus desired night in woe I waste:
And to expresse the harts excessiue paine,
Mine eies their deawie teares distill amaine.
Turbervile. The Louer writes of his vnquiet and restlesse state.

And wantonly roves
Abroad in the groves,
And in the air hovers.
Which when it him deweth
His feathers he meweth,
In sighs of true lovers.
Drayton. To Cupid.

Their rootes ben dried up for lacke of dewe,
Yet dewed with the teares they han been euer among.
Spenser. Shepheards Calendar, December.

Then shalt thou see the dew-bedabbled wretch
Turn, and return, indenting with the way;
Each envious briar his weary legs doth scratch,
Each shadow makes him stop, each murmur stay.
Shakspeare. Venus and Adonis.

TITA. Be kind and courteous to this Gentleman,
Hop in his walks, and gamboll in his eies,
Feed him with apricoks, and dew-berries,
With purple grapes.
Shakspeare. Midsummer Night's Dreame, fol. 151.

This evening late, by then the chewing flocks
Had ta'en their supper on the savoury herb
Of knot-grass dew-besprent, and were in fold,
I sat me down to watch upon a bank
With ivy canopied, and interwove
With flaunting honey-suckle.
Milton. Comus, l. 542.

Or on that bank, feel the west wind
Breathe health and plenty: please my mind,
To see sweet dew-drops kiss these flowers,
And, then, wash'd off by April showers.
Walton. Angler, part i. ch. v.

And [phantasie] more inconstant then the wind, who wooes
Euen now the frozen bosom of the north:
And being anger'd, puffes away from thence,
Turning his side to the dew-dropping south.
Shakspeare. Romeo and Juliet, fol. 57.

That is, (thou repairer and Saviour of the desparing soul, the dew-giver and bestower of spiritual grace; heal my wounds, and give to the mind that prays to thee, the gifts of grace, that I may be chaste, modest, wise in heart; true in my sayings, hating evil, loving God in holy works.)
Taylor. Polemical Discourses, fol. 331. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. sec. 9.

Where nightingales in Arden sit and sing
Amongst the dainty dew-impearled flowers.
Drayton. The Owl.

But whereas we say, that the juice of the body ought to be roscide and fat, it is to be noted that we mean it not of a visible fat, but a dewinesse dispersed, or (if you will call it) radicall in the very substance of the body.
Bacon. Natural History, part. iii. fol. 40. Of Life and Death.

Upon him all at once courageously do set,
Him by the dew-laps some, some by the flank do get.
Drayton. Poly-olbion, song 22.

My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kinde,
With eares that sweep away the morning dew,
Crook-kneed, and dew-lapt, like Thessalian buls.
Shakspeare. Midsummer Night's Dreame, fol. 158.

And the waters murmuring
With such consort as they keep
Entice the dewy-feather'd sleep.
Milton. Il Penseroso, l. 146.

Thou wast not wont to have the earth thy stool,
Nor the moist dewy grass thy pillow, nor
Thy chamber to be the wide horizon.
Sir John Oldcastle, act v. sc. 8.

——— In Gallick blood again
He dews his reeking sword, and strews the ground
With headless ranks.
J. Philips. Blenheim.

To whom wilt thou thy fire impart,
Thy lyre, thy voice, and tuneful art;
Whom raise sublime on thy ethereal wing,
And consecrate with dews of thy Castalian spring?
Congreve. Pindaric Ode.

Soon as Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
Sprinkled with roseate light the dewy lawn,
In haste the prince arose, prepared to part.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xvii.

Thine is the balmy breath of morn,
Just as the dew-bent rose is born.
Thomson. Hymn to Solitude.

——— Lo! now apparent all,
Aslant the dew-bright earth, and colour'd air
He looks in boundless majesty abroad.
Id. Summer.

No frisking heifers bound about the place
To spurn the dew-drops off, and bruise the rising grass.
Addison. Virgil. Georgic 4.

he mother cow must wear a low'ring look,
Sour headed, strongly neck'd, to bear the yoke,
Her double dew-lap from her chin descends:
And at her thighs the pond'rous burden ends.
Dryden. Virgil. Georgic 3.

——— Illumin'd wide,
The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the sun,
And through their lucid veil his soften'd force
Shed o'er the peaceful world.
Thomson. Autumn.

It was foretold of you, says he to Trypho, that you should be as the sand of the sea-shore; and so indeed you are, if as numerous, as barren likewise, and as unfruitful of all that is good, ever ready to receive the refreshing dews and rain of heaven, and never willing and disposed to make any return.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 73.

——— Swift he sought
Achaia's camp and Agamemnon there
Him lying in his tent he found, immers'd
In dewy sleep ambrosial.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book ii.

In vain I now expect the coming on
Of dew-bath'd eve to meet my wonted love.
Warton. Eclogue 3.

No shrub o'erhangs the dew-bespangled vale,
No blossom trembles to the dying gale.
Jones. Laura.

——— Her dew-besprinkled locks
Begin to fall, her bending shoulders sink,
And active vigour leaves her sober steps.
Dodsley. Agriculture, can. 1.

We have a bower, on which the dew-drops sparkle, and in which the breeze becomes scented with the fragrance of musk.
Sir William Jones. Works, vol. v. p. 422. History of the Persian Language.

EW. — XTER.

Their [buffaloes] horns are curved towards each other, but together bend directly backwards, and they have no dew-laps.
Cook. Voyages, vol. ii. book iii. ch. ix. p. 250.

DEXAMINE, in Zoology, a genus of Crustacea belonging to the order Amphipodes of Latreille, established by Dr. Leach, who places it in the third section of his Edriophthalmæ.

Generic character. Antennæ four, setaceous; the upper pair longest, formed of three joints, the last joint many-jointed, the first joint the smallest, the second joint of both pair of antennæ long and slender, a fine hair at the base of the third joint of the lower pair; the four fore-feet nearly equal, ending with a compressed, single-hooked pincher; eyes oblong, placed behind the base of the upper pair of antennæ; tail having on each side three bifid stiles, and above a movable stile.

This genus and the Leucothoes are remarkable, according to Latreille, for the peduncle of their antennæ being formed of only two, instead of three joints, as in all the other Amphipodes. Only one species is described as belonging to this genus, which was discovered by Colonel Montague on the south coast of Devonshire.

1. D. spinosa, Leach, Zool. Misc. ii. 22, which is the Cancer gammarus spinosus of Montague, Lin. Trans. xi. 3. The last four rings of the (post abdomen or) tail are prolonged behind into a spine; the forehead is produced between the upper pair of antennæ, and slightly inflexed; the body is shining.

DE'XTER, DEXTE'RITY, DE'XTEROUS, DE'XTEROUSLY, DE'XTEROUSNESS, DE'XTRAL, DE'XTRALITY.

Lat. dexter; Gr. δεξιτερ-ὸς, poeticè pro δεξιὸν. Δεξιὰ is properly spoken of the hand, sc. ἀπὸ τᾶ δεχέσθαι, to take, to catch, to hold; because more active than the left. And thus,

Dexterous, active, ready, expert, skilful, clever, adroit.

Yet such was the inuincible resolution, and the wonderful dexterity of the English, that in one half houre or thereabout, the enemy was repulsed, and the towne wall possessed, by the noble Earle himself.
Hakluyt. Voyages, &c. The Voyage to Cadiz, vol. i. fol. 163.

King Henry was a prince of singular prudence, of passing stout courage, of magnanimitee incōparable, of inuincible fortitude, of notable actiuitee, of dexteritee woonderfull.
Udall. Preface, to the Kinges Maiestie.

How comes it to pass that the victorious arms of England, quartered with the conquered coat of France, are not placed on the dexter side, but give the flower-de-luce the better hand.
Brewer. Lingua, act iii. sc. 6.

I call him poor man because he is not living to answer for himself, but yet he was a worthy minister of justice (for I had much cause to know him) and he was of as much dexterity and integrity, as ever man that sat in his place.
State Trials. Proceedings against Mr. Wraynham.

Next his feet my praise commands,
Which me thinks we should call hands,
For so finely they are shap'd,
And for any use so apt,
Nothing can so dextrous be,
Nor fine handed near as he.
Cotton. On my Pretty Marten.

For which purpose, they had then a fast friend there, the Marquis of Hamilton, who could most dextrously put such an affair into agitation, with the least noise, and prepare both King and Queen to hearken to it very willingly.
Clarendon. History of Civil War, vol. i. part i p. 210.

DEXTER — DEY.

Now in these there is no right hand: of this constitution are many women, and some men, who though they accustom themselves unto either hand, do dexterously make use of neither.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iv. ch. v.

Over all a batune dexter-ways argent as being the arms of the duke his prisoner, and by martial law belonging to him.
Fuller. Worthies. Northamptonshire.

As for any tunicles or skins which should hinder the liver from enabling the dextral parts, we must not conceive it diffuseth its virtue by mere irradiation but by its veins and proper vessels, which common skins and teguments cannot impede.
Sir Thomas Brown, book iv. ch. v.

And therefore were this indifferency permitted, or did not institution, but nature determine dextrality, there would be many more Scævolas than are delivered in story; nor needed we to draw examples of the life, from the sons of the right hand; as we read of seven thousand in the army of the Benjamites.
Id. Ib.

Th' observing augur took the prince aside,
Seiz'd by the hand, and thus prophetic cried,
Yon bird that dexter cuts the aerial road,
Rose ominous, nor flies without a God.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xv.

In which his dextrous wit had oft been shown,
And in the wreck of kingdoms sav'd his own.
Dryden. Absalom and Achitophel.

We gather'd round and to his single eye,
The single eye that in his forehead glar'd
Like a full moon, or a broad burnish'd shield,
A forky staff we dexterously apply'd.
Addison. From the third Æneid.

Like jugglers' tricks, that have more or less appearance of being real according to the dexterousness and skill of him that plays them.
Sir William Temple. Works, vol. iii. p. 208. Of Gardening.

Here strip, my children! here at once leap in!
Here prove who best can dash through thick and thin,
And who the most in love of dirt excel,
Or dark dexterity of groping well.
Pope. The Dunciad, book ii.

Upon discovering them, we usually sent out our boat with a man in the bow, who was a dextrous diver: and as the boat came within a few yards of the turtle the diver plunged into the water, taking care to rise close upon it.
Anson. Voyage round the World, book ii. ch. viii.

They smooth the plank very expeditiously and dexterously with their adzes, and can take off a thin coat from a whole plank without missing a stroke.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. book i. ch. viii.

The dexterity of hand, indeed, even in common trades cannot be acquired without much practice and experience.
Smith. Wealth of Nations, vol. i. p. 169. book i. ch. x.

DEY (Dáï, or Dáyí, pronounced Déyí by the Moghrebíns, or Arabs of Western Africa,) is the title given to the Chiefs of the Military Aristocracy, by which Algiers has been governed ever since the latter part of the XVIIth century. It was adopted in imitation of the Tunisenes, who had not many years before formed a similar Regency for themselves. "The Sultan," said these rebel sons, "is the father of his soldiers; the Republic (jumhúr, community) is their mother; and their Chief, or guardian, can be no other than her brother, their maternal uncle, (Dayí.) (D'Arvieux, iv. 51, v. 259.) The dighity to which this title is affixed, is not hereditary but elective; and is held on a very uncertain tenure, as the principal officers and agents of the Dey must be drawn from the military corps by which he was elected, and can have little difficulty in deposing him whenever they are prompted to it by avarice or ambition. After the consent of the Turkish garrison (i. e. troops levied by the Algerines in Turkey,) has been given to the election which their officers have made, the new Dey is solemnly reminded by the Muftí of his obligation to administer justice to all, and to provide for the due payment of his troops; and he is then proclaimed; his nomination is immediately made known to the Porte, and he receives in return a kheldt, (caftàn,) with the title of Páshà of Algiers; for the Court of Constantinople has since the beginning of the last century found this a more practicable method of maintaining its nominal sovereignty there, than that of sending one of its own servants, who would be merely a tool in the hands of the military rabble over whom he was placed, and must depend for his support and emoluments on Constantinople. The first Dey of Algiers was Hájí Mohammed, Aghà, elected in 1670, or about that time. In D'Arvieux's time he assumed no state, but lived like a simple individual.

DEY. — DIABETES

See Hyde's Syntagma Dissertationum a Sharpe, i. 223; Etat des Royaumes de Barbarie, La Haye, 1704, 12mo; Laugier di Tassy, Hist. du Royaume d'Alger, Amst. 1772, 2 tom. 8vo; Mémoires du Chevalier D'Arvieux, par Labat, 6 tom. 12mo, Paris, 1731.

DIABETES; diabeticall disease; from the Gr. διάβητης, from διαβαίνειν, pertransire, to pass through.

Will they operate like the quack's medicine, which is equally good for a diabetes and a dropsy?
Hume. Essays, vol. i. p. 172. The Sceptic, ess. 18.

For water is very diuretic. Hence some have apprehended a diabetes from the continued use thereof, but it is so far from causing a diabetes, that it has been known to cure that disorder.
Bishop Berkeley. Works, vol. iv. p. 22. Thoughts on Tar Water.

The disease termed DIABETES is an excessive discharge of urine of peculiar quality. It is divided into two species, the D. insipidus, when the urine is limpid, and the D. mellitus, when it has the colour, odour, and taste of honey. The first is a discharge of much diluted urine, resulting in general from debility and relaxation, and sometimes from an unguarded use of mineral waters. It is not uncommon in advanced life. In the second, the urine need not always be in unusual quantities, though it generally is so; but it contains no animal matter, and yields on evaporation a considerable portion of sugar. The skin is dry, parched, and often scaly, the patient is emaciated, his thirst is excessive, he has a low quick pulse, and if the discharge be stopped anasarca commonly terminates his sufferings. The disease is one of peculiar obstinacy, and is too often so far the sign of a broken constitution as to admit of little hope beyond that of alleviation. The treatment consequently has been exceedingly various, both in its nature and in its results. Sudorifics, Antispasmodics, Stimulants, Astringents, a Milk Diet, and Tonics, have all been tried, but not one of them with such general success as to establish itself in preference to the others.

This disorder has largely occupied the attention of medical writers. Sir Richard Blackmore has treated on it in plain prose in his Dissertation on a Dropsy, a Tympany, the Jaundice, the Stone, and the Diabetes; and besides single cases in various Medical Collections, we have met with the following separate Works: Martin Lister, Sex Exercitationes Medicinales de Morbis Chronicis, 1694; Rollo, Account of two Cases of D. M.; Trinden, The English Olive Tree; Latham, Facts and Opinions concerning D.; Girdlestone, A Case of D. with an Historical Sketch of that Disease.

DIABO'LICK, DIABO'LICAL, DIABO'LICALLY, DIABO'LICALNESS, DIABO'LICISM. } Lat. diabolus, the Devil. See above DEVIL. Devilish, pertaining to the Devil.

Of these most hellish & diabolick frutes, holy S. Paule admonished the Romains, in the firste chaptre of his Epistle vnto them. Bale. English Votaries, book ii. p. 18.

If the diabolical imputation which the earl at his arraignment cast upon him, further moved him to impatiency than his vsual was, or was fit, he desired them that heard it to pardon him, for the provocation made him to forget all bands of speech.
State Trials. Trial of Sir Christopher Blunt.

——— For, in the wilie snake
Whatever sleights, none would suspicious mark,
As from his wit and native suttletie
Proceeding, which in other beasts observ'd,
Doubt might beget of diabolic pow'r
Active within, beyond the sense of brute.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book ix. l. 86.

Or, if our souls are but particles and decerptions of our parents, then I must have been guilty of all the sins that ever were committed by my progenitors ever since Adam; and by this time my soul would have been so deprav'd and debauch'd, that it would be now brutish, yea diabolical.
Glanville. Preexistence of Souls, ch. iii.

For what man, who dares to stile himself a Christian, can be so diabolically absurd, so audaciously impious, so desperately prophane as to denie that to be abominable, pernicious, vndecent, and vnlawfull vnto Christians, which they haue renounced, and abominated in their baptism.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act ii. Chorus.

Which, if they [fortune telling] had any reality in them, would be literally diabolical; and having no reality in them yet they are truly diabolical, as being cheats, delusions, and impositions upon mankind. Clarke. Sermon 1. vol. viii.

Here we see a fatal proof of the extreme barbarities to which the most diabolical sentiment of revenge will drive the natural tenderness even of a female mind. Porteus. Lecture 14. vol. ii.

You must know that H-d-g-r, the manager of masquerades, is a devil disguised in human shape. I wonder he did not change his face as well as his body, but that retains its primitive diabolicalness. Dr. Warton. Satire of Ranelagh House.

And this new donation of the ecstacies of the saints was a noble foundation for what he was now projecting, the farce of diabolisms and exorcisms.
Warburton. The Doctrine of Grace, book ii. ch. iii.

DIACHYLON. "Fr. diaculon; a certain mollifying plaister, tearmed otherwise, Diachylon, because it is made of juices." Cotgrave. Gr. διὰ, and χυλὸς, succus, juice, from χύειν, to pour.

I had, to examine, some conjectures that occured to me about it, caused glasses to be made with a hole at that end, which used to be sealed up, and had nevertheless been able, as occasion required, to make use of such tubes, as if no such holes had been left in them by devising stopples for them, made of the common plaister called diachylon.
Boyle. New Experiments touching the Spring of Air, vol. i. p. 7.

DIACHYLON or Emplastrum commune, is the Emplastrum lithargyri of the London Pharmacopœia, and is made as follows: Olive oil one gallon, litharge five pounds, boiled with one quart of water over a gentle fire, and well stirred for about four hours, till the litharge be wholly dissolved.

DIACONATE, from Lat. diaconus, a Deacon, q. v.

And so all things in this nature, should be alike common to all and each; and there should be a common treasury for this one great diaconate church (as we may, in a parallel allusion, to that other name of presbyterial, call it) as there is a common regimen or government, for this great presbyterial church.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. part iv. fol. 189.

IACOPE. DIACOPE, from the Greek διακοπή, a notch, Cuv., in Zoology, a genus of animals belonging to the family Percoides, order Acanthopterygii, class Pisces.

IADEM.

Generic character. Preopercule having a deep notch in the middle of its toothed edge, for its articulation with the interopercule.

The fish which compose this genus are selected from the Holocentri and Lutiani. It differs from the former in not having the preopercule spined, and from the latter in having the deep notch for the interopercule.

See Cuvier, Règne Animal.

DIACRITICAL, Gr. διακριτικὸς, from διακρίν-ειν, to distinguish, to separate.

He must not be discouraged by the difficulty of reading the Indian letters, for the characters are in reality the same with those, which our books are printed in, and are only rendered difficult by the frequent omission of the diacritical points, and the wants of regularity in the position of the words.

Sir William Jones. Preface to Persian Grammar.

DI'ADEM, } Fr. diademe; It. and Sp. diadema;
DIADE'MED. } Dutch and Ger. diadem; Lat. diadema, Gr. διάδημα, from διαδεῖν, to bind around (διὰ, and δεῖν, ligare, to bind.) Properly, says Minshew, it signifieth a wreathed hatband, with which the ancient Kings contented themselves, as thinking the Crowne only belongs to their Gods.

And lo a greet reed dragoun that hadde seuene heedis and ten hornys, and in the heedis of hem seuen diademys.

Wiclif. Apocalips, ch. xi.

And David shal be diademyd. and daunten alle oure enemyes.

Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 60.

For vnto vertue longeth dignitie
And not the reuers safely dare I deme
All weare he mitre, corowne, or diademe.

Scogan vnto the Lordes and Gentilmen of the Kinges house, in Chaucer's Works, fol. 335.

And in suche wise his light to spreade,
Sit with his diademe on head,
The sonne shinende in his carte.

Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 146.

Not long after he caused a great assemble to be appointed at the towre of London, where Kyng Richard appareled in vesture and robe royall, the diademe on his head, and the scepter in his hand; came personally before the congregacion and said these words in effecte.

Hall. Introduction to the History of King Henry IV.

In the first place, Prince Bacchus brought up buying and selling: he it was also that devised the diademe that roiall ensigne and ornament, and the manner of triumph.

Holland. Plinie, vol. i. fol. 187.

His favour leaves me nothing to require,
Prevents my wishes, and outruns desire;
What more can I expect while David lives?
All but his kingly diadem he gives:
"And that"—But here he paus'd; then, sighing, said—
"Is justly destin'd for a worthier head."

Dryden. Absalom and Achitophel.

——————— Now I feel
Myself awake to misery and shame!
Ye sceptres, diadems, and rolling trains
Of flatt'ring pomp, farewell.

Smollet. The Regicide.

Diodorus Siculus, (iv. 1,) as well as Pliny in the passage above cited, assigns the invention of the DIADEM to Bacchus, and the Greek writer gives an odd reason for it; it was to cure the headache: "I hope," says Mr. Gifford, in a Note on his translation of the XIIIth Satire of Juvenal, "he found it answer. Very few of those who have tried it since his time, I believe, have experienced much relief from it." This fascia candida, as Casaubon calls it, was used in after times by Lucius, one of the sons of Q. Metellus, (who hence acquired the name of Diadematus,) for a purpose to which it appears more readily applicable, the concealment of an open sore. (Plut. de fort. Rom.; Plin. vii. 44.) DIADEM.

The Diadem originally was a broad, white, woollen fillet, constantly worn by Barbaric Monarchs. The Persian Kings bedewed it with myrrh, and the far more precious odour known under the name of Labyzus. (Athen. xii. 2.) Alexander the Great adopted it from those Princes, unmindful of the bad omen, velut in leges eorum quos vicerat transisset. (Justin, iii. 3.) Quintus Curtius relates that this was not done without deep manifestation of discontent among his Macedonians; and that the Diadem of Darius, which Alexander imitated, was purple shot with white, purpureum distinctum albo, (vi. 6.) Appian (in Syriacis) has a story that this Diadem was once blown from the head of the conqueror, while exploring a range of marshes on shipboard. It was stopped by and suspended on some reeds, and a sailor swimming to them brought it back on his own head. On another occasion the same ornament was employed in an act of kindness: while dismounting from his horse, Alexander accidentally struck Lysimachus in the forehead with his lance, and wounded him severely. The King immediately tore the Diadem from his own brows to staunch the blood; and this, says the Historian, was the first omen of the subsequent Royalty of Lysimachus. (Justin, xv. 4.)

If Suetonius is to be understood literally, it was a Diadem which Antonius offered so repeatedly from the Rostra, and which was as repeatedly declined by Julius Cæsar, (80.) Caligula had thoughts of wearing it permanently; but so detestable were these kingly attributes to the Romans, even when enduring a still worse tyranny, that he was induced to lay aside his intention; and the adroitness of flattery converted his most atrocious crimes into an argument in favour of this abstinence. (Id. Cal. 22.) Even Titus himself, the delight of the human race, did not escape suspicion when he wore this emblem of Sovereignty during the consecration of Apis at Memphis, although by so doing he only complied with an established religious custom. (Id. Tit. 3.) Heliogabalus was the first who wore a Diadem adorned with jewels, as better fitted to exhibit feminine beauty. (Lampridius, in Heliogabalo.) The final adoption of this ornament is attributed to Diocletian by Gibbon, (ch. xviii.) and he refers to Aurelius Victor, and to Eutropius, as his authorities for this assertion. Both these writers speak of the increase of Courtly magnificence introduced by this Emperor, but neither of them specifically mentions the Diadem as part of it. It was with her Diadem that Monime, the high-minded Queen of Mithridates, attempted to strangle herself, when informed she must die. It failed her, and spitting upon it she threw it from her with disdain. (Plutarch, in Lucullo.)

Diadumenus, upon whom his father Macrinus during his brief reign conferred the Imperial title, and the popular name Antoninus, is said, in his life by Lampridius, to have been born with a natural Diadem instead of a cawl, and hence to have obtained his original name. We do not pretend to interpret the passage which we extract below. Iste puer pileum non habuit, sed Diadema tenue, sed ita forte ut rumpi non potuerit, venis intercedentibus specie nervi sagittarii The commentators observe, that this remarkable natural distinction has been found in some other children, who on that account have all borne the same name Diadumenus.

DIADEM. — DIAGNOSTIC.

Bayfius appears to have assured himself with entire confidence of the shape and make of the ancient Diadem. Erat autem candidum vinculum, cujusmodi hodie nostri Præsides Parrhisini, præterea etiam Venetiarum duces suis tiaris obvincire solent. (De Re Vestiariâ, fol. 7.) Soler, de Pileo; and Carolus Paschalis, de Coronis, ix. 3—7, have collected all the lore which is to be found respecting Diadems.

DIADOCHUS, δῖος, and δόκος, from the beauty of its appearance, a stone which Pliny (xxxvii. 57) informs us resembles the Beryl. Many of its marvellous properties have been detailed by Marbodæus, de Gemmarum Lapidumque Pretiosorum formis naturis atque viribus, 1539. He informs us, that

Diadochos, perquam responsa petentibus aptus,
Dæmonis effigies varias ostendere fertur,
Nec lapis est alius qui fortius evocet umbras;
Sed si defuncto quis forsitan applicet illum,
Protinus asseritur solitos amittere vires:
Namque sacer lapis est, et quæ mors sternit abhorret.
Hunc autem perhibent similem fulgere Beryllo.

Albertus Magnus (de Min. ii. 2, 4) writes it Diacodos, and says that the causes which have made it be esteemed sacred, may be found in libris Magorum, Hermetis, Ptolemæi et Thabitæ. We must avail ourselves of the reason offered by Pictorius, the commentator on Marbodæus, for not explaining these causes more fully—quos libros ad manus non habemus.

May it not be of the Diadochus which Braithwaite intended to write in the following passage? "For as the precious stone Diacletes, though it have many rare and excellent sovereignties in it, yet loseth them all if it be put in a dead man's mouth." English Gentleman, 273. Archdeacon Nares (ad v. Diacletes) believes, that Braithwaite here followed Lyly's practice of imagining an object, and ascribing to it certain curious properties, merely for the sake of introducing it in a simile or illustration. But Marbodæus has mentioned this as a property of the Diadochus, without any reference to simile or illustration.

DIÆRESIS, Fr. dierese; Lat. diæresis; Gr. διαίρεσις, from διαιρεῖν, to divide, to distinguish.

If any two vowels are to be read as two distinct syllables, the latter is maked with a diæresis, or two dots over it; παῖς, boy, and ἄϋπνος, sleepless.

Sharpe. On the Greek Tongue, p. 16.

DIAGNOSTIC, Gr. διαγνωστίκον, from διαγινώσκειν, to discern, to distinguish; διὰ, and γινώσκ-ειν, to know.

That by which any thing is known or distinguished from any thing else; the symptom that decides the nature of the disease.

The disease of our intellectuals is too great, not to be its own diagnostick: and they that feel it not, are not less sick, but stupidly so. Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. vii.

For, since the motions of the Spir suppose themselves to have) cannot and lawful, by any certain diagnostic motions of a man's own heart, the farther, and even in things unlawfu their own hearts to be the impulse of South

What does he think of the comm and of the manufactures of Paisley a has this any thing like the deadly a which the false diagnostick of our stat trade in general. Burke. On t

The DIAGNOSIS of diseases ha among others by Savona, De Diagnosin et Prognosin, 1624; Diagnosticæ, 1654; Price, Tr Prognosis; Dreyssig, whose w into French by Renauldin, Medicale; Hall, The Principles o

DIA'GONAL, Fr. diag
DIA'GONAL, adj. διαγώνιον γ
DIA'GONALLY. ad angulum

a line drawn from corner to γωνία, a corner.

He plainly affirmeth, this geomet meter or diagonal of a square is inco be an eternal truth. Cudworth. In

But when the parallelogram is div by a diagonal line, the quantity of t of necessity be half the quantity of t logram. Id.

The next leaf may be single; stit diagonally, and cross those stitches will be of a lozenge-shape.
Wal

For instance, the Sartorius or tai spine, running diagonally across the the inside of the main bone of the enables us, by its contraction, to thro

DIAGRAM, Gr. διάγραμμα, describe, to delineate.

Any thing delineated; d geometrical figure.

The mathematics, saith Aristotle, end or chief good that men look a good or bad, better or worse into a consultation or election there, only necessary convictions of the understa
Hammond. Works, vol.

Diagrams drawn on paper are cop and not liable to the uncertainty that fication. Locke. On Human Unde

Before her, [mad Mathesis] lo! in Strange diagrams th' astonish'd sig
Right lines and curves, with figure Fawkes.

DIAGRAMMA, Cuv., in Zoo
belonging to the family Per pterygii, class Pisces.

Generic character. Teeth slightly toothed; six large jaw; scales small; front of t oblong.

They are natives of the In variegated with black and whi
See Cuvier, Règne Animal.

AL. AL. NG.

DIAL,
DIA'LLING,
DIA'LIST,
DIAL-PLATE.

Quasi diale, because it points out the hour of the day, (diei.)

M. Varro reporteth, that the first diall was set up in the common market-place, upon a columne neere the foresaid rostra, in the time of the first Punicke warre, by M. Valerius Messala the Consull, presently after the taking of Catana in Sicilie.
Holland. Plinie, vol. i. fol. 191.

For loyalty is still the same,
Whether it win or loose the game;
True as the dial to the sun,
Although it be not shin'd upon.
Butler. Hudibras, part iii. can. 2.

And this hypothesis may be tolerated in physics, as it is not necessary in the art of dialling or navigation to mention the true system or earth's motion. Berkeley. Siris, 285.

He tells us, that the two friends, being each of them possessed of one of those needles, made a kind of dial-plate, inscribing it with the four and twenty letters in the same manner as the hours of the day are marked upon the ordinary dial-plate.
Spectator, No. 241.

Scientifick dialists, by the geometrick considerations of lines, have found out rules to mark out the irregular motion of the shadow in all latitudes, and on all planes.
Moxon. Mechanick Dialling.

So if I would learn the nature of a watch, the workman takes it to pieces and shows me the spring, the wheels, the axles, the pinions, the balance, the dial-plate, the pointer, the case, &c.
Watts. Logic, part i. ch. vi. sec. 8.

DIALLING is the art of drawing Dials on the surface or surfaces of bodies, so that by the projection of a shadow upon them they may exhibit the hour of the day. It is, in fact, a particular part of the general theory of projections; for it will be seen, as we proceed, that it consists only in projecting the shadow of a given line, always parallel to the Earth's axis, upon some proposed plane, from a given point or plane given with the hour of the day.

The general principles of Dialling may be rendered familiar to every one by the following simple illustration. Thus conceive a P B P, fig. 1, Plate XXXII. to represent the Earth as transparent, or a glass sphere occupying the same situation in space, and its equator as divided into twenty-four equal parts, or hour circles, by so many meridian semicircles, a, b, c, d, &c., one of which is the geographical meridian of any given place, as London, which we will suppose is at the point a; and if the hour of twelve were marked at the equator, both upon that meridian and the opposite one, and all the rest of the hours in order on the other meridians, those meridians would be the hour circles of London; because as the Sun appears to revolve round the Earth in twenty-four hours, he will pass from one meridian to another in an hour. Consequently if the sphere had an opaque axis, as P E P, terminated at the poles P and P, the shadow of the axis which is in the same plane as the Sun and with each meridian, would fall upon every particular meridian and hour when the Sun came to the plane of the opposite meridian, and would, therefore, show the time at London, and at all other places on the same meridian.

If now this sphere were cut through the middle by a plane A B C D in the rational horizon of London, one half of the axis, as E P, would be above the plane, and the other half below it; and if straight lines were drawn from the centre of the plane to those points where its circumference is cut by the hour circle of the sphere, those lines would be the hour lines for a horizontal Dial for London; for the shadow of the axis would fall upon each particular hour line of the Dial, when it fell upon the like hour circle of the sphere. DIAL-LING.

If the plane which cuts the sphere be vertical, as A F C G, (fig. 2,) touching the given place, for example, London, it will then become the plane of an erect south Dial; and if right lines be drawn from its centre E to those points of the circumference where the hour circles of the sphere cut it, these will be the hour lines of a vertical or direct south Dial for London, to which the hours are to be set in the figure contrary to those of the horizontal Dial, and the lower point P E of the axis will cast a shadow on the hour of the day in that Dial at the same time that it would fall upon the like hour line of the sphere, if such Dial plane were not interposed.

If the plane, still facing the meridian, be made to incline or recline any number of degrees, the hour circle of the sphere will still cut the edge of the plane in those points, to which the hour lines must be drawn straight to the centre, and the axis of the sphere will cast a shadow on those lines at the respective hours. The same will still have place, if the plane be made to decline any number of degrees from the meridian, either to the east or west, provided the declination be less than 90°, or reclination be less than the colatitude of the plane, and the axis of the sphere will be the gnomon; otherwise the axis of the sphere will have no elevation above the plane of the Dial, and consequently could give no shadow.

Thus, it appears, that the plane of every Dial represents the plane of some great circle on the Earth, and the gnomon the Earth's axis; the vertex of a right gnomon, the centre of the Earth, or visible heavens, and the plane of the Dial is just as far from this centre as from the vertex of this style.

Now the Earth itself as compared with its distance from the Sun, may be considered as a point; and, therefore, if a small sphere of glass be placed upon any part of the Earth's surface, so that its axis be parallel to the axis of the Earth, and the sphere have such lines upon it and such planes within it as above described, it will show the hours of the day as truly as if it were placed at the Earth's centre, and the shell of the Earth were as transparent as the glass.

These general ideas being understood, the nature of the following calculations will be readily comprehended; previous to which, however, it will be proper to lay down a few definitions.

1. The plane erected perpendicular to the face of the Dial, and the upper edge of which marks the bounds of the shadow is called the gnomon; the upper edge of the said plane is called the style of the Dial, and it is always parallel to the Earth's axis.

2. The line on which the plane of the gnomon intersects the plane of the Dial is called the substyle.

3. The angle included between the style and the substyle is called the elevation of the style. In the following formulas it will be denoted by E; in a horizontal Dial it is evidently equal to the latitude of the place or E = L.

DIAL-LING.

4. Those Dials whose planes are parallel to the plane of the horizon are called horizontal Dials; and such as have their planes perpendicular to the horizon erect Dials.

5. Those erect Dials whose planes are either parallel or perpendicular to the plane of the meridian are called erect direct Dials. They face one of the four cardinal points.

6. All other erect Dials are called declined Dials.

7. Those Dials whose planes are neither parallel nor perpendicular to the plane of the horizon are inclined or reclining Dials. These may of course be either direct or declining according to the preceding definitions.

8. The arc of the meridian which is intercepted between any given plane and that of the prime vertical, is called the declination of the plane. It is denoted by D in the following formulas, and is regarded as positive when the declination is towards the north, and negative when towards the south.

9. The inclination (I) of a plane is the angle which it makes with a vertical plane.

10. The intersection of the plane of the Dial and that of the meridian passing through the style is called the meridian of the Dial, or twelve o'clock hour line.

11. Those meridians passing through the style, which make angles of 15°, 30°, 45°, &c. with the meridian of the plane are called hour circles; and their intersections with the plane of the Dial hour lines.

12. The angle formed by the substyle and the meridian is called the horary angle of the substyle, and is denoted by M.

13. The angle included between the substyle and the horizon is called the inclination of the substyle; it is in the following formulas denoted by S.

GENERAL PROBLEM.

To determine the requisites in a Dial for any proposed latitude, and of given inclinations to a vertical plane, and at any given declination from the prime vertical.

Let H O B (fig. 3,) represent the horizon, H Z B the meridian of the plane, Z the zenith, Z O the prime vertical, C the elevated pole, P b, P b', &c. portions of the hour circles, Z P b, Z P b', &c. comprehending hour angles; and let the plane on which it is proposed to draw the Dial be coincident with the plane of the great circle M b T. Also let Z a perpendicular to M a T be drawn, and produced to I. Then P B = L the latitude of the place; Z a = I the inclination of the plane; O T = H I = D the declination; P S, drawn perpendicular to M T, will be the position of the substyle; and M b is the inclination of the hour line to the meridian.

Now we may regard the Dial whose plane coincides with M a T as a vertical or erect Dial at the place whose zenith is M, where M and Z are on the same meridians; and, of course, reckon the hours alike. Let M Z = l, and D′ = comp. of Z M a. Then P Z = 90° − L would become P M = P Z + Z M = 90° − L + l = 90° − (L − l.)

The right angled triangle M Z a gives $\tan M a = \sin Z a \tan M Z a = \sin I \tan D$ ..... (1)

Hence M a is the angle between the meridian and vertical, and is obviously evanescent when either I or D are so.

When I = 90°, M a becomes = H I = D.

Also
$$\tan Z M = \tan l = \frac{\tan Z a}{\cos M Z a} = \frac{\tan I}{\cos D} \quad \ldots\ldots (2)$$

$$\cos Z M a = \sin D' = \sin D \cos I \quad \ldots\ldots (3)$$

$$\sin P S = \sin E = \sin Z M a \sin P M = \cos D' \cos (L - l) \quad \ldots\ldots (4)$$ where E is the height of the style or elevation of the pole above the plane.

Then P b being any hour circle whatever, the spherical triangle P b M gives us, from the principles of spherical trigonometry,

$$\cos M b \sin P M = \cos P M \cos P M b + \sin P M b \cot P.$$

But $\cos P M b = \sin D'$, and $\sin P M b = \cos D'$.

Also $\frac{\cos}{\sin} = \cot$. Therefore, dividing by sin M P

$$\cos M b = \sin D' \tan (L - Z) + \frac{\cos D'}{\cos (L - l)} \quad \ldots (5)$$

$$\tan M T = \tan (M a + 90°) = - \cot M a,$$ where M T is the inclination of the horizontal plane to the meridian.

The above expression (5) is general, and by no means complex; it may however be rendered more convenient for further deductions and corollaries, by exterminating l and D′. Thus, for the first term

$$\sin D' \tan (L - l) = \sin D \cos I \frac{\tan L - \tan l}{1 + \tan L \tan l}$$

$$= \left\{ \sin D \cos I \left(\tan L - \frac{\tan I}{\cos D} \right) \right\} + \left\{ 1 + \frac{\tan I}{\cos D} \tan L \right\}$$

$$= \frac{\sin D \cos I \tan L - \sin I \tan D}{1 + \tan I \sec D \tan L}.$$

And, for the second term,

$$\frac{\cos D'}{(\cos L - l)} = \frac{\sin P M l}{\cos (L - l)} = \frac{\sin I}{\sin l \cos (L - l)}$$

$$= \frac{\sin I}{\sin l \,.\, \cos l \cos L + \sin^2 l \sin L} = \frac{\sin I}{\cos^2 l (\tan l \cos L + \tan^2 l \sin L)}$$

$$= \frac{\sin I (1 + \tan^2 L)}{\tan l \cos L + \tan^2 l \sin L}$$

$$= \left\{\sin I \left(1 + \frac{\tan^2 I}{\cos^2 D}\right)\right\} \div \left\{\frac{\tan I \cos L}{\cos^2 D} + \frac{\tan^2 I}{\cos^3 D} \sin L\right\}$$

$$= \frac{\sin I (\cos^2 D + \tan^2 I)}{\tan I \cos D \cos L + \tan^2 I \sin L} = \frac{\sin I (1 - \sin^2 D + \tan^2 I)}{\tan I \cos D \cos L + \tan I \sin L}$$

$$= \frac{\cos^2 I (\sec^2 I - \sin^2 D)}{\cos I \cos D \cos L + \sin I \sin L} = \frac{1 - \cos^2 I \sin^2 D}{\cos L \cos I \cos D + \sin I \sin L}.$$

The last values of $\sin D' \tan (L - l)$ and of $\frac{\cos D'}{\cos (L - l)}$ being substituted for them in equation 5, it becomes

$$\cot M b = \frac{\sin D \cos I \tan L - \sin I \tan D}{1 + \tan I \sec D \tan L} + \frac{1 - \cos^2 I \sin^2 D}{\cos L \cos I \cos D + \sin I \sin L} \cot P \ldots\ldots (6)$$

This is the general expression for the inclination of the hour line to the meridian; the first term is constant; the second has a constant coefficient to the variable quantity cot P, which undergoing all its changes of magnitude in 90°, or six hours, the tracing of these on the Dial will serve for tracing the rest.

For the horary angle of the substyle, we have

$$\tan M S = \cos P M S \tan P M = \sin D' \cos (L - l),$$ which, on comparison with the value of $\sin D' \cot (L - l)$ above obtained, evidently reduces to

$$\tan M S = \frac{\sin D \cos I \cos L + \sin I \tan D}{1 - \tan I \sec D \cot L} \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (7)$$

For thus, since $\cos D \cos (L - l) = \sin P M S \sin P M = \frac{\sin I}{\sin l} (\cos L \cos l + \sin L \sin l) = \sin I (\cos L \cot l + \sin L)$, the equation (4) becomes

$$\sin E = I (\sin L + \cos L \cos D \cot I)$$

$$= \sin I \sin L + \cos I \cos D \cos L \ldots\ldots (8)$$

From these theorems 6, 7, 8, the whole of Dialling on planes may be deduced. Thus, let $I = 0$; or, which is the same, let the plane be erect, then from equation 6,

$$\cot M b = \tan L \sin D + \frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot P \ldots\ldots\ldots (9)$$

According to this equation, (7) becomes

$$\tan M S = \cot L \sin D = \cot S \ldots\ldots\ldots (10)$$

By which the angle between the substyle and horizon is determined, and equation (8) becomes

$$\sin E = \cos L \cos D \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (11)$$

We have also, when M and Z coincide,

$$\cot Z P S = \sin L \cot D \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (12)$$

Thus we obtain the horary angle of the substyle.

If D as well as I become equal to zero, then

$$\cot M b = \frac{\cot P}{\cos L} = \cot P \sec L.$$

Consequently

$$\frac{1}{\cot M b} = \frac{1}{\cot P \sec L};$$ or

$$\tan M b = \tan P \cos L. \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (13)$$

DIAL-LING.

On this last hypothesis also we have

$$\sin P = \cos L \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (14) \quad \cot S = 0 \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (15)$$

DIAL-LING.

The three last formulas evidently serve for erect, direct, south, or north Dials, in which equation (15) shows that the substyle is perpendicular to the horizon.

If while $I = 0$, $D = 90°$, then equation (10) becomes $\cot S = \cot L \ldots\ldots\ldots (16)$ and equation (11) gives $\sin E = 0 \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (17)$

This is the case with erect, direct, east, or west Dials, by which it appears that the substyle is parallel to the plane, and the substyle inclined to the horizon at an angle equal to the latitude.

Here, since the style is parallel to the plane, the Dial has no centre; all the hour lines therefore are parallel to the substylar line, which is the hour line of six o'clock; the respective distances of the hour lines from the substylar line are measured by $a \cot P$, on a perpendicular to the 6 o'clock hour line, or by $\frac{a \cot P}{\cos L}$, on a vertical line. This gives an infinite distance between the 6 o'clock and the 12 o'clock hour lines, as there obviously ought to be, because at noon the solar rays will be perpendicular to the plane of the Dial.

If when $D = 0$, $I = 90°$, equations 6 and 8 become $$\cot M\, b = \frac{\cot P}{\sin L}, \text{ whence } \frac{1}{\cot M\, b} = \frac{\sin L}{\cot P},$$ or $$\tan M\, b = \sin L \tan P \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (18)$$ and $$\sin E = \sin L \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (19)$$

These theorems obviously apply to the horizontal Dial.

If, according to the last assumption, L becomes $= 90°$, we shall have $$\tan M\, b = \tan P \ldots\ldots \sin E = \text{radius}.$$

This would apply to a horizontal Dial at the poles, or a Dial in any latitude with its plane parallel to the equator. Here the formulas show that the style would become a pin placed perpendicularly to the centre of the Dial, round which the hour lines would be radii, drawn from the foot of the style to make angles of 15°, 30°, 45°, &c. with the meridian, or hour line of 12 o'clock.

We have been indebted for the popular illustration given in the first part of this article to Ferguson's Lectures, and Ozanam's Recreations; and for the general analytical investigations, to the valuable little Treatise on Trigonometry by Dr. Gregory, from which work also the following graphical constructions have been borrowed.

To construct a horizontal Dial for any proposed latitude.

This, after the polar Dial, is the most simple to construct; it is also the most useful, because if it be posited where the sun's rays meet with no obstruction, that luminary will shine upon it from his rising to his setting. The theorems from which this construction is to be deduced, are

$$\tan M\, b = \sin L \tan P, \text{ and } \sin E = \sin L.$$

Here M b is the measure of the angle H between the 12 o'clock and any other hour line on the Dial, and P the hour angle from the meridian; as it varies at the poles of the heavens, the latter therefore varies uniformly, while the former only varies uniformly in certain limited cases: as, for example, in the horizontal Dial, in latitude 90°. In any other latitude, making the terms of the equation homogeneous, we have $\sin 90 \tan H = \sin L \tan P$. Hence, if two radii be assumed in the ratio of rad or sin 90° to sin L, tan H as referred to the former radius will always be equal to tan P referred to the latter. From this consideration, the following construction is deduced:

On the proposed plane assume the right line 12 H S, for the meridian or 12 o'clock hour line, (fig. 4,) parallel to which draw the line 12 h s, at a distance equal to the proposed thickness of the style. Perpendicularly to these draw 6 H 6 for the east and west line of the Dial, or the 6 o'clock hour line. Make the angle 12 H F = the latitude of the place, and from 12 let fall the perpendicular 12 F upon H F. Make 12 P upon H 12 prolonged, equal to 12 F. From P draw lines P 1, P 2, P 3, &c. (to terminate in the line 12 5, perpendicular to 12 H,) and to make angles 12 P 1, 12 P 2, 12 P 3, &c. equal to 15°, 30°, 45°, &c. Then from the centre H draw H 1, H 2, H 3, H 4, H 5, for the hour lines of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in the afternoon. Take, on the other side of the substylar line 12—11, 12—10, 12—9, &c. respectively equal to 12—1, 12—2, 12—3, &c. and from 4 draw the lines h 7, h 8, h 9, &c. Produce the lines 4 H, 5 H, for the lines of 4 and 5 in the morning; and produce the lines 7 h, 8 h, for the hour lines of 7 and 8 o'clock in the afternoon.

The truth of this construction is manifest from the remarks which precede it. For 12 P = 12 F is evidently the sine of the latitude to the radius H 12. And while 12—1, 12—2, 12—3, &c. are the tangents of 15°, 30°, 45°, &c. respectively, to the radius P 12; the same lines are tangents to the angles 12 H 1, 12 H 2, 12 H 3, &c. Consequently, while the former are hour angles at the pole, the latter are the corresponding hour angles at the centre of the Dial.

The quarter and half hour lines are drawn by setting off angles of 3° 45′, 7° 30′, 11° 25′, &c. from the meridian line; but they are omitted in the figure, to prevent confusion. The angle 12 H F is also equal to the elevation of the style for E = L.

As to the gnomon, it should be a metallic triangle of the thickness H h, and having one angle = L, the latitude. It must be fixed perpendicularly to the plane, on the space left for it in the figure from h H towards 12, and having its angle L at h H, then will the style of the Dial be parallel to the earth's axis.

To describe an erect direct south Dial, for any proposed north latitude; or an erect direct north Dial, for any proposed south latitude.

Here the formulas are those numbered 13, 14, and 15, of which the two first are

$$\tan M\,b = \cos L \tan P, \text{ and } \sin E = \cos L.$$

Substituting H for M b in the former of these, and making the terms homogeneous, we have

$$\sin 90° \tan H = \cos L \tan P.$$

This equation is similar to the equation of the hour angles in the horizontal Dial; and the construction will therefore be similar, except that cos L is here to be employed instead of sin L.

On the proposed plane draw the right line 6 H 6 (fig. 5,) for the east and west line of the Dial, or the hour line of 6. In the middle of this line set h H, equal to the proposed thickness of the gnomon, and through h H draw lines perpendicular to 6 H 6, to terminate in the line 10—5 parallel to 6 H 6, at a convenient distance. Draw H F to make the angle 12 H F equal to the latitude of the place for which the Dial is made, and let fall upon H F the perpendicular 12 F. Make 12 p = H F, the cosine of the angle 12 H F to radius H 12; draw from p lines p 1, p 2, &c. to make angles of 15°, 30°, &c. with p 12; draw lines from H to meet these in the line 10—5; set off corresponding lines on the left side of the Dial, and the construction is completed. The demonstration is the same as in the last problem. The angle made between the style and substyle is here equal to the complement of the latitude. When the Dial is placed vertically to face the proper cardinal point, the line 6 H 6 will be horizontal, and the style sloping downwards from H, at an angle = 90° − L, will again be parallel to the earth's axis, as it ought to be.

Note. An erect north Dial for a place in north latitude is constructed in exactly the same manner as an erect south Dial, but the position of the Dial must be reversed. In the case of the north for north latitude the line 6 H 6, instead of being the top, will become the bottom of the Dial.

The same may be observed in reference to an erect south Dial for a south latitude.

To describe an erect direct east Dial, for any proposed north latitude; or an erect direct west Dial for any south latitude.

It appears from what has been said, that the substyle in this Dial will make an angle with the horizon equal to the latitude: that the hour lines will be all parallel to the substyle, and at the distances indicated by a cot P; a being the height of the gnomon, and P the hour angle from the meridian at the pole of the sphere.

Let A B (fig. 6,) be assumed as the horizontal line on the proposed Dial. From the angle B draw B D to make an angle A B D = the complement of the latitude; and about the middle, H, of that line draw perpendicularly to it the line 6 H 6 for the 6 o'clock hour line; this will also be the substylar line, and will evidently make with the horizon an angle B 6 H = the latitude of the place. Assume any point, as that marked 11, for the point where the 11 o'clock hour line is to intersect the line B H; and draw 11 P to make the angle H 11 P = 15°; so shall P H be the height of the gnomon. Set off angles H P 7, H P 8, H P 9, &c. respectively equal to 15°, 30°, 45°, &c.; and through the points where the lines P 7, P 8, &c. intersect the line B D, draw lines parallel to P H. Also set off from H towards D, H 5 = H 7, H 4 = H 8, &c.; and through the points 5, 4, 3, &c. draw other lines parallel to P H, these shall be the hour lines required.

The truth of the construction is evident from what has preceded.

A rectangular gnomon of altitude = P H being set up perpendicularly to the plane of the Dial, will, when the Dial itself is posited vertically to face the east, have its upper edge parallel to the earth's axis, it being supposed that the upper edge of the gnomon is reduced to a mere line; and if it have any measurable thickness, allowance must be made for it in the construction, as in the preceding cases.

An erect direct west Dial for any north latitude, or an east Dial for a south Dial may be constructed in exactly the same manner, except that instead of beginning the construction from the right hand B of the plane, the operation must commence at the left hand A, and that the figures expressing the hours 1, 2, 3, &c. in the afternoon be placed between A and the hour line of C.

To describe an erect south Dial, for any proposed north latitude, to have a given declination from the west; or an erect north Dial for any south latitude, to decline from the east.

The formulas in the general problem which are applicable to the present case are (9), (10), (11); viz.

$$\text{cot M } b, \text{ or cot H} = \tan L \sin D + \frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot P$$ for the determination of the hour lines;

DIAL-LING.

$$\cot S = \cot L \sin D$$ for the angle between the substyle and the horizon;

and

$$\sin E = \cos L \cos D$$

for the elevation of the style.

From these, and a table of natural sines, tangents, &c. the hour lines may be easily drawn, as follows:

Let A B E D (fig. 7,) be the plane on which the Dial is to be constructed. Assume H for the centre of the hour lines, and the vertical line M H for the meridian, or 12 o'clock hour line. Now, since the only variable quantity in the preceding expression for cot H, is cot P, the cotangent of the corresponding hour angle at the pole, we may, by taking that equal to 0, get a fixed hour line, to which all the others may be referred; thus the expression when the hour angle at the pole = 90°, or 6 × 15°, becomes an equation by which the position of the 6 o'clock hour line may be determined. For if H m be taken between H and A equal to the unit of any measure, as an inch, a foot, &c. we shall have

$$\cot M H 6 = \tan A H 6 = \tan L \sin D,$$

$$m n = \tan L \sin D.$$

The product being at once determinable in the same measure by means of a table of sines and tangents, through H and n draw a line both ways to meet A D and the prolongation of E B, then that portion of this right line which faces on the left hand side of the plane, will be the hour line of 6 in the morning, while the other portion to the right of H, and above the plane, would be the hour line of 6 in the evening; that, however, is useless in this Dial.

To ascertain the position of the other hour lines, we have only to estimate the remaining term of the equation, by the several corresponding values of cos P for the different hours from 12 or 6, and set those values from n to n' to n'' to n''', &c. on the line $m\ n\ n'\ n''\ n'''$, &c. perpendicular to A B. These values are successively

$$\frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot 75° = \cos D \sec L \tan 15°;$$

$$\frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot 60° = \cos D \sec L \tan 30°;$$

$$\frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot 45° = \cos D \sec L \tan 45° = \cos D \sec L,$$

$$\frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot 30° = \cos D \sec L \tan 60°;$$

$$\frac{\cos D}{\cos L} \cot 15° = \cos D \sec L \tan 75°.$$

These being computed and set off, the several right lines H n' 7, H n'' 8, H n'''9, &c. drawn from H through the points $n'\ n''\ n'''$, &c. will be the morning hour lines required. The afternoon hour lines may be computed and set off by the same formulas. Indeed, taking the other vertical lines $m\ n'\ n''\ n'''$, &c. between H and B (H m = H m) the several values $m\ n$, $n\ n'$, $n'\ n''$, &c. will be numerically the same, because the corresponding values of cos P are so, the only change being in sign from + to − on account of passing the meridian. Hence since the values of $n\ n'$, $n'\ n''$, $n''\ n'''$, &c. on the two parallel vertical lines are respectively equal, lines joining their extremities will form a series of parallelograms; and hence, the morning hour lines being drawn, the evening hour lines, equally distant from 6 o'clock, may be determined by drawing $n'\ n'$, $n''\ n''$, $n'''\ n'''$, &c. parallel to 6 H 6; and then drawing $n'\ n''$ n''', to the right, the lines H n' 5, H n'' 4, H n''' 3, &c. Thus it appears that in all plane dials one-half of the dial being traced, determines the other by the several distances from the hour line of 6, measured on two verticals equidistant from the meridian. Thus these distances are equal between the lines from 6 to 7 in the morning, and from 5 to 6 in the evening.

6 to 8 in the morning, and from 4 to 6 in the evening.

The position of the substyle, in this instance, between H M and H A, is determined by the preceding equation for cot S, and the elevation of the style by the theorem for sin E.

To construct a Dial independent of computation.

Dials of the kind last described, as well as horizontal Dials, may be graphically constructed, as below:

On the proposed plane, A B C D (fig. 8,) assume H for the centre from which the hour lines shall diverge, and draw the vertical line H M for the hour line of 12. Produce H M to G, so that H A shall be to A G in the ratio of radius to sin D, draw G 6 to make angle A G 6 = L the latitude of the place, and join H 6, which will be the 6 o'clock hour line. From H draw H E parallel to G 6 to meet the line O E parallel to A B in E. From O, the intersection of O E and H M, draw O F to make the angle E O F = complement of the given declination. Make O F = O E, draw F S perpendicular to O E, make O S = O S′, and join H S, which will be the substylar line. Perpendicular to H S draw the right line 5 H 1, intersecting the meridian in 12, and the 6 o'clock hour line in 6. On 6, 12 as a diameter describe a semicircle to cut H S produced in P; with the centre P and radius P S describe a semicircle, which divide into arcs of 15° each, both ways from the line P 6; or which amounts to the same, set off angles 6 P 7, 7 P 8, 8 P 9, &c. each = 15°. Through the points 6, 7, 8, &c. where the lines bounding these angles cut the line 5 S 1, draw from H the lines H 44, H 55, H 66, &c. and they will be the hour lines required.

For, first, since the expression for the 6 o'clock hour line, when the terms are rendered homogeneous, is

$$\sin 90° \tan A H 6 = \sin D \tan L.$$

We shall have tan L to the radius sin D, = tan A H 6 to radius or sin 90°, which is obviously the case with regard to the triangles G H 6, H A 6. Consequently the 6 o'clock hour line is rightly determined. Again, since E H is parallel to 6 G, the angle O E H is equal to the latitude, and E H O to the colatitude; therefore O E = O F is the cotangent of the latitude to the radius O H; and since E O F is equal to the codeclination, O S = O S is the sine of the declination, to the radius O F = O E or O S = O S = sin D cot L. But O S = tan O H S = cot S (substylar angle with the horizon) to radius H O; therefore cot S = sin D cot L as it ought to be, and the substyle is rightly determined; but the substylar line is evidently a portion of the right line between the centre of the Dial and the apparent pole; therefore the apparent pole P lies in the prolongation of H S. At the apparent pole P, also the horary angle between 6 o'clock and 12, is 6 × 15° or a right angle, and the angle in a semicircle is a right angle; therefore the semicircle described upon 6 S 12 as a diameter, will intersect the prolongation of H S in P, the apparent pole, and the truth of the remainder of the construction is manifest.

DIAL-LING. DIALECT.

DIALECT.

DI'ALECT, DIALE'CTICAL, DIALE'CTICALLY, DIALE'CTICK, n. DIALE'CTICK, adj. DIALECTI'CIAN. } Fr. dialecte; It. dialetto; Sp. dialecto; Lat. dialectus; Gr. διάλεκτ-ος, from διὰ λέγ-ειν, to discourse; (διὰ, and λέγ-ειν, to say.)

Applied more generally, to any peculiar style or manner of expression, speech or language.

Dialectician, one skilled in speaking; able to speak, to reason; skilled in Logick.

> Though to the Tuscans I the smoothness grant,
> Our dialect no majesty doth want,
> To set thy praises in as high a key,
> As France, or Spain, or Germany, or they.
> Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles.
>
> ——— Then all those
> Who in the dark our fury did escape,
> Returning, know our borrow'd arms and shape,
> And different dialect.
> Denham. Essay on Virgil's Æneis.

For the dialectiques borrow, as it were, from all other sciences, the principles of sciences; again adore the prime notions of the mind; lastly rest satisfied with the immediate informations of sense rightly disposited.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats. Preface.

And we all know the common dialect, in which the great masters of this art used to pray for the King, and which may justly pass for only a cleanlier and more refined kind of libelling him in the Lord: as that God will turn his heart, and open his eyes.
South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 118.

For I, and no doubt you, have long observed, that those dialectical subtleties, that the schoolmen too often employ about physiological mysteries, are wont much more to declare the wit of him that uses them, than increase the knowledge or remove the doubts of sober lovers of truth.
Boyle. Physiological Considerations, vol. i. p. 468.

The words being in Acts, xxiv. 25, διαλεγομένου δὲ αὐτοῦ, and according to the natural force and import of them, signifying, that he discoursed, or reasoned dialectically.
South. Sermons, vol. iv. p. 51.

For the Irish, the Welsh, and the Erse, are no other than different dialects of the same tongue, the ancient Celtic.
Blair. Lecture 9. vol. i.

How could these disputes or any other be determined among men, whose pleasure and whose pride it was to dispute perpetually, and who cultivated an art that was of use to no man in the discernment of truth, but might help the subtile dialectician to oppose even the man he could not refute?
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. vii. p. 265. ess. 4. Authority in Matters of Religion, sec. 41.

A jargon of words that seemed to explain without explaining, and the rules of a dialectick, that seem'd to prove and that did prove indifferently either in favour of truth, or of errour, took up the whole attention of philosophers, and rendered it impossible for them to make any advances in learning and knowledge.
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. vi. p. 153. Essay 2. Human Reason, sec. 11.

At the same time another and far bolder sect of teachers arose, who presumed to interpret the sacred doctrines by logical terms and distinctions, and to reduce them to the rules of dialectic art.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii. p. 329.

But aware as I am, in common with the great poetical dialectician, (Dryden,) and, indeed, with every novice in the art of logic, that "fallacies often live in universals," I cannot accede to Mr. Burke's observation. Parr. A Sequel to the Printed Paper.

The origin of various DIALECTS in the language of the same country may be traced to the wide difference of pronunciation, which must necessarily have taken place while in their infancy they were merely oral. These sounds were afterwards reduced to writing, as each individual caught them by his ear, and different combinations of letters were thus given to represent the same word.

Greek Dialect.

The Dialects in the Greek language appear to have differed materially in one respect from that of modern tongues. With us, particular districts of a Country may have particular expressions and varieties of pronunciation; nevertheless there remains for the most part one general orthography. With the Greeks, the different forms of words, inflexions, single words and single letters were expressed in writing as well as in speaking. The four principal Dialects were the Æolic, Doric, Ionic, and Attic. Of these, the Doric may be considered as originally a branch of the Æolic, and the Attic of the Ionic, and each of these had many local subdivisions.

Æolic.

The Æolic prevailed in Græcia Propria, excepting Megara, Attica, and Doris; in the Æolic colonies of Asia Minor; and in some of the northern islands of the Ægean. It is chiefly distinguished from the Doric by the breathing before words beginning with a vowel called the Digamma, (F.) It retained very numerous traces of ancient Greek, and has more affinity with the Latin than the other Dialects. Alcæus is reputed the model of it.

Doric.

The Doric was used in Peloponnesus, in Doris, in Messenia, and in the Doric colonies of Italy, Sicily, and Asia Minor. It is hard, rough, and broad. Grammarians have divided it into old and new. The DIALECT. ancient Comic Poets employed the first. In the second, the chief writer is Theocritus. Pindar, Stersichorus, Simonides, and Bacchylides used a modification of it; and it is found in the remains of decrees, treaties and inscriptions.

Ionic. The Ionic was adopted by the Ionian colonies of Asia Minor and the Archipelago, and, like the Doric, was old and new. In the former wrote Hesiod and Homer; though Homer, indeed, occasionally employs each of the other Dialects. Anacreon, Herodotus, and Hippocrates are the great cultivators of the new Ionic.

Attic. The Attic, in its first stage, was scarcely different from the Ionic, for the Ionians inhabited Attica. In this form Solon wrote his laws. The middle Attic departed from the Ionic by preferring contractions to resolutions, and adopting aspirations. Thucydides and the Tragedians (except in their Chorusses, which adopt Doric forms, because the chief lyrical Poets had written in Doric,) are its type. The new Attic, which adopted softer forms dates from Demosthenes and Æschines. (Matthiæ's Grammar, sec. 1—8; Mitford's History of Greece, ch. iii. sec. 1.)

The various languages now spoken in Europe, may be considered as so many Dialects, because they are related to each other and derived from common Ancestors, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Slavonian, and Celtic. Those of Asia, in like manner, may be reduced to a few leading families.

France. The Dialects of France are almost as numerous as her Provinces, even though the Bas-Breton and Basque, which are of Celtic and Iberian, and not of Roman origin, be left out of the list. If we inquire into the origin of these various forms of speech, we shall find that before the XIIIth century the corrupt Latin spoken in Gaul was divided into two distinct branches; the lingua occitana, (langue d'oc,) and lingua oitana (langue d'oi.) The Southern Provinces on the Mediterranean, having the closest intercourse with Italy, were therefore the most civilized; and their language, the lingua occitana, was cultivated and improved by the Troubadours, who celebrated the valour, courtesy, and hospitality of their feudal chiefs in lays which have, even now, more than a mere historical interest, and were the harbingers of those exquisite productions, by which the Poetry of France, Italy, and Spain has been placed almost on a level with that of ancient Rome, even in the Augustan Age. The Kingdom of Arles, which extended the bounds of the Roman Province, (Provincia Romana,) gave the name of Provincial, (Provençal,) to the language of all the South, comprehending the Dialects peculiar to Languedoc, Gascony, and Catalonia, all nearly allied to each other.

Langues d'Oc et d'Oi.

About the same period, Scholastic Theology exercised the skill of the Divines, while the Minstrels awakened the dormant talents of the Laity in the northern half of France; and the restoration of the Royal power adding a new brilliance to the Court, made it a centre from which knowledge and civilisation was diffused through every part of the Kingdom. Thence arose the improvement and completion of the langue d'oi, of which the celebrated Sermon of St. Bernard, and the Tales of the Norman Minstrels are early monuments. The removal of the Court of Barcelona into Arragon, in 1137, the extinction of that of Thoulouse, and the transfer of the Counts of Provence Naples, in 1265, by depriving the Southern States ıe luxuries and refinements of a Court, gave a check to the progress of Arts and Letters, and threw back the language into the local and provincial Dialects, from which it had been formed by the assemblage of wits and nobles at the tilts and tournaments which those Courts vied with each other in celebrating. Thus, as the northern Dialect advanced, the southern declined, and before the commencement of the XVth century the Langue d'oi had completely supplanted its rival in the south.

This slight sketch of the steps by which these two daughters of the Latin tongue were domesticated in France, will serve as a clue to many peculiarities in the existing Dialects, and point out the order in which they may be conveniently arranged.

Langue- doc. In Languedoc alone there are seven or eight distinct Dialects. At Nismes a very soft and harmonious patois prevails; it differs sensibly from those of Montpellier and Narbonne; more from those of the upper and lower Cévennes and Velay, or the Bishopric of Puy; and most of all from that of Thoulouse. In Roussillon the language is almost identical with the Catalan, while the Gascons use nearly the same Dialect as their neighbours at Thoulouse. All approximate to the Spanish and Italian especially to the former, as the guttural pronunciation of the letter j, and the substitution of b for v, so common at Bourdeaux, sufficiently prove. In the Mountains of Béarn, the Gascon is mixed with the more western patois in Rouergue; the Limosin and Pingord, other branches of the southern language, are still extant. The Loire for the most part may be considered as the boundary between the Langue d'oc and the Langue d'oui; but a Dialect of the latter is spoken in Poitou, perhaps from its intercourse with the Guienne, with which it was for several years united. In the Maine, especially the Lower Maine, there is a peculiar patois, called the Manceau, strongly resembling the Angevin, or Dialect of Anjou, current at Angers. The style grivois of the market-places (Halles) at Paris, is exactly on a par with our cockney; and consists more in a habit of entirely dropping the e mute, and the liquid l, with a disagreeable bur in the throat, than any peculiarity of terms or phrases. The old Norman is preserved not only in the French, but in our own Laws, but may still be traced in the patois of the Province; that of Picardy, however, is one of the most remarkable, approximating, as might be supposed, to the Flemish, or rather to the Walloon spoken in French Flanders. In Lorraine, the Messin near Metz, the Vosgien in the Vosges, and the Lorrain or proper patois of Lorraine, used about Luneville, are sufficiently distinct from each other, and from that spoken in the little Comté du Ban de la Roche in Alsace. The Bourgignon, spoken in Burgundy, is another distinct patois, and the Pays de Vaud, also called Pays Romand, the extreme point to which the French language extends eastwards, has its peculiar Dialect split into no less than five subdivisions. 1. Geneva the patois of Geneva itself; 2. the Monts d'Aigle and La Valais; 3. the Canton of Fribourg; 4. Neufchâtel; and 5. the Bishopric of Basil. The Savoyards speak a Dialect approaching a little to the Italian, and on the borders of Dauphiné a kind of Románsh.

Passing on from La Valais to the Grisons (Grau- Grisons bünden, Grey-leagues) we come to the point where the French, Italian, and German meet; for the Ro- Roman mansche (or Romanish) has a better claim to be considered as a Dialect of the French than of the Italian. It is spoken by more than half of the Grisons, and is subdivided into two branches; the Rumonsche, spoken near the sources of the Rhine, and the Ladinsche near those of the Inn. This language is supposed to approach nearer to the Romana Rustica than any other of the derivatives from the Latin now extant. These poor, but brave, hardy and honest Mountaineers seem to have preserved their language as well as their liberties and their faith uninjured; while their neighbours on all sides, the victims of continual revolutions, and a prey to foreign invaders, bear in their speech as well as habits, manners, and physiognomy, the traces of the various nations by whom they have been subdued.

ALECT.

ly.

In Italy, into which the southern mountains of the Grisons descend, it is difficult to determine what the cient ancient Dialects were. The Illyrians, Iberians, Celts, abitants

Pelasgi, and Etruscans, at different periods, overran the whole, or a part of this peninsula; so that for many ages, languages radically different were spoken in different parts of it. The Latin, which by degrees supplanted them all, was at first confined to too narrow a space to have any variety of Dialects; but the rapidity with which it was improved, after the study of the Greek became fashionable, rendered it impossible for the idiom of the people to keep pace with that of the learned;

bana and

and the Lingua Urbana and Rustica soon became two stica.

distinct Dialects, the latter of which retained much of the asperity and rudeness of the ancient language. Under the Emperors, the language, as well as every other branch of learning, rapidly declined; the difference between the style of the Plebeians and Patricians disappeared by degrees; and even before the Empire was overrun by the hordes of the North, the grossest barbarisms had been universally adopted. This corruption, together with the intermixture of words and phrases introduced by the Invaders, gave birth to the different Dialects prevalent in modern scan.

Italy. The Tuscan was the first cultivated after the revival of letters, and is still the standard of pure Italian, though its pronunciation is marked by a peculiarity highly offensive to the delicate ear of the Romans; that is, the substituting a strong aspiration for c, before a, o, or u, and saying havallo, haldo, hosa, for cavallo, caldo and cosa. In most other respects the Tuscans excel in pronouncing as well as in speaking their language, having a full and sonorous utterance, without the drawl of the Neapolitans, or the song of the Milanese and Venetians. Even the peasants speak correctly; so that the well known proverb, Lingua Toscana in bocca Romana, is nothing more than the strict truth. The Tuscan Dialect abounds in words and phrases peculiar to itself, as any one who has taken up the Malmantile Racquistato of Lippi man.

must have immediately perceived. The Romans are not so correct in their language as in their pronunciation: the common people say annanno for andando; agliuto for ajuto, corpa for colpa, corzo for corso; adding ne to monosyllables, saying giane for gia; omitting the final re of the infinitive; putting amà for amare; and transposing letters, as crapa for capra; having apolitan.

likewise many cant words and expressions. The Neapolitans, when they are compelled to speak, (for the Lazzaroni will twist themselves into a thousand attitudes rather than be at the trouble of speaking,) use one of the most peculiar and corrupt of the Italian Dialects. The long vowels are drawled out to a prodigious length; spírito becomes spíreto; crédimi, crídemi; dolore, dolure; corno and fratello, cuorno and fratiello; noi, noje: single consonants are doubled; f is changed into sc, and p into ch; fiamma becomes sciamma, and piano, chiano; b is substituted for v; l before d, t, or z, is changed into u; thus caldo becomes caudo; n is put for nd, and r for l. Many of these peculiarities approach closely to the Sicilian; but the Calabrian is precisely the intermediate link between the Dialects of Naples and Palermo. Returning to Florence, and travelling thence northward, a new class of Dialects presents itself in the Bolognese, in which, as Milton would have said, the effect of the cold of the Appenines becomes perceptible. Contractions and omissions are the most prominent features of this family, which allow none but the long and emphatic vowels to be heard; substituting asn for asino; lagrm for lagrime; pr, st, bj, for per, questo, belli or bej, and thus making the first step in the transition from Italian to French. In the country on each side of the Po, between the Adige (Etsch) Bergamasco and Milanese, the Lower Lombardian Dialect is still used. It has much resemblance to the Bolognese, and more to the French; ar is put for ra and ri in such compounds as raccommodare, ritornare; the article becomes al and dal, and vras is used for verace. The Milanese or Upper Lombardian bears many marks of the influence of a German people, in the accumulation of consonants, and omission of final vowels, so indispensible to the southern Italians that they rarely can pronounce the words "a good great-coat," without adding a very short ă at the end of each, and saying, "a gooddă greattă coattă." The French sounds of u, eu, and j, are common in the Milanese; the final n becomes ng, with a strong nasal tone, and lesg, (pronounced as lège in French,) fam, braev, nass, oo dii are substituted for legge, farmi, bravo, nascere, ho detto. There are, of course, shades of difference in the language of every district, but the greatest is found in the country round about the Lakes of Como, Lugano, and Bérgamo. In the Bergamasco, especially, we have tat, quac, aidem, for tanto, qualche and ajutatemi; z and s are put for c and g; g for t, and j for gli; gia and pace thus become za and pas; letto, legg; quanto, quang; travaglio, travajo; noi, nou; amore, amour. The Venetian, which is spread over the eastern part of the Mediterranean by the sailors from the Adriatic, and by the ancient commercial activity of Venice, may perhaps be "soft, pleasing, and prepossessing," (Adelung, Mithr. ii. 508,) when spoken by women of the higher classes, but is most harsh and disagreeable as uttered by men of the middle and lower orders. It abounds in strong final nasals, and the sounds of gh and sc. Non ghe 'l detto, (non ci l' 'ho detto,) and Sior, (pronounced Shòr,) for Signor, are constantly in the mouth of every Veneziang. C, ch, and z, are pronounced as in English, and the latter is generally substituted for g; Zanni, zornada, cognosse, amigo, are used for Gianni, giornata, cognosce, amico, while the ch corresponds with the Russian cherv in the Slavonian and Ragusian names, as Boscovich, Pavlovich, &c. X, (pronounced lik z,) is substituted for c; xe (pronounced zè) being used for c'è; double consonants are made single, and the preceding vowel is lengthened. In Padua the Venetian is mixed with the Lower Lombardian, and forms a patois very unintelligible to foreigners; and

DIALECT.

Sicilian.

Bolognese.

Lower Lombardian.

Milanese.

Bergamasco.

Venetian.

Paduan or Padovano.

DIALECT. in Friuli, the Forlano, which is almost a Dialect of the Románsh, brings us back to the Grisons. Piedmont, as it lies between France and Italy, has a Dialect still nearer to the French than that of any other Italian States; nuove here becomes neuve, and occhj, euä; the eu and u, having the same sounds as are given to them in France. Amare is amé; affezione, affession; andate, andaite; stato, stait. On the coast of Piedmont, the Genoese territory presents a collection of Dialects, differing little from each other but much from pure Italian. Like the Piedmontese, it approaches nearly to the French. Pace and ragione are changed into Paxe and raxon, pronounced pázhe and rajong; the x and n having the sounds of j and n in French, ç (i. e. s) is substituted for z; æ, equivalent to the French è, is put for à, gg for gl, r for l; thus we have dro, dra, for dello, della. It delights in curtailing, and says ce for cielo, scuo for scudo, toa for tavola. About Nice and Monaco, a mixture of the Genoese, Piedmontese, and Provençal prevails. The Italian islands have all peculiar Dialects. The Sicilian, already mentioned, besides possessing many peculiar words, substitutes dd for ll, and says beddu for bello. Sardinia has its northern and southern Dialects; of which the latter mixes Spanish and Latin with the Sicilian. Tempus, tres, and other Latin words are preserved unaltered; and the present tense of amairi, "to love," is amu, amas, amat, amaus, amais, amanta. Su liburu is used for il libro, and is paraulis for le parole. The Dialect of Corsica is said to approach nearer to the Tuscan than any other; but this probably relates to the language of the higher ranks; on the patois of the Mountaineers, scarcely any observations have been made.

Forlano. Piedmontese. Genoese. Nice. Sicilian. Sardinian. Corsican.

In Spain the Catalan, or Limosin, which differs considerably from the pure Castilian, is a Dialect of the Provençal, as was before observed, and its legitimate children are the tongues spoken in the Balearic Isles; though they have vowels peculiar to themselves. In Valencia another derivative of this widely extended Dialect is spoken, which bears a striking resemblance to the French; but there the Castilian is more universally understood and used, than in Catalonia.

Spain. Catalan. Minorquine. Valencian.

The Arragonian is a mixture of Castilian and Catalan; the former of which has been considered as the purest Spanish Dialect, ever since the union of the crowns of Castile and Arragon. In the north-western provinces, the Gallician combines the peculiarities of the Castilian and the Portuguese. Andalusia, which is separated by a mountain barrier from Castile, has many peculiarities in the speech of its peasantry; d between two vowels, and s before t are omitted; so that Medina Sidonia is called Meïna Sionia, while età, catello, and aqueta, are said instead of està, castello, aquesta. The z is generally lisped, and the people call themselves Andaluthes instead of Andaluzes. This practice seems to have been more general formerly than now, as it is almost uniformly followed by the Peruvians and other South Americans; and is mentioned by Minshew, who wrote in the time of Elizabeth, as the proper way of pronouncing z; he also teaches his scholars to lisp the final d, and say Madridh, Ustedh, &c. for Madrid and Usted. The Castilian, and all the Spanish Dialects, are distinguished by a tendency to liquidate the vowels and some of the consonants, by subjoining to them a very short i or u; thus e in Latin words is changed into ie, and o into ue, cl and pl into ll (=ly;) c, p, and t, into g, b, and d; li into j; f into h; x, j, and g, before e or i are a guttural or strong aspiration, equivalent to the Scotch, German, and Greek ch, and commonly expressed by kh or hh; ll, ñ, for nn, are the liquid l and n, as in million, and onion; thus from ferrum, cornu, clamare, plenus, miraculum, aprire, Petrus, we have hierro, cuerno, llamár, lleno, milagro, abrir, Piedro; mulier is changed into mujér, and filius into hijo. Badajòz, Xérez, and Cartagena are pronounced nearly as Badahhós, Hhéres, and Cartahena; and llano, (planus,) and España (Hispania) have the sound of liano and Espanïa. In the Province of Biscay, and a small portion of France, the old Iberian tongue is still vernacular. This language is divided according to M. de Humboldt (Adelung, Mithr. iv. 280) into three distinct dialects; 1. the Basque, spoken in the Terre de Labour; 2. the Guipuzcoan, used in Guipuzcoa and Alava; and 3. the Vizcayan, current in Vizcaya, (Biscay.) A difference of pronunciation and orthography, some variations in the verbal inflexions, and a few words almost exclusively belonging to each, are the peculiarities by which these Dialects are distinguished from each other. Aspirations which are common in the first scarcely ever occur in the two last. Ch in the first is pronounced as in French (sh,) but in the two others, as in Spanish and English; ç is used for z in the Basque, because the French rather than the Spanish system of orthography has been adopted on this side of the Pyrenees. In compound terms the Vizcayan changes the final e and a into i, o into u, and adds j and b after i and u. The Terre de Labour and Soule connect Navarre with Gascony, and account for the peculiarities in the Gascon Dialects already noticed.

Arragonian Castilian. Gallician. Andaluz. Peruvian. Biscay.

The Portuguese might almost be called a Dialect of the Spanish. Southey, in his Letters on Spain and Portugal, has given some examples of short paragraphs which are at the same time both Spanish and Portuguese. The latter, however, has none of the guttural sounds which distinguish the former from all its sister Dialects, but possesses an abundance of strong nasals, (ao, for aon, am, im,) which were perhaps introduced by the French, under Count Henry of Burgundy, successor of Alfonso VI. On comparing it with the Latin and Italian, we find that abbreviation, and the softening of harsh consonants, are its most striking characteristics: thus populo becomes povo, solamente, somente; ch is substituted for pl, chorar signifying plorare; letters are often omitted, as in cheio from pleno; for this language, like all the other derivatives of Latin, constantly retains the ablative or dative instead of the nominative case; ch and x are now sounded like sh, though the former was, only a few years ago, pronounced as in Spanish and English; g and j, as in French, like zh and ou, which was formerly the long o, has now the sound of ôi. The consonants are made liquid by subjoining h, lh, and nh, corresponding with ll, nn in Spanish, and gl, gn, in Italian. The simple vowels have exactly the same sounds as in Spanish, Italian, German and Polish. So mountainous a country, as is the whole of Portugal, can hardly fail to have a variety of Dialects, though scarcely any are mentioned by those who have written upon this language, except that of the Province of Beïra, which differs considerably from the pure Portuguese.

Portugal. Beira.

The various English Dialects have manifestly arisen from the different political circumstances in which the different Provinces were anciently placed. Those in the south and west retain most of the Celtic, from the vicinity of the mountains of Cornwall and Wales, the last retreat of the Britons. The Midland and Eastern Counties bear most traces of the French and Saxon, from their having been most exposed to invasion from France and Germany; while the Northern Dialects retain a large portion of the Scandinavian tongues of the Normans (North-men) of Denmark and Norway, who so frequently made incursions upon the shores of England and Scotland. Each County, indeed, may be said to have its peculiar pronunciation and idioms; but there is a marked difference of accent and phraseology between the Eastern, Western, and Northern Dialects, which is perceptible in the speech even of persons raised above the lowest classes of society. The more level Counties, as most accessible and most favourable to foreign intercourse, are, of course, those in which such peculiarities are least perceptible; the most rugged and mountainous will, by parity of reasoning, be in the opposite extreme; hence the peasants in the Eastern and Midland Counties are easily understood, while The Exmoor Courtship, and The Lancashire Dialogues, are sealed books for all who have not had the advantage of being born in Devon, or on the borders of Cumberland. It must, however, be observed, that much of the obscurity of those tracts arises from the defectiveness of our system of orthography, which, from its irregularity is ill-calculated to convey any just notion of the manner in which a word should be pronounced; so that while a native of the County, who knows what sound is intended to be expressed, will read the dialogue off as the author meant it to be read; a stranger will pronounce every word erroneously, and be as unintelligible to the natives, as the book is to himself, although when the words are properly pronounced, the greater part of them are easily understood. A just and distinct notion of any peculiarity of Dialect can hardly be given merely in writing, so much depends on tone and emphasis, and those finer variations of sound which are only to be communicated orally. All, therefore, that can be expected or afforded, in so cursory a view of the subject as this, is the notice of a few of the most marked characters by which the English Dialects are distinguished from each other.

The speech of the South-eastern Counties, from Huntingdonshire to Kent, for the reasons already assigned above, differs less from the standard English than that of districts more remote from the Capital; but London is not without its distinctive peculiarities; every child knows the civic adage, that "weal and winegar is wery good wittels I wow;" and when one Cit asks another, "Oo vas that there voman vith vitch you vas a tying (toying) in Mr. Vilson's vindow von day last veek," he, in a single short sentence, exemplifies the most striking characteristics of the genuine Cockney. This agreeable interchange of v and w is not however the exclusive property of the Londoners, it is almost universally spread over the neighbourhood. Many a Kentish Clerk gives out "Lewiathan, whom there to sport;" while few are the Coroners of the same County who have not charged the Jury sitting on a felo de se, to order the corpse to be interred in the nearest three-went way. In common with the Londoners, the neighbouring country people affirm, that "they have no right to take a drop more than they please;" that "directly they come home from their work they 'll go to the Publican's," and, that "black is a very different colour to white." In Norfolk and Suffolk, Cambridge and Huntingdonshire the French u is heard in "sure, cure, poor," and many other words; while in the former, "he come, he go, he tell," are said for he comes, he goes, he tells; and in the latter, "meece" for "mice" is one of the many instances in which the lower orders preserve unaltered the pronunciation of their forefathers. In Lincolnshire and Rutlandshire a sensible change is perceived; the drawling lengthened vowels of the first are an approximation to the broad enunciation of the Northern Counties; and the oo for u in joog, poog, for jug, pug, with housen, closen, for houses, closes, &c. are other examples of the retention of ancient forms and sounds. Perhaps yow (yau) for you (yû) may be another; though the Scotch pronunciation of ou seems to prove the contrary. The western limits of this class of Dialects will be marked by a line drawn along the borders of Hampshire, through Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire, and its northern boundary is not ill defined by the Welland from Stamford to the Wash.

The Western Dialect which, with its many and widely deviating varieties, is spoken from Cheshire to the Land's End, is distinguished by a peculiar tone, which the late Mr. Walker in his Rhetorical Grammar has judiciously termed "the rising inflexion." It is the tone which, when most emphatically expressed, marks a question, and is probably the acute accent of the Greeks. The prevalence and force of this tone seems to increase exactly in proportion as we advance westwards. It is perceptible in Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, and Shropshire; more distinctly in Wales, but most of all in Ireland: and this, no doubt, is one reason why the Irish accent has always something of the ludicrous to an English ear. Among the singularities of the Western Dialects we may notice the deep intonation of the natives of Somersetshire, who say Zomerzetshire and zettle, always substituting z for s. The chant of Devonshire, and the song of the Cornish men, all of whom talk of "keeping a noise;" tell us, "they mean to;" make us, "a few broth;" and boast of their hens with a fine brood of "chicken."

The Northern dialect, which prevails in all the Counties to the north of the Mersey, the Trent, and the Welland, retains in pronunciation, phraseology, and words, more of the ancient language than any of its Southern sisters, except the English current in Wales, where May and Day are true diphthongs Maï and Daï; and the a and au have still their pristine sound of the Italian a, as they had in the days of Gill and Sir Thomas Smith, (de Recta Ling. Angl. Script. p. 14, 15,) who might even now have the pleasure of hearing many an ancient Briton say waï, daï, paï, in despite of "the effeminate pronunciation weï, deï, peï," so much in vogue, (Gill's Logonomid. p. 16.) Thus, in and about Hull the a in war, was, and the o in York, have the sound of a in "Father;" and the old pronunciation of u (oo, i. e. the Italian u, still preserved in bull, pull, full,) is universal. The same remarks apply in a great degree to Lancashire, Westmoreland, and DIALECT. Cumberland, though there are marked differences between the eastern, western, and northern branches of the Northern Dialect, especially in Northumberland, where we first meet with the genuine Saxon gutturals so long lost, and now so difficult of utterance to us "Southron men." The Northumbrian r is the exact counterpart of the Arabian gh which, as Nuweïrì says, is often confounded with r; the "bairns," so frequently named by Northumbrian mothers, are the legitimate descendants of their Norse ancestors; the confusion between "will" and "shall" is as great as on the wrong side of the Tweed; and as we approach the borders of Scotland, every vowel and accent, as well as innumerable strange words and singular inflexions, remind us of the languages spoken in Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Lower Saxony. Norwegian sailors, when talking together, have been mistaken for Scots; and some Scotchwomen, quarrelling and scolding one another, were, when heard at a distance, supposed to be natives of Germany, by one who was used to hear German spoken.

Scotland. The Dialects of the Low-land Scotch naturally fall, like those of England, into two subdivisions, the Eastern and the Western; for the Highland Scotch is here out of the question, being a language radically different from that of the Lowlanders, not merely a Dialect; and the Grampian Mountains may be considered as the boundary between the domain of each of these tongues. The Eastern Dialect prevails in the low country near the sea almost as far as Inverness; but the Western scarcely extends northward beyond Glasgow. The English spoken by the Highlanders is said to have none of the peculiarities which distinguish the Lowland Scotch; it is learnt as a foreign language, and is therefore acquired in greater purity, and with fewer local tones and idioms than it can be by the Lowlanders, among whom one of its Dialects is vernacular.

Gaelic. The national language of the Highlands is the Erse, a Celtic Dialect, differing little, if at all, except in orthography, from the Irish which, it may be remarked, bears the same name; for Er-s is merely a provincial corruption of the Saxon adjective Er-ish, derived from Er-land, or Er-inn, i. e. the western Island, just as Scot-s is written instead of Scot-ish or Scotch; Erse, therefore, and Irish are similar both in meaning and origin. Among the peculiarities of these Dialects may be mentioned the singular variations in the sound given to some letters, according to the vowel by which they are followed, and the many consonants which are entirely mute,—strong indications either of a great change in the pronunciation of the language, or of a very defective system of orthography. Both causes probably have contributed to produce this phenomenon, but more particularly the latter. That a system of orthography similar in principle, and nearly so in practice, should prevail both in Ireland and Scotland, is at first sight singular, as these two Celtic tribes are separated by a dangerous and rocky sea; but the difficulty vanishes when we learn that literature flourished in Ireland long before it did in Scotland, and that the system alluded to travelled from the Irish to the Scotch. The former borrowed their letters from the Saxons, and still, in consequence of the influence of their Priests, delight in retaining that barbarous form of the Roman Alphabet.* They appear also to have preserved the ancient power of the letters; a circumstance hitherto overlooked, though well deserving the notice of the Saxon Student. That these languages, together with the Welsh, are Dialects of the ancient Celtic will scarcely be denied. Kelt and Gál (Gael) are very nearly the same word; and Gaelic-erinach or Gálic of the Western Island, is the name given to their own tongue by the Irish. Caledonia appears to designate the Cál-dún, or Mountains of the Gál and Caldoch, the name given by the Highlanders to their native country, is almost identical with Ἡ Κελτικὴ, the Celtic region.

The language spoken by the higher orders in Ireland and Scotland is English, modified by the Dialects peculiar to the country of the speakers. The "falling inflexion" of Walker, or grave accent of the Greeks, is as predominant in the Scotch as the opposite intonation is in the Irish. The latter has Ireland. also many peculiar and ancient terms derived from the first English colonists, who were established in Ireland in the XIIth century, besides several words borrowed from the Celts. In the North-eastern part of the Island there is a large colony of Lowland Scotch, who still preserve their features, language, and habits unchanged; and form as striking a contrast by their cautious, sedate deportment to the joyous, boisterous, unguarded manners of the genuine Irish, as the calm Genevese does to the vehement Frenchman; but the most remarkable Dialect now extant in Ireland, is that of some villages in the County of Wexford, where the Saxon tongue is still spoken by Saxon. the descendants of the followers of Richard Strongbow, who brought over a party of his retainers to the assistance of Dermot, King of Leinster in 1170.

In the Isle of Man, as formerly at Walden in Isle of Essex, a Dialect of the Celtic is spoken. The Man. Manks (an adjective formed on the same principle as Erse and Scots) appears at first sight extremely remote from the Gálic; but when allowance has been made for the difference of orthography, the resemblance will be found to be very striking. It would have been more judicious if the authors of the Manks Grammar and translation of the Bible, had conformed their orthography to that of the Scotch and Irish rather than the English, as many anomalies might thus have been easily avoided.

The Welsh, Cornish (now extinct) and Bas Breton, Wales, are Celtic Dialects, adulterated by a large portion of Cornwall, and Belgic, and bearing an affinity, not at first very obvi- Bretagne ous, to the Gálic. The Dialects of North and South Wales differ considerably, and the former is much purer than the latter. In the southern part of the Principality, English is very generally understood; and it is not improbable, that in a few centuries the Cimbrian (or Kymrian, as a Welshman would call it) will in that part of Wales become entirely extinct.

I. It appears from the earliest accounts, that some Germany centuries before the birth of Christ the peninsula now called Jutland was inhabited by Jutes, (Jüten;) the coast further to the East by Teutones (Deutisch, Deutsch, Dutch;) and the Amber-coast beyond them by Ostiœi (Esthonians) and Cossini (or Cottini) i. e. Goths. These were all different members of the same family; and this division, existing at so early a period, is the foundation of those classes and subdivisions under which the principal German Dialects may be arranged. They fall naturally into two distinct classes, the Teutonic and Scandinavian; the first of which may be subdivided into the Upper, Lower, Middle, and High German. The most eastern Teutonic nation was the Goths; and of their language Ulphila's Translation of the New Testament furnishes abundant examples. That work, composed about the middle of the IVth century, is written in a Dialect which has all the roughness and imperfection of one little cultivated; but it contains many words of foreign origin, and the version is so scrupulously literal as to follow the order of the words observed in the original, in violation of the idiom of all the German tongues. The terminations of the cases seem also to have been borrowed from the Greek. The Marcomanni, Quadi, Lombards, (Longobardi,) Burgundians, Vandals, Heruli, &c. belonged to the same family as the Goths; but of their Dialect nothing has been preserved except a few words.

* It has for this reason been found expedient to print copies of the Irish New Testament in that ancient character, with many of the abbreviations found in Gothic manuscripts of the Vulgate, and other Latin books.

The nations still existing which belong to this division fall into two classes, according to the ancient tribes from which they draw their origin: namely, the Western, or Alemannic, and the Eastern, or Longobardic. To' the 'first belong Swisserland, Alsace, Swabia, and the Upper and Middle Rhine; to the second, Bavaria, Austria, and the remains of German colonies near Vicenza and Verona. To trace the Dialects of these different States back to their sources belongs rather to the history of the language, than to a short sketch of its actual varieties. These divisions, therefore, are mentioned here, principally for the sake of a more convenient classification.

1. Of all those of Upper Germany the Swiss is the most remarkable. In harsh aspirates and gutturals it far outstrips all its congeners, and is subdivided into many local varieties. Those of Basil, Zurich, Bern, and Appenzel, are particularly deserving of notice. The Canton of Bern alone has three very distinct Dialects; viz. those of the City, the Highlands, and the district of Argau. German is also spoken in some parts of the Grisons, and that current in the league of the Ten-Courts, and some villages of the Grey and God's House leagues, may be called the Grison Dialect. A very harsh and rude form of speech is used in Alsace. That of Swabia is not much more polished, st is always pronounced scht, as in moinschta for meinest du. Long vowels are converted into diphthongs, and short ones entirely dropped; thus ich weiss nicht, becomes i woass net; magst du mir etwas geben? maust mar eppis gea? About Würtemberg, the in in wink, &c. are pronounced like the French in (aïn.) The principal varieties of this Dialect are those current in Upper Swabia, Würtemberg, Augsburg, Heilbrunn, Ulm, Saussenberg, &c. The Bavarian is considered as the most unpleasant Dialect of German, next to the Swiss and Tyrolese. It has most of the peculiarities of the Swabian; delights in an extraordinary emphasis, and is beyond measure harsh and rugged in the mountainous districts towards the Tyrol; but in the Upper Palatinate a drawling, singing tone prevails. Closely allied to the Bavarian is the Saltzburg Dialect; and the Austrian also belongs to the same family, but it is softer, as well as more refined and rapid. Both delight in diminutives, and both are distinguished by a peculiar pronunciation; giving a the sound of o, and nearly dropping the l. In Styria alone there are six or eight varieties of language. Carinthia (Kärnthen) and Carniola (Krain) have each their own idiom, especially the Gottscheweser, a small German tribe descended from Goths or Franks, and occupying a part of the latter Province.

The Tyrolese holds the second place in the list of harsh and uncouth Dialects, and has many varieties and subdivisions. The following stanzas, from a song addressed to the Provincial militia by Father Staudacher in 1797, will at once mark its peculiar character, and show how widely it differs from the forms and rules of classical German.

Wax auf, beym Schaggarar!
Auf mit dem Stutz'n!
Schoissts fællæ Saggarar
Z'ammar beym Putz'n,
Machtigar ist jai kain'r,
Sand Purœhaitar,
Sand lautar tuad'n Bain'r
Schummlat si waitar!

i. e. Up, out, Oddsboddikins.
Up with the rifle gun:
Shoot all such cursed rogues,
One and all to the last of 'em.
Not one 's a man of might;
Mere bears hides all of 'em;
Nought more than dead men's bones:
Drive 'em far, far away.

From the Tyrolese are derived the inhabitants of the Tredici and Sette Communi, in the neighbourhood of Verona and Vicenza, whose origin and history are very obscure; but to judge from their language they must have been a colony from the German Alps, which almost join on to their native mountains.

Silesia, Moravia, Hungary, and Transylvania were anciently the border countries of Upper Germany, and, as such, though German was not the language indigenous in those territories, they contained large colonies of Germans whose Dialects were principally derived from the Southern Provinces, and ought therefore to be ranged under this class.

In Silesia the Upper and Lower German are much mixed; except in some mountainous districts where the rough and obsolete Dialects of the south were still retained. In Bohemia the speech of the German inhabitants, who form about one-third of the whole population, varies greatly, and is very corrupt and unintelligible; but little or nothing has been written respecting it. The German colonists in Hungary appear to have emigrated from Silesia. Transylvania has been peopled from every part of Germany, ever since the time of the Crusades; its language, therefore, is much mixed, but has much of the tone and character of the Upper Dialects. The Hermanstadt, Kronstadt, and Bistritz Dialects are most remarkable, and the latter is only half German, and therefore quite unintelligible to strangers. The Jewish German, a strange compound of German, Hebrew, Polish, and French, belongs also to this class; as does also the Rothwelsch, or Slang, (from Roth, a highwayman, and Welsch, a foreign tongue,) which is Jewish German mixed up with cant terms and common words taken in new acceptations. It is particularly in use among the thieves of Southern Germany.

DIALECT. Lower German.

2. The Lower, or Northern, is the reverse of the Southern, or Upper, German; while the latter is rough and broad, with an eternal hissing, puffing, and blowing, the former is contracted, soft, and flowing. To this class of German Dialects belong, 1. those of the Cimbri on the Lower Rhine, and in the Cimbrian Peninsula; and 2. the Scandinavian tongues. The most remarkable of the Cimbrian tongues were the Frisian.

Frisian, spoken in Friesland, and the Anglo-Saxon of our own ancestors. They had a very striking affinity for each other, but while the latter has been for centuries extinct, the former is still a living language: altered indeed and corrupted, but differing much less from the ancient Frisian, than the English of Chaucer does from the Saxon Chronicle. In the villages about Molkweren and Hindelopen, on the Zuider Zee, and in the town of Bolsward, a little to the north of those places, the ancient manners and language are still preserved, and the latter has many singular coincidences with modern English; such as cheese or schise, and church or tschurch, instead of the kaas and kerk of the Dutch. The Anglo-Saxon approaches much more nearly to the Dutch than to the German, and has all the roughness and irregularity of a semi-barbarous language; but much of the uncertainty which seems to have prevailed respecting its grammatical forms and orthography, is to be ascribed to the different ages and countries of the writings from which our Anglo-Saxon grammars have been compiled.

Anglo-Saxon.

Dutch and Flemish.

A combination of the Frisian, Francic, Lower Saxon, and French, gave birth to the Low Dutch and Flemish, which are marked by the abundance of gutturals, paucity of sibilants, with a preference of the hard to the soft consonants, k, p, t, to g, b, d; besides a very peculiar pronunciation of the vowels approximating to the French in some cases, and to the English in others; as well as many words and idioms never found in the Middle or Higher German. A peculiarity deserving of notice, is the absolute rejection of the pronoun of the second person singular; a deviation from the idiom of all the cognate Dialects, which was first adopted in the middle of the XVth century. The Dutch is far less polished and refined than the German, and has not been cultivated with sufficient care. Its grammar is more simple, because it has fewer inflexions; but the language is, for that reason, incapable of expressing the writer's ideas with equal clearness and precision. To the ear of a foreigner it appears peculiarly grating and monotonous, full of long vowels drawled out, short ones scarcely heard at all, with gutturals and nasals equally disagreeable. Its similarity to the English, however, and its retention of roots obsolete in our language, though we still use their derivatives, render it an object of more than mere curiosity to us; and had it been better known, we should probably never hear such barbarisms, as "on his sister going to England;" "from the King finding that he had been deceived," &c. where the verbal noun is mistaken for the participle present; nor should we have been taught to consider πανόμαι λέγων as exactly the counterpart of "I leave off speaking," when the idioms are in reality wholly different. In German and Dutch, the verbal nouns findung, vinding, (finding,) ausgebung, uitgeeving, (giving out,) &c. are not liable to be confounded, as among us, with the participle present, since the latter is terminated in end, not in ing. The principal Dialects of the Low Dutch, are the Dutch, properly so called, and the Flemish; the latter has been on the decline ever since the removal of the Court from Flanders, and the elevation of the United Provinces to the rank of a separate State. On these Dialects little has been written, and the Dutch, so diligent in most other branches of learning, have not cultivated their own language with the same industry and success as those of ancient Greece and Rome. In the North, as already remarked, the Frisian Dialects prevail; and in the South those of Zeeland, Guelderland, Cleves, and Juliers have considerable differences from each other, and from the written language. The Dutch spoken by the Creoles and Negro slaves in the West Indies is a Dialect of the Flemish.

DIALE Flemi

Creole.

Closely allied to the Low Dutch is the Platt Deutsch (Flat Dutch) or Lower Saxon, formed from the Francic and Frisian, but of course much altered by the admixture of foreign words and idioms borrowed from the conquered tribes in whose country the Saxons established themselves. It was most cultivated in the age immediately preceding the Reformation, and was then the language of all the north of Germany from Westphalia to East Prussia. Three, among its many Dialects, are particularly mentioned. Some idea of their peculiarities and relation to each other may be deduced from the following examples:

Plat Deutsch.

I.	II.	III.
Búk..	Bók..	Bauk..	Book, in High Dutch, Buch.
Dief..	Deef..	Deif ..	Thief, in High Dutch, Dieb.

The second, which is considered as the purest, substitutes long vowels for diphthongs, e. g. hús for Haus, and one vowel for another, as kœhe for kühe; changes s and tz into t, ch into ck, as ich into ick; and chs into ss, as Flass for Flachs, and sch into s-ch, or sk, as an Englishman would pronounce those letters. This Dialect is spoken in its greatest purity about Kiel. The Dutch and English seamen have introduced many corruptions into the speech of the lower orders at Hamburg and Altona. The Dialects of Wismar and Celle are among the most polished, while at Gœttingen, Calenburg, Brunswick, and Halberstadt, the people are remarkable for a harsh and drawling pronunciation. The hill people in the Hartz still speak the Francic tongue of their forefathers.

3. The Middle German Dialects have not arisen merely from the collision of the northern and southern tribes, but more particularly from the intermixture of the Alemanni, one of the latter, with their conquerors the Franks, a branch of the former stock. This gave birth to the East Francic, the parent of the High Dutch, the literary language of modern Germany. A mixture of the Lower Saxon with the Francic, in the reign of the Emperor Henry I., formed the Upper Saxon, which is now subdivided into many provincial varieties, such as that of the Erzgebirge (ore mountains) where they say Wos wullt'r dæ bei mër hobn! I us epper (Je nun etwa) a bissel Brud für nich un menner Kinner; or that of Bayreuth, Master Scheneider hatt er merr mei Schnürleibla nit hamacht? At Wunsiedel the language is almost the same as in the Upper Palatinate. In the forests of Thuringia a coarse, broad Dialect is used, greatly resembling those of Upper Germany. The Hessians put i for u, and speak in a singing tone; and almost every district has some peculiarity which distinguishes it from its neighbours.

Middle Germ

LECT. 4. The Missnian or Upper Saxon Dialect, which was equally removed from the extremes of either the Northern or the Southern, and partook of the characteristics of both, was for that reason well calculated for the basis of a language which should be universally intelligible, and form the means of communication between the higher classes throughout Germany. But it was to Luther's Translation of the Bible into this Dialect, and to the zeal of his disciples, most of whom were natives of Missnia, that its rapid and universal diffusion through the whole country from the Baltic to the Alps was principally owing.

II. The Scandinavian languages might be termed Dialects of the same tongue, so nearly do they approach each other and the Lower German, to which they have a nearer affinity than the Upper; but they have all certain peculiarities in common, which draw a distinct line of separation between them and the cognate German Dialects. They all affix the definite article as a syllable appended at the end of a word, instead of prefixing it as a separate part of speech; they form the neuter by adding t, the passive by s, preceded by e in the Danish, a or o in the Swedish, and a or u in the Icelandic. The latter has more perfect declensions than the others, and in some points agrees more closely with the Anglo-Saxon and Gothic. It differs also greatly in the form of the participle. In the conjugations the Swedish is the most simple, and the imperfect is the tense in which the greatest variations are found. Many of the Danish adverbs end in lig, as in the Anglo-Saxon, whence we have our termination in ly, e. g. hoilig, bitterlig, highly, bitterly.

The Danish, Norwegian, Icelandic and Swedish are the principal Scandinavian Dialects now extant. The first approximates more nearly to the Frisian and Saxon, and consequently to the Anglo-Saxon, than the others. It has fewer harsh gutturals than the German, and more than the Swedish; but a considerable variety of vowel sounds, among others, the English o in God, rod, which is rarely met with elsewhere. It is spoken in its greatest purity in the Island of Iceland, and most harshly by the Jutlanders. Though some differences of pronunciation occur in different Provinces, they are not sufficiently numerous to form distinct Dialects. The Danish accent is very like that of our northern Counties and of the Lowland Scotch.

The Norwegian and its numerous Dialects, are rather spoken than written languages; for they have been supplanted by the Danish, even in the conversation of the higher classes, and in all public Acts, unless the late political revolutions and the reestablishment of the Storthing, have restored the language of the country to its proper place in the public estimation. Norwegian Dialects are spoken in the Faroe, as they were anciently in the Shetland Islands, the Orkneys, and the Hebrides.

Even the little Island of Iceland has no less than four distinct Dialects. On the eastern side the ancient Norwegian is spoken in its greatest purity; for the first inhabitants were colonists from Norway, and their language is therefore a branch of the same tongue.

Sweden, which was peopled by German tribes of the higher and lower divisions, viz. by Goths in the middle and northern Provinces, from the east of Germany, and by Swedes in the southern, from the lower or northern German States, has two Dialects, the Swedish and the Gothic; of the first, the Upland, Dalecarlian, and Nortland are branches; as the East and West Gothic are of the latter. Smaland and Schonen have also peculiar forms of speech, the latter borrowing much from the German and Danish. The Dalecarlian is derived from the old Norwegian, and the purest Swedish is spoken in the villages of Dahlland. A corrupt Dialect of it is spoken in the Island of Run-œï, in the Gulf of Riga. One of the peculiarities of the Swedish is its total want of the deeper gutturals, by which most of the Northern languages are distinguished from all those of Latin origin, except the Spanish.

The Slavonian nations form the next, and almost the only remaining portion of the present inhabitants of Europe whose Dialects have not previously been noticed. They fall, according to history and the analogy of their speech, into two leading subdivisions, the Antes or Eastern, and the Sclavi or Western Slavonians. Their languages, fundamentally the same, were, it seems, at an early period distinguished by some peculiarities which prevailed in all the Dialects belonging to the same division of the nation. Thus, where the Antes used raz, (ab) and iz (ex) in their compounds, the Sclavi had roz and vy, and ptitsa, a bird, in the former, is ptak in the latter; so that the name of Rostock (Roz-ptak) alone, is sufficient to show from which of the Slavonian tribes that city derives its origin.

I. The Antes, when first mentioned in History, inhabited the country on the Black Sea, immediately to the north of the Danube, and from them are the Russians and Illyrians derived. The first, at an early period, formed two States, Great Russia on the Lake Ilmen, near Novgorod, and Little Russia on the Dnepr, of which the Capital was Kïev, (Kioff.) The former, in the IXth century, was subjected to Rurik, a Scandinavian Chief and his followers, called Varyaga Russi by the Finns, and thence its inhabitants received the name of Russi, (the Rhós of the Byzantine writers) a term not derivable from any Slavonian root. Oleg, Rurik's successor, conquered Kïev and united the two States under one head, and at the close of the Xth century Christianity was introduced by Priests of the Greek rite. These revolutions, together with the inroads of the Monghols and Turks, laid the foundation of the Dialects now used in Russia, and the peculiarities which distinguish its language from those of other Slavonian nations.

The Russian and Servian version of the Bible, is a monument of the most ancient Slavonian Dialect now extant; and as this was the only written language of Russia till the beginning of the XVIIIth century, and is still used in treatises on Divinity, many of its peculiarities have crept into the common speech, which is perhaps one reason why the Slavonians on the Adriatic are more intelligible to the Russians than their neighbours the Poles. The first theological works written in the common Russian, were those of Archbishop Plato, printed at Moscow in 1780; the ignorance and barbarism of the middling and lower orders in Russia therefore ceases to be a subject of astonishment; and as there were no writings extant in the language of common life nor any thing which could be understood without much study, the higher classes naturally formed their taste, sentiments, and manners entirely on foreign models.

The less a language is cultivated, it should seem,

DIALECT. the fewer are its variations of Dialect. This, which at first sight would not be expected, must arise from the paucity of words used by men in a low state of civilisation, and their entire dependence on the ear for the meaning of the words used. Among civilized nations a stranger causes a word misunderstood to be written down or spelt, and learns to recognise it under a new or slightly altered sound; savages have no such resource; any change in pronunciation, therefore, will proceed by almost imperceptible gradation from tribe to tribe, and village to village, and the marked differences will only appear at the extremities of the scale. So it is in the vast territory of Russia. "Except the Susdalian and Malo Russian," says Pallas, in the Preface to the Vocabularia Petropolitana, "there is scarcely such a thing as a change of Dialect throughout the Empire." The Great Russian seems to have absorbed all the others.

Susdalian. 1. Susdal is a District in the Government of Moscow, and was for a time the Capital of the Empire; its Dialect is peculiarly impure, and abounds in foreign terms.

Malo Russian. 2. The Malo or Little Russian, which is also the Dialect of the Ukraïn, approaches most nearly to the Slavonic or language of the ancient version of the Scripture. It is used from the Don to the borders of Silesia, comprehending Gallicia (Halich) and Lodomiria (Vlodimir) or Red Russia. The Little Russian and Zaporogian Kossacks (Cazàcs) speak this Dialect, while the Great Russian is the language of those on the Don. The Rusnïaks in Gallicia and Hungary, and the Krivitzes in Poland, are said to speak Dialects peculiar to themselves; but no sufficient account of them has been yet published.

Servian. The Servians, transferred from Gallicia to their present country, about A. D. 640, have a Dialect which forms the intermediate link between the Little Russian and the Croatian. This language is spoken not only by the Servians themselves, but by the Bosniacks, Bulgarians, Uzkókes, Morlakhs, Slavonians, Valakhians, Eastern Dalmatians, Ragusans, and Servians scattered over Hungary and Transylvania. The people call themselves Serblin, and their language Serbska. It is the purest of all the spoken Dialects, and varies little from the language of the Slavonian version, which is therefore nearly intelligible to the common people.

Bulgarian. The ancient Bulgarians were a Turkish tribe from the Volga, (or Bólghá, whence they and the Valakhians derive their name,) but they were gradually so amalgamated with their Servian neighbours and masters, as to adopt their manners and language. Many of their original Turkish words and expressions are still in use; but the language in its present state is a Slavonian Dialect, easily understood by any whose native tongue belongs to the same class. (Viaggi di Boscovich, p. 59.)

Uskos, or Morlaks. The Uzkókes, or deserters from the Volokhs (i. e. the Slavonian Bulgarians) on the conquest of their country by the Greeks in the XIth century, have been also called Morlakhs, (i. e. Moro-Vlakhs, Maritime Valakhians,) since they settled on the Adriatic in Dalmatia; but they give themselves the name of Lahe or Vlahe, i. e. Valakhians, or Haïduks, i. e. Chiefs of Banditti, for many of them are plunderers by profession, and all are more than half savages, speaking a very corrupt and coarse Dialect.

Dalmatian. Slavonian. The Dalmatian and Slavonian tongues nearly resemble that of Bosnia, (Bósnah,) the Croatian differs from them by a greater harshness, and a nearer approach to the Western Dialect; the guttural kh which the Croat has in common with his northern neighbours is softened into a strong aspirate hh, by the south-eastern tribes. The Ragusan is much intermixed with Italian, and written in the Latin character according to the Venetian orthography; for the final ch represents the sound of tch, not that of k.

Kroat, more properly spelt Khorvat or Khrobat, signifies a Mountaineer; and the race bearing that name, descended from the Carpathian Mountains into Illyria in the middle of the VIIth century. They came originally from Red Russia, their language therefore has much resemblance to the Little Russian or Servian. Western Dalmatia and Carniola (Kraïn) were occupied by this tribe; and their neighbours, the Vinds, (Winden,) form the first link in the chain which connects the Eastern with the Western Slavonians. The Croatians generally call their language Illyrian.

Vends, or Vinds, were Slavonians established near or among the Germans; who gave them that name, because, says Adelung, (Mithrid. ii. 654,) "they came from the water side;" for Wand, Wend, Watn, Water, Wasser are all, it seems, different forms of the same word in ancient Teutonic Dialects. Hence, also, he adds, we meet with the Veneti, (Heneti,) Veneder, and Vandals; names given to tribes of various origin merely because they dwelt upon the coast. The Southern Slavonians, who replaced the Veneti, were thus called Vinds or Vends, from the name and dwelling-place of the tribes to which they succeeded. Their present descendants inhabit Carniola, Carinthia, and the Lower Stiria, and intermix much German in their speech, such as the article ta, to, tu, wholly unknown in any other Slavonian Dialect.

In Carniola all the genuine Slavonians call themselves Sloventzi; but there are many villages inhabited by peasants of mixed origin, whose Dialects are more or less corrupt. The Vipakhians, about Vipakh and Leytenbach, speak a tolerably correct Carniolan. The Dialect of the Krazhautze, on the River Karst, is very coarse and adulterated; but Dalmatian is spoken by the Piutzkhene, on the Poyk, as well as the people of Istria and Fiume.

The Carinthians, whose name (Kærnthner) is an abbreviation of Quarantani, the appellation by which they were known when converted by St. Virgilius in the VIth century, call themselves Selantzi; their Dialect does not materially differ from that of Carniola, but approaches very nearly to the Stirian.

II. The Western Sclavi, or Slavonians properly so named, comprehend the Poles, Cassubians, Silesians, Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Lusatians, and Northern Vends. All these tribes or nations use the Roman character, modified by various appendages, in order to express such sounds as are foreign to the Latin language.

The Poles probably emigrated from the neighbourhood of the Black Sea with the cognate tribes, who moved to the South, while they travelled westwards and northwards as far as Pomerania and Silesia. In Prussia and Lithuania, they united with the Teutonic nations already settled there, and formed a mixed race, called Lettonians; Lekh (softened by the Turks into Leh) was the general name of the whole nation; and Polón, from which the present name of Poland is derived, that of the most powerful family. The Polish language is distinguished from its sister Dia-

LECT. lects, principally by some peculiar nasals, an excess of sibilants, and a modification of l, which seems to approximate to the guttural and liquid l (ll) of the Welsh. The Masurian and Cassubian Dialects are the coarsest and most adulterated. In Lower Silesia (Shlez) the Polish language soon ceased to be generally used, and there are very few of its districts in which any thing but German is now spoken; but in Upper Silesia a very corrupt Dialect of Polish, in many cases more than half German, commonly prevails.

emian. The language of Bohemia, or Chekh, (Cech,) i. e. the Further Land of the Slavonians, is interspersed with German and Latin words, from its having been so long governed by German Sovereigns and Prelates of the Romish Church; but it is a genuine Slavonian Dialect, approximating to the Polish in the accumulation of consonants and in the abundance of sibilants, and resembling still more closely the Moravian and Slovak, the Dialects of Slavonian tribes allied to the Bohemians in manners, habits, and disposition. It has many inferior Dialects; that of the Capital, however, notwithstanding the common use of German and French among the higher Orders, is the purest as well as the most polished.

avian. The Moravian, though merely a Dialect of the Bohemian, is considered as distinct by those who speak it; for they pointedly call it Moravsky, not Chesky gazyk, the Moravian, not the Chekhian tongue. The cultivators of the plains, who are called Hannaks, are considered as the oldest settlers in the country, and have many peculiarities in their speech. The shepherds in the mountains on the confines of Hungary and Moravia, (Mœhren,) have a dialect approaching to the Slovak. They retain, however, the Polish and Bohemian sound rzh, (as rg, in the French word berger,) which the Slovaks have not. They are called Valakhs, i. e. Shepherd's boys, probably because pasturage was the principal occupation of the genuine Valakhians, from whom perhaps they sprung.

ak. The Slovaks, or Slavaks, on the eastern borders of Moravia and scattered over Hungary, are probably the descendants of those who became Serfs to the Hungarians, after the ruin of the Kingdom of Moravia, and were thus removed from their native country. Their language has been little cultivated, and is, in all its varieties, intermingled, as may be supposed, with Polish, German, and Hungarian, according as the districts in which it is spoken, approximate to places where those tongues are vernacular.

s, or tians. The Lusatian Serbs, or Sorbs, call themselves Serbïe, but do not belong to the same branch of the Slavonians as the Illyrian Servians. They settled in Thuringia, after the destruction of that Kingdom by the Franks and Saxons, early in the VIth century, and anciently inhabited the whole country between Misnia (Meissen) and the Mark of Brandenburg. They are often called Vends by the German writers. Their language has been long extinct, except in Lusatia, (Lausitz,) and a few places on the borders of Misnia; and even in those countries it is rapidly declining. The Dialects of Upper and Lower Lusatia, each of which has many local varieties, form the two great divisions of the Serbian tongue. The former, which is the purest of the two, though it has adopted the German article, is spoken most correctly at Budissen, or Bautzen. Cottbus, in the New-Mark, is the Capital of the Lower Lusatians, but its language is decidedly the most adulterated of all the Slavonian Dialects. DIALECT.

The whole southern coast of the Baltic was formerly inhabited by two large Slavonian tribes, the Wiltzes or Lintibzians, in the east, and the Obotrites, in the west. Some descendants of the latter, in a few villages in the Dutchy of Luneburg, still spoke the language of their forefathers only a few years ago; and the Polish nasals, with which it abounded, were sufficient to show to what branch of the Slavonians they belonged. They were properly called Linonians from the River Linac, or Leyne; improperly Polabians, as the people to whom that name, (Po-Labe, on the Elbe,) belonged, were settled at Ratzeburg on the Elbe. Northern Vends. Wiltzes and Obotrites.

If the Dialect last mentioned has a claim to the appellation of Germanic Slavonian, still more is that name applicable to the Lithuanian language, formerly vernacular in Prussia and the neighbouring countries to the north-east. The name of Lithuania is of doubtful age and origin, and was not for some centuries given to so great an extent of country as afterwards; that is, to all the territory between Memel and the Vistula. Lithuanian.

There were four distinct branches of the Lithuanian language: 1. the ancient Prussian; 2. the Prussian Lithuanian; 3. the Samogitian; 4. the Lettonian, or Lithuanian, properly so named.

1. The latter seems to have arisen from a Slavonian engrafted on a Gothic Dialect. Its grammatical forms, numerals, declensions, and conjugations, are all Teutonic, while two-thirds of its words are of Slavonic origin. In the old Prussian, the German predominated; it still however contained much of the Slavonic. As it was carefully suppressed by the Teutonic Order, when they were masters of Prussia, it had become nearly extinct at the close of the XVIIth century. 2. Between the Inster and Memel a Dialect is still spoken, which may be called the Prussian Lithuanian. Every variety of it, and especially that current round Nodrau, bears a great resemblance to the old and now extinct Prussian last mentioned: the vicinity of Poland has however occasioned the introduction of many Polish words. 3. The Samogitian, or Polish-Lithuanian, called Shamaïtian by the persons who speak it, differs in few essentials from the Prussian Lithuanian; but, as its name implies, has borrowed much, especially its orthography and many of its sounds, from the Poles. 4. In Curland and Semigallia, in a part of Livonia, and on the confines of the neighbouring countries, the Lettonian is spoken. The best Dialect of it is current about Riga and Mittau; the worst on the Polish borders, and in Curland. The Swiks, a mixed race, scattered over the Upper Lautzen, are the offspring of a union of Finns, Russians, and Lithuanians; and their Dialect is the only kind of Lithuanian which contains any portion of the Finnic, supposed by some writers to form an essential part of all. Many ancient Gothic roots, lost in most of the Teutonic languages, are still extant in the Lettonian, e. g. Laiva, bread, whence our loaf, and gribbeht, to command, whence Graf, Gerieve, Shrieve, and Sheriff. Old Prussian. Prussian Lithuanian. Samogitian of Shamaïtian. Lettonian. Swiks.

The Valakhians and Moldavians speak a singular compound of some Latin dialect with the Slavonian. One-tenth of the words used in this language are of Gothic, Greek, Turkish, or Albanian origin; Wallachia and Moldavia.

DIALECT. — DIALOGISE.

two-fifths are Slavonic, and the remaining half is Latin, in a form so like the Italian as to be extremely perplexing and unaccountable to the Etymologist, except on the supposition that both are equally reliques of the Romana Rustica, and that the Valakhian Shepherds are, as their name (Rumánye) seems to imply, descendants of the Roman colonists in Dacia and Mœsia. The Provinces to the north, and those to the south of the Danube, differ materially in their Dialects. The first of which is spoken in Transylvania, Bukovina, the Bannat and Upper Hungary, as well as in Moldavia and Valakhia; the other is common in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly: and both, when written, are expressed in the Cyrillic, or ecclesiastical character of the Russians.

Having thus given a short survey of the principal Dialects of all the European languages derived from Greek, Roman, Celtic, Iberian, Teutonic, or Slavonian sources, we must refer the reader for the remainder, viz. those of the Chudian tribes and the Hungarians to the Article on LANGUAGE; as the minute differences which properly speaking constitute a variation of a Dialect, can be only very imperfectly traced in languages so little known and cultivated as those last mentioned; for the same reason, also, the Asiatic tongues have not been noticed under this head; though the Syriac and Chaldaic may be considered as Dialects of the Hebrew; and the languages now spoken on the northern coast of Africa, in Malta, Egypt, Syria, and Arabia Felix, though all Arabic, differ from each other sufficiently to occasion some embarrassment and misunderstanding when natives of those countries first communicate with each other.

Ample lists of authorities, with specimens of most of the Dialects here enumerated, will be found in Adelung's Mithridates, vol. ii. iv. 463, seq.

DIALIUM, in Botany, a genus of the class Decandria, order Monogynia. Generic character: corolla, petals five; calyx wanting; stamens fixed on the upper edge of the receptacle.

Two species, D. Indum, native of the East Indies, and D. Guinense, native of Guiana. Persoon.

DIA'LOGISE, DIA'LOGISM, DIA'LOGIST, DIALOGI'STICALLY, DI'ALOGUE, v. DI'ALOGUE, n. DI'ALOGUE-WRITER, DI'ALOGUE-WRITINGS.

Fr. dialogue; It. and Sp. dialogo; Lat. dialogus; Gr. διάλογος, ἀπὸ τῦ διαλογεσθαι, (διὰ, and λέγειν, to say,) to discourse together; where two or more persons talk or converse together.

The usage of Dialogism is well stated by Cotgrave: "Fr. dialogisme; a figure or discourse, wherein one arguing with himself as if he talked to another, both moves the question, and makes the answer."

Moreouer the proctour of purgatory [Sir Thomas More] sayth in his dialogue, quod I, and quod he, and quod your frende, how that the foresayd Duke of Glocester was a noblemā and a great clarcke, and so wise that he coulde spye false myracles and disclose them, and judge them from the true.

Tyndall. Workes. The Practice of Popishe Prelates.

Some will dispute, cavill and object, as Julian did of old, whom Cyrill confutes, as Simon Magus is fained to doe in that dialogue betwixt him and Peter: and Ammonius the philosopher, in that dialogicall disputation with Zacharias the Christian.

Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, fol. 258.

His foolish dialogism is a fighting with his own shadow.

Falke. Retentive, (1580,) p. 306.

In his prophecy he [Malachi] proceeds most dialogistically.

Bishop Richardson. On the Old Testament, p. 449.

And dialogu'd for him what he would say.

Shakspeare. A Lover's Complaint.

VAR. How dost foole?
APE. Dost dialogue with thy shadow?
VAR. I speake not to thee.

Id. Timon of Athens, fol. 83.

Zelmane willingly opened the leaves, and read it, being written dialogue-wise, in this manner.

Sidney. Arcadia, book ii.

At present it must be owned, the characters, or personages, employ'd by our new orthodox dialogists, carry with 'em little proportion or coherence.

Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, misc. 5. ch. ii. vol. iii.

So pass'd in pleasing dialogue away
The night; then down to short repose they lay.

Pope. Homer. Odyssey, book xv.

I may according to equity, and with the better grace, attempt a line or two, in defence of that freedom of thought which our author has us'd, particularly in one of the personages of his last dialogue-treatise.

Shaftesbury. Miscellaneous Reflections, misc. 5. ch. iii. vol. i. p. 297.

Nor did he much like the books now in vogue at the court, some in French and some wrote dialogue-wise; such as probably humoured the air of the present court, and the French marriage.

Strype. Life of Parker. Anno 1574.

A dangerous stroke of art! and which requir'd a masterly hand, like that of the philosophical hero whose character was represented in the dialogue-writings above mentioned.

Shaftesbury. Advice to an Author, part i. sec. 3. vol. i. p. 198.

Varro, one of the dialogists says to him: Sed de teipso quid ex quod audio? Tully answers: Quānam de re? Varro replies; Relictam a te veterem jam, tractari autem Novam.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, book iii. sec. 3. vol. iii. p. 110.

DI'AMENT, DIAMA'NTINE.

It. and Sp. diamante; Fr. diamant; a diamond. See DIAMOND. Corrupted from Adamant.

CORV. ——— Say,
I have a diament for him, too.
MOS. Best shew't, sir,
Put it into his hand; tis only there
Hee apprehends.

Ben Jonson. The Fox, act i. sc. 5

——— The stately building
The world's great Maker curiously did found
On fields of pearle with diamantine towers.

Stirling. Doomes-Day. The Twelfth Houre.

DIA'METER, DIA'METRAL, DIA'METRALLY, DIAME'TRICAL, DIAME'TRICALLY.

Fr. diametre; It. and Sp. diametro; Lat. diameter; διάμετρος, from διὰ, and μέτρον, a measure.

The straight line which passing through the centre of any figure measures or divides it into two equal parts. Things are said to be diametrically opposite, when they are as opposite as the extreme points of a diameter.

O stedfast diametre of duracion
That fewe feres any time might thou finde
For none to him was founden halfe so kinde.

Chaucer. A Balade of our Ladie, fol. 330.

A-TER. —[A-ND.

And this new diameter is but the half of this verse divided in two, and no other than the cæsura or breathing-place in the midst thereof, and therefore it had been as good to have put two lines in one, but only to make them seem diverse.
Daniel. Defence of Rhyme.

The incession or locall motion of animals is made with analogy unto this figure, by decussative diametrals, quincunciall lines and angles. Sir Thomas Brown. Cyrus Garden, ch. iii.

——— There are gentlewomen, and male guests,
Of several humours, cariage, constitution;
Profession too; but so diametrall
One to another, and so much opposed.
Ben Jonson. The Magnetick Lady, act i. sc. 1.

Every lye is diametrally contrary to the God of truth; since it proceeds originally from the very Devill, who is a lyer, and the father of lies.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act iii. sc. 4.

They [Scylla and Charybdis] are nothing so horrid or dangerous as they make them to be, they are two white keen-pointed rocks that lie under water diametrically oppos'd, and like two dragons defying one another.
Howell. Letter 27. book i. sec. 1.

Grant that the sun had happen'd to prefer
A seat ascant but one diameter;
Lost to the light by that unhappy place
This globe had lain a frozen, lonesome mass.
Blackmore. Creation, book ii.

This is to make a diametrical opposition between the decrees of God, and the record of his will in the Gospel.
Bates. Works, vol. iv. p. 275. Dr. Thomas Jacomb's Funeral Sermon.

That this conception is of all others most dangerous to the soul and dishonourable to God, as being absolutely and diametrically opposite to the tenour of the Gospel, and that which evacuates the death and satisfaction of Christ; for it causes us, while we acknowledge a Christ, tacitly to deny the Saviour.
South. Sermons, vol. vi. p. 430.

We chose to stop there, because it seems to be the very diametrical point of opposition, or a point very near to that, between the government of this Prince [King James] and the government of Queen Elizabeth, which we have so largely insisted upon.
Bolingbroke. Remarks on the History of England. Letter 21.

There is a country, said he, in the world called Fourli, no matter for its longitude or latitude, whose inhabitants have ways of thinking, in many things, particularly in morals, diametrically opposite to ours.
Hume. Essays, vol. ii. p. 338. A Dialogue.

DI'AMOND,
DI'AMONED,
DI'AMOND-BUCKLE,
DI'AMOND-BUTTONED,
DI'AMOND-CUTTER,
DI'AMOND-HATBAND,
DI'AMOND-MINE,
DI'AMOND-PEBBLE, DI'AMOND-POINTED,
DI'AMOND-SCEPTRED,
DI'AMOND-WATER.

Fr. diamant; It. and Sp. diamante; Dutch, diamant; Ger. demant; and in old English, diamant; Lat. adamas; Gr. ἀδάμας, ἀδάμαντος; adamant, from a, priv. and δαμάειν, domare; to tame, to overpower; quod nullâ vi domabilis; to be overpowered by no force. See Vossius, and the Example from Pliny.

Haue harte as hard as diamaunt
Stedfast, and nauht pliaunt.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 136.

His propre stone is diamant
Whiche is to him moste acordant.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vii. fol. 149.

But he that by good vse and experyence, hathe in his eye the ryghte marke and very trewe lustre of the dyamonte, reiecteth anone, and lysteth not to looke vpon the counterfayte, be it neuer so well handeled, neuer so craftely polyshed.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 73. A Treatise upon Words of Scripture.

DIAMOND.

Wonderfull and inenarrable is the hardnesse of a diamant; besides it hath a nature to conquer the fury of fire, nay, you shall never make it hote; doe what you can: for this untamable vertue that it hath, the Greeks have given it the name Adamas.
Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. fol. 610.

Prince Arthur gaue a box of diamond sure,
Emboss'd with gold and gorgeous ornament,
Wherein were clos'd few drops of liquor pure
Of wondrous worth, and vertue exeellent,
That any wound could heale incontinent.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, book i. can. 9.

Our diamond-button'd callimanco hose,
Our plume of ostrich, with the embroider'd scarf.
Ford. The Ladies' Trial, act ii. sc. 1.

These diamond-pointed eyes but hither throw,
And you will see a young spring on't.
Rowley. A Match at Midnight, act iii. sc. 1.

PHIL. Deep shades are thus to heighten colours set;
So stars in night, and diamonds shine in jet.
Dryden. Secret Love, or the Maiden Queen, act v.

Among the rest fair Atalanta came,
Grace of the woods; a diamond-buckle bound
Her vest behind, that else had flow'd upon the ground,
And show'd her buskin'd legs.
Id. Ovid. Metamorphoses, book viii.

This odd assertion I find to be contradicted by frequent practice of diamond-cutters.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 576. Experimenta et Observationes Physicæ.

In particular, he had received a diamond-hatband, valued at £800. from one Mr. Compton of Sussex.
Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. i. p. 289.

This author, then, speaking of the first of those three diamond-mines, which he makes to be the only ones in the East Indies, having told us, that the stones are there found, some in the ground, and some in the rock, subjoins, that those that are drawn from the rock, or the neighbouring parts, have ordinarily a good water; but for those, which are drawn out of the ground, their water partakes of the colour or soil, wherein they are found. If the earth be clean and somewhat sandy, the diamonds will be of a good water; but if it be fat or black, or of another colour, they will have some tincture of it.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 528. Essay about the Origin and Virtues of Gems.

In such a shape to mould a rising fair,
As virgin Goddesses are proud to wear;
To make her eyes with diamond-water shine,
And form her organs for a voice divine.
Parnell. The Rise of Woman.

Nor let the pride of great ones scorn
This charmer of the plains;
That sun, who bids their diamonds blaze,
To paint our lily deigns.
Mallet. Edwin and Emma.

They ended; and all nature soon was chang'd!
O'er diamond-pebbles ran the liquid gold:
And side by side the lamb and lion rang'd
The flow'ry lawn.
Thomson. The Nativity.

O Goddess, on whose steps attend
Pleasure and laughter-loving Health,
White-mantled Peace, with olive wand,
Young Joy, and diamond-sceptred Wealth.
Dr. Warton. Ode to Liberty.

The DIAMOND is a combustible mineral which occurs generally in single, or in unattached crystals, sometimes with plane, but more frequently with rounded surfaces, among ferruginous sand or gravel. Its combustible nature was inferred by Newton from its highly refractive power; and it has been since shown by numerous experiments to be the same substance as the pure combustible part of charcoal, which chemists have denominated Carbon.

DIA-MOND.

As we have occasion to enter more largely into the history of this mineral in our Treatise on MINERALOGY, and to refer particularly to it as an object of taste under the article GEM, we shall limit our present remarks to its application to a few useful purposes. It has been found, by experiment, to be the hardest of all known minerals, although so brittle as to be easily broken by a slight blow of a hammer; and it is to this property of superior hardness that its utility, limited as it is, must be ascribed. This is a point on which Pliny is wholly at issue with modern lapidaries. He assures us, that if a Diamond be stricken on an anvil, the anvil will inevitably split; that the precious gem can never be heated, and is ignium victrix. One process alone can soften its obduracy. It must be macerated with fresh and reeking goat's blood; and even then, unless the metallic instruments employed are most finely tempered, they will be broken before the Diamond yields. (xxxvii. 15.) Cyprian, Austin, Isidore, and others of the Fathers, adopting this strange notion have used it to illustrate the method by which the blood of the Cross softens the heart of man. Albertus Magnus has added, that it is necessary the goat, the blood of which is used, should drink wine, and should be fed with Silex montanum, Petro selinum, and such herbs as are considered to be solvents of stone in the bladder. Pliny considers the Diamond to be more potent than the magnet in attracting iron, as also to be an efficacious amulet against poisons and nightly terrors. In the latter notion he has been followed by a host of successors: Solinus, Marbodæus, Cardan, &c. all of whom agree, that it is necessary for those purposes that the stone should be fastened on the left arm. In opposition, however, to this opinion, some medical writers have believed that the poudre de la succession, the slow poison for which the French and Italians were so infamous, consisted of Diamond dust powdered exceedingly fine.

The only purposes of Art we believe to which it has been applied, are, besides cutting and polishing each other, the humbler ones of slitting and drilling holes in stones, cutting glass, and drawing lines on copper. The lapidary's mill, by which all other stones are slit, is a wheel of thin sheet iron, to the edge of which small portions of Diamond powder are occasionally applied, and wetted by milk or oil, or most commonly by impure naphtha, called by the lapidaries Oil of Brick.

The drilling holes in stones is an invention of very modern date, and has been adopted for the purpose of producing fine and even wire. By the ordinary process of wire-drawing through a steel plate, the hole through which the wire passes continually enlarges, in consequence of which the wire increases in its diameter. For the purpose of preventing this variation in the size of the wire, some of the hardest and toughest of the stones, which are denominated Primers, have been perforated by angular pointed fragments of Diamond, so as to produce smooth and circular apertures, through which more uniform wires may be drawn.

The operation of cutting glass by means of a Diamond, although long practised, was, we believe, first explained by Dr. Wollaston, in the Philosophical Transactions for 1816. The Diamond will, from its hardness, scratch glass, however its point may be applied; but to cut it, the natural point and edge of the crystal must be held in such a direction, that, having once penetrated the surface of the glass, it may in its progress act as a wedge, and split the glass as it is moved onward.

DIA-MOND - DIA.

The Diamond point, which is used by engravers to draw fine lines on copper, is the termination of a small cone which has been turned in a lathe by means of another fragment of the same substance.

Diamonds are cut by being rubbed against each other; and peculiar contrivances are adopted for holding them, by which all due regularity may be given to the faces intended to be produced. They are afterwards polished by means of the powder derived from the process of cutting.

Some Papers On the Nature of the Diamond, by Mr. Tennant, will be found in the Philosophical Transactions, 1797; and in Nicholson's Journal, i. p. 177; by William Allen, Phil. Trans. 1807; by Pepys, Id. Ib.; An Account of Experiments on Combustion, by Morveau Guyton, is in Nicholson's Journal, ii. 298; by Sir G. S. Mackenzie, Id. iv. 103; by Sir H. Davy, Phil. Trans., 1814. See also Mawe's Treatise on Diamonds and Precious Stones.

DIAMORPHA, in Botany, a genus of the class Decandria, order Pentagynia. Generic character: calyx four-cleft; petals four; capsule opening externally, four-celled, cuspidate, cusps subulate, divergent; cells about four-seeded.

One species, D. pusilla, native of North America. Nuttall.

DIANA. Three Mythological personages of this name are noticed by Cicero, (de Nat. Deor. lib. iii. cap. xxiii.) the daughter of Jupiter and Proserpine, who was also mother of the winged Cupid; the daughter of Jupiter and Latona; and the daughter of Upis and Glauce, who is sometimes called by the name of her father. This name of Upis, or Opis, is also given by Callimachus, (Hymn. in Dian. 204, 240,) and by Alexander the Ætolian, (apud Macrobium, Sat. v. 22,) to the second Diana, who is by far the most celebrated; and in whose person, if we may judge from the confusion prevailing in this, as in all other Mythological subjects, the attributes of her less distinguished namesakes have centred.

The Hymn of Callimachus, addressed to this Divinity, is perhaps the most circumstantial, as well as the most authentic record which antiquity has bequeathed us of the popular belief regarding her. From this it appears that she was born in the Island of Delos, and that, when very young, (παῖς ἔτι κυρίζουσα,) and sitting on the knees of her father Jupiter, she intreated his permission to preserve a perpetual virginity, and to enjoy a multitude of names, that she might not, in this respect, be outdone by her brother Apollo. The Poets, for the most part, jealously defend her honour, and steadily assert that she never repented of the first of these requests; and the signal example which she made of Callisto, (Ovid, Met. ii. 465,) shows at least how much importance she attached to it in the persons of others. However, scandal has not been silent even on the reputation of the Goddess of Chastity, who is reported to have been deeply enamoured of a beautiful shepherd youth of Latmos, named Endymion; and her taste appears sometimes no less questionable than her coyness, as she is said to have bestowed her favours on Pan and Orion. In the latter request (πολυωνυμία) she was indulged to her utmost wishes. We shall not here give a list of the names which she received from the mere locality of her worship, as we shall notice presently the places themselves, which were most distinguished in this respect. Suffice it to say, that she is known to the Poets by the titles of Phœbe, Artemis, Agrotera, Aphea, Anaitis, Britomartis, Corythallia, Cynthia, Dictynna, Epipyrgidia, Militta, Trivia, Hecate, Lucina, Ilithyia, and various others. Besides these boons, she requested from Jupiter permission to afford light to men, to dwell in the woods, in the habit, and exercising the pursuits of an huntress; and to have for her attendants sixty Ocean Nymphs, nine years of age, to form her dances, and twenty Nymphs of the river Amnisus, in Crete, to tend her dogs. She petitioned also to have all the mountains, and a single city, to which she might repair to assist women in parturition. The latter office she took on herself, because her mother produced her without pain; but in this particular Callimachus contradicts his own version of the story in the Hymn to the Island Delos. Jupiter readily allowed all her petitions, and instead of one city gave her thirty. This is supposed to allude to the places called Artemisium, Artemisia, Artemita, &c., of which it is imagined there were no fewer in the time of Callimachus; but the Scholiast, very unwarrantably, interprets τρὶς δέκα by thirteen. Beside these, which were to be dedicated to the exclusive worship of Diana, she was to enjoy divided worship in several other cities, and she was to preside over harbours and highways.

Confirmed in the possession of these prerogatives, Diana was by no means negligent of their exercise. She traversed her mountain dominions with her Nymphs, and having found four stags of extraordinary size and beauty, yoked them to her car, in which act she is frequently represented on ancient coins. She next made trial of her bow; first, on trees, next, on wild beasts, and lastly, on men; although, generally speaking, her brother Apollo relieved her of this office, and left her to wreak her vengeance on her own sex. No Deity was more terrible than Diana, and none less patient of an affront. The description which Callimachus gives us of her wrath and her favour is highly poetical, and appears to have been imitated from passages in the Psalms, which it is probable that the author had seen at the Court of Ptolemy.

In strict accordance with this description are the fables of Niobe, Iphigenia, Actæon, and that of the Calydonian boar, which Diana sent to punish Œneus for neglecting to pay her due sacrifice. So vindictive and malignant was she supposed to be, that all aberrations of the mind were referred to her displeasure. (Hor. Art. Poet. 454.) She was, in many places, appeased by human victims. In the Tauric Chersonese she had a celebrated Temple, wherein strangers, who happened to be wrecked on the coast, were mercilessly immolated. At Lacedæmon she had a festival called Diamastigosis, where boys were flogged before her altar, sometimes to death; and at Aricia, in Italy, her Temple was served by a fugitive slave, who had killed his predecessor in single combat. (Ovid, Fasti, iii. 271.)

The classical ideas of Diana have been faithfully perpetuated in gems, statues, and medals, and scarcely less graphically in the writings of the Poets. "The Diana Venatrix, or Goddess of the Chace, is frequently represented as running on, and with her vest as flying back with the wind; notwithstanding its being shortened, and girt about her for expedition. She is tall of stature, and her face, though so very handsome, is something manly. Her legs are bare, very well shaped, and very strong. Her feet are sometimes bare too, and sometimes adorned with a sort of buskin, which was worn by the huntresses of old. She often has her quiver on her shoulder, and sometimes holds a javelin, but more usually her bow, in her right hand." (Spence, Polymetis. Dial. viii.) She has also a crescent in her hair. She is sometimes, however, represented sleeping, bathing, or reclining beside a river; in this latter posture there is a remarkably elegant statue of her in the Towneley collection. Sometimes she is surrounded by Nymphs, whom she surpasses in height, according to the description given of her by Homer, (Odyss. Ξ. 108,) Virgil, (Æn. i. 502,) and Ovid, (Met. iii. 188,) frequently she is attended by a dog; sometimes she appears bearing one or two torches. She is also occasionally represented riding on a stag, or in a chariot drawn by stags, according to the tradition in Callimachus, but more commonly by horses. Spence (Polymetis. Dial. xii.) mentions a gem in the collection of the Grand Duke of Florence, in which two heifers appear. Statius (Achill. i. 348) has given us a sketch, which has been embodied by Sculptors, and which may be called Diana in her Court dress.

Sic, ubi virgineis Hecate lassata pharetris
Ad patrem fratremque redit, comes hæret euntí
Mater, et ipsa humeros exsertaque brachia velat;
Ipsa arcum pharetramque locat, vestesque latentes
Deducit; sparsosque studet componere crines.

The most remarkable representation of Diana, however, is that which exhibits her with three bodies. In this form she was commonly called Trivia, and placed at the concourse of three roads. This represented her triple power, as Phœbe, or Luna, in heaven; Diana, on earth; and Hecate, or Proserpina, in hell.

According to Herodotus, (Euterpe, 137 and 156,) Diana was worshipped by the Egyptians under the name of Bubastis. The Greeks and Romans, instead of investigating the origin of their own and foreign Mythology, contented themselves with discovering, in the Divinities of all other nations, those which were already familiar and domestic to themselves. In Egyptian Mythology, this Goddess was the daughter of Bacchus and Isis, which latter Divinity is called Ceres by Herodotus, (Euterpe, 156,) although from the testimony of Diodorus, (τὴν δὲ Ισιν ΕΓΓΙΣΤΑ ΠΩΣ Δημήτραν, (Biblioth. Hist. lib. i. cap. xiii.) this appears to be at most no more than an approximation. When the Titans invaded Egypt, Diana, or Bubastis, transformed herself into a cat, which animal became, on that account, sacred, and was reverenced with a great variety of ceremonies, which are related by Herodotus. (Euterpe.)

Beside the places already mentioned, Diana was principally worshipped at Ephesus, Brauron, Abydos, Heraclea, Aulis, Eretria, Samos, Bubastus in Egypt, and in Mount Aventine at Rome, and Delos. The first of these places possessed her most magnificent Temple, which, according to the accounts of ancient authors, must have surpassed in splendour every other structure of Heathen antiquity. But the culture of Diana was so extensive, that the Ephesian silversmith scarcely indulged in hyperbole when he said that all Asia and the World worshipped her.

DIANA. Whencesoever the personification of Diana arose, there can be little doubt that her attributes and fabulous history are symbolical of the Moon, although she is sometimes separately noticed by the Poets. She was produced at one birth with Apollo, which appears to be an emblematical version of the creation of the Sun and Moon on the same day, as recorded by Moses. Her virginity expresses the purity and cold effect of moonlight; her attendance by the Ocean and River Nymphs, the Lunar influence on the tides; her obstetrical office, the period of months which brings the child to light; besides which, the changes of the Moon are still vulgarly supposed to have some influence on the actual moment of birth. She possesses all the mountains, for the summits of these receive her uninterrupted light; and she rarely visits cities, (σπαρνὸν δ' Ἄρτεμις ἄστυ κάτεισιν, Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 19,) because there her light is most intercepted. She presides over the sports of the chase, because the moonlight enables the hunter to pursue his occupation with greater success; and her malignant character is sufficiently explained by the opinions formerly prevalent concerning the influences of the Moon, particularly on the human intellect. The mode in which her Temple at Aricia was served, was probably designed to represent the expiration of the old Moon and the appearance of the new. The three faces of Diana, when observed in her statues, clearly represent the increasing, the full, and the waning Moon.

Callim. Hymn. in Dianam et Delon; Homer, Hymn. in Dianam; Hygini Fabulæ; Cicero, de Nat. Deor.; Fulgentius Planciades, Mythologicon; Lactant. Narrat. Fabular.; Albric. de Deor. Imaginibus; Spence's Polymetis; Spanheim, in Callimachum.

The middle ages acknowledged a Diana who presided at the unhallowed Sabbaths of Witches. Her connection with Sorcery has been traced, with much probability, to a custom mentioned by Plutarch, (Symp. vii. 5,) of writing letters upon the crown, the girdle, and the feet of the statue of the Pagan Goddess at Ephesus, which were conceived to have the power of chasing evil Spirits from the possessed, and of satisfying the wishes of the votary. In the Capitularia Regum Francorum, edited by Baluze, (13,) is given an Ecclesiastical statute promulgated in the reign of Louis II. part of which is as follows: Illud etiam non omittendum quod quædam sceleratæ mulieres, retro post Sathanam conversæ, Dæmonis illusionibus et phantasmatibus seductæ, credunt se et profitentur nocturnis horis cum Diana Paganorum Dea et innumerabili mulierum multitudine equitare super quasdam bestias, et multa terrarum spatia intempestæ noctis silentio pertransire, ejusque jussionibus, velut Dominæ, obedire. Du Cange (ad v. Diana) has cited another similar ordinance, Nulla mulier se nocturnis equitare cum Diana Dea Paganorum, vel cum Herodiade seu Benzorid et innumerâ mulierum multitudine profiteatur, hæc enim est dæmonium illusio. The River Jordan it appears was a favourite haunt of this personage. Mr. Douce, who has brought to the subject his customary extent of knowledge, (on Shakspeare, i. 382,) states that traces of this Diana are to be found in the frauholde, or frau fate, the lady fate of the Germans, and that she is to be met with as Hera, Nicneven, and Dame Habunde. The whole of his extremely interesting note is worth consulting. The site of St. Paul's in London is supposed by Camden, and Woodward, (Letter to Sir C. Wren, in Leland's Itinerary, viii.) to have been once occupied by a Temple of Diana. On this point see also Erasmus, de Ratione Concionandi; and Strype, Eccl. Mem. iii. 378.

DIANÆA, in Zoology, a genus of Free Acalephæ or Medusæ, established by Lamarck, in his Histoire des Animaux sans Vert.

Generic character. Body orbicular, transparent; peduncle under the umbrella; mouth single, below, central. Lamarck to form this genus united together the genera Lymnorea, Geryonia, Oceania, Pelagia, and Melicerta of Peron.

This union appears curious, when we observe that Peron distributes these genera into two sections of his Medusæ; for the two first genera belong to his section Agastriques, and the three last he considers Gastriques; and Peron also divides the genus Oceania into three subgenera, O. simplex, O. proboscidea, and O. appendiculata.

Cuvier also distributes these genera of Peron into three great genera; as the Pelagiæ into the genus Medusa, the Oceaniæ as Cyaneæ, and the Geryonie and Lymnoriæ as Rhizostomæ.

The Dianæa, as formed by Lamarck, are the most complicated Medusæ. Their forms are infinitely varied; and perhaps the difficulty of exactly and definitely characterising them, was the cause which induced that celebrated Professor to unite them into one genus.

These Medusæ are found in the temperate and northern regions of the world. Many species are found on the shores of the Mediterranean and in the gulfs of the Atlantic Seas. They are usually of a small size. Lamarck described eighteen species, amongst which are the following:

1. D. proboscidalis. The umbrella hemispherical, with six lanceolate leaflets, the edge furnished with very long tentaculæ, Ency. Méthod. xcv. 1; Medusa Proboscidalis, Gmelin. Found on the shores of Nice.

2. D. denticulata, Lamarck. Umbrella hemispherical, with thirty-two long teeth on the edge, and furnished internally with eight long tentaculæ. Medusa Pelagica, Bosc, xvii. 3. Found in the Atlantic Ocean.

Peron and Leseur in their Paper on the above cited genera describe many other species, but they do not mention the following:

3. D. cymbalaroides. Umbrella nearly conical, with one long filiform tentacula, bulbose at their base placed on the circumference. Ency. Méthod. xciii. 2. Northern Sea.

DIANCHORA, in Zoology, a genus of shells formed by Sowerby, in his Mineral Conchology, (i. t. 80,) which has hitherto only been found in a fossil state.

By the characters it is nearly allied to the genus Terebratula, and therefore to the Brachiopodes.

Generic character. Shell bivalve, equivalve, adherent; hinge without teeth; the adherent (or dorsal) valve placed at the summit, the other free-curved.

Mr. Sowerby describes two species: D. striata, found in the green sand near Warminster; 2. D. lata, found in the chalk near Lewes.

This genus is very nearly allied, if not the same as Podopsis of Lamarck, which has been placed by most of the French Naturalists with the Ostreadæ; and the same authors have placed the Dianchoræ with Ru- distes or Brachiopodes; but from the manner in which it is attached, and the general structure of the shell, it appears to be more nearly allied to the former family.

Podopsis is the name most usually adopted on the Continent, and Dianchora in England; but the first formed name should certainly be adopted.

DIANELLA, in Botany, a genus of the class Hexandria, order Monogynia, natural order Narcissi. Generic character: corolla six-parted; filaments swelled at the apex; berry three-celled, cells four-seeded.

A genus divided from Dracæna, containing nine species, natives of Tropical climates.

DIANTHUS, in Botany, a genus of the class Decandria, order Digynia, natural order Caryophylleæ. Generic character: calyx cylindrical, of one leaf, with about four scales at the base; petals five, furnished with claws; capsule cylindrical, one-celled.

One hundred and twenty species have been described, mostly natives of the Northern hemisphere, many are Alpine. D. armeria, D. prolifer, D. caryophyllus, the Carnation, (the numerous double varieties of which are so generally cultivated,) D. deltoides and D. cæsius, are natives of England. D. barbatus, the Sweet William, is a native of Germany. All the species of Pinks, and their manifold varieties belong to this genus.

DI'APASE, } Minshew says, Diapason or concord
DIAPA'SON. } of all. Fr., Sp. and Lat. Diapason, est concentus omnium in musicâ. Gr. διάπασων, from διὰ, through, πασῶν, omnium. See the Example from Bacon.

> And twixt them both a quadrat was the base,
> Proportion'd equally by seuen and nine;
> Nine was the circle set in heaven's place,
> All which compacted, made a goodly diapase.
> Spenser. Faerie Queene, book ii. can. 9.

> Thou art the mistress to command
> The touch of the most curious hand,
> When every quaver doth embrace
> His like, in a true diapase
> Drayton. The Muses' Elysium, Nymphal 3.

The diapason or eight in musick is the sweetest concord; insomuch, as it is in effect an vnison.
Bacon. Natural History, Cent. 2. sec. 103.

The first stanza [of Dryden's first Ode for Cecilia's day] is vigorous and elegant, though the word diapason is too technical, and the rhymes are too remote from one another.
Johnson. Life of Dryden.

DIAPASON, in Music, is the interval or concord of an octave, so called because it contains all the diversities of sound. The proper compass of a voice or instrument is termed its Diapason. The open Diapason stop in an Organ is the range of metallic pipes, generally gilt, in its front. It is the foundation upon which the full Organ is constructed. The shut Diapason stops are square wooden pipes, plugged at the upper end, and movable. Diapason is also the scale or rule by which musical instrument-makers adjust the pipes of organs, and the holes of wind instruments. Bell-founders have likewise a Diapason to regulate the size, thickness, and weight of bells.

DIAPASM, Gr. διάπασμα, from διάπασσ-ειν, inspergere. "Diapasms are aromatic herbs dried and reduced to powder; they were formerly made into little balls with sweet water, and strung together as here, or worn loose in the pocket. This is the 'pomander chain,' mentioned just below." Gifford, Note on Ben Jonson.

Per. I come, sir. There's an excellent diapasme in a chaine too, if you like it.
Ben Jonson. Cynthia's Revells, act v. sc. 4.

DIAPENSIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Pentandria, order Monogynia. Generic character: calyx five-leaved, imbricated, leaflets three; corolla salver-shaped, border five-cleft, flat; stamens inserted into the tube of the corolla; capsule three-celled, three-valved, many-seeded.

One species, D. Lapponica, native of the mountains of Lapland. Persoon.

DIAPERIS, in Zoology, a genus of Heteromerous Coleoptera, belonging to the family Diaperidæ.

Geoffroy established this genus with the following characters: antennæ club-shaped, joints lenticular, united by their centres; thorax convex and edged. Latreille has given the following improved

Generic character. Antennæ gradually enlarging towards the end, perfoliated near the whole length; longer than and inserted on the lateral edge of the head; head prominent, body very convex, nearly hemispherical; elytra horny.

Linnæus placed the Diaperides in the genus Chrysomela, and De Geer with the Tenebrios.

In their larva state these insects live in, and when perfect are usually found on large and fleshy Fungi.

The males of several of the species are armed with two horns or eminences on the front of their head. There are many species described. The following is the type of the genus, and is found in England:

D. boleti, Geoffroy, History of Insects, t. 6, f. 3.
Common in putrid Boleti about London.

DI'APRE, v. } "Fr. diaprer; to diaper, flourish, di-DI'APRE, n. } versifie with flourishing." Cotgrave.
DI'APRE, adj. } Skinner mentions the conjecture that this word owes its origin to the town of Ipre, in Flanders; but adds that there is no reason given for believing that Ipre was more famous for this manufacture than any other town. Dr. Anderson revives the conjecture, and Warton adopts it. The word they suppose was originally written D'ipre. In confirmation, Warton quotes from Chaucer's Wife of Bath, v. 450.

> Of cloth making she had such a haunt,
> She passed them of Ipre, and of Gaunt, (i. e Ghent.)

Skinner proposes Fr. divaire, to variegate. Du Cange, the It. diaspro, jasper. "Diapred, embroidered, diversified. Rich cloth embroidered with raised work we call dipre, and from thence Diaper, and to do this, or any work like it, was called, to Diaper, whence the participle." See Warton's History of English Poetry, i. 176. N. y.

> ——— A stede bay, trapped in stele,
> Covered with cloth of gold, diapred wele.
> Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2160.

They of the towne demed surely that they had been mérchaũts, come thyder to the fayre to haue bought cloth and dyaper, for they said they came fro Mounte Pellier to bye marchandyse.
Lord Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. ch. 119.

> Aut. Whate'er the wanton spring,
> When she doth diaper the ground with beauties,
> Toils for, comes home to autumn.
> Ford. The Sun's Darling, act iv. sc. 1.

> Not any damsell, which her vaunteth most
> In skilfull knitting of soft silken twine;
> Nor any weauer, which his worke doth boast
> In diaper, in damaske, or in lyne.
> Spenser. Muiopotmos.

DIAPRE. — DIAPHORETICK.

That other glittering armie with milk-white diaper coates, must be died red in bloud, when they come to strokes, and to try it out with dint of sword. Holland. Livie, fol. 381.

I have as good diaper, made by some of my tenants nigh Armagh, as can come to a table, and all other cloth for houshold uses.

Locke. Works, vol. iii. fol. 552. Letter from Mr. Molineux to Mr. Locke, Sept. 26, 1696.

DIAPER is chiefly used as a common sort of table linen; and wherever it was first made, no manufactories of it in the present day (and it seems much earlier also by the passage cited above from Locke) exceed those of Ireland.

DIAPHANE'TY, DIA'PHANOUS. Gr. διὰ, through, and φαίνειν, to shine. "Fr. diaphaner; to clear, brighten, make transparent."

As for its diaphanity or perspicuity, it [Chrystall] enioyeth that most eminently: and the reason thereof is its continuity; as having its earthly and salinous parts so exactly resolved, that its body is left imporous and not discreted by atomical terminations.

Sir Thomas Brown, book ii. ch. i.

Hence it is, that they who consider the preciousness and scarcitie of time, make it their study how to stay it, as it were, in passing, which is to be done after the manner that corporal reflections are made, by staying the light from passing through a diaphanous body; because transparent matters retain not the images set before them.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 4. sec. 2.

And because the outward coat of the eye ought to be pellucid to transmit the light, which, if the eyes should always stand open, would be apt to grow dry, and shrink, and loose their diaphaneity, therefore are the eyelids so contrived as often to wink, that so they may as it were glaze and varnish them over with the moisture they contain, there being glandules on purpose to separate a humour for that use, and withall wipe off whatever dust or filth may stick to them. Ray. On the Creation, part ii. p. 299.

It seem'd not absurd to imagine, that upon the rushing of the air out of the receiver into the emptied cylinder, the air in the receiver being suddenly and vehemently expanded, the texture of it was as suddenly altered, and the parts made to shift places (perhaps some of them change postures,) as during their new and vehement motion, and their varied situation, to disturb the wonted continuity, and so the diaphaneity of the air.

Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 92. New Experiments touching the Spring of the Air.

The eyes of spiders, (in some four, in some six, and in some eight,) are placed all in the fore front of the head, which is round, and without any neck, all diaphanous and transparent, like a locket of diamonds.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. ii. (note 9.)

——— Oft the jasper's found
Green, but diaphanous.

Sir William Jones. Works, vol. iii. p. 32. The third Discourse on the Hindus.

DIAPHOREA, in Botany, a genus of the class Monoecia, order Monodelphia. Generic character: male flower, calyx, glume one-flowered, three-awned; corolla two-valved, awnless; stamens ten: female flower, as the male, stigmas three, one-seeded, three-angled.

One species, D. Cochin-Chinensis, native of Cochin-China. Loureiro.

DIAPHORE'TICK, n. DIAPHORE'TICK, adj. DIAPHORE'TICAL. "Fr. dissolving or evaporating humours." Cotgrave.

Gr. διαφορητικὸς, from διαφορ-εῖν, to dissipate, to disperse.

And whereas I intended it only for a diaphoretick to cast him into a breathing sweat, it hath had upon him all the effects of a vomit.

Marvell. Works, vol. ii. p. 247. The Rehearsal Transposed.

It may work upon the mind, as physitians say, those kind of diaphoretical medicines do upon the body, the which although they do not produce any violent sweat, yet they clense by opening the pores, and keeping the body in a continued transpiration and breathing out of the malignity.

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 6. sec. 3.

Those that believe that all diaphoreticks must consist of subtile, sapid, and fugitive parts, as if only such were easily separated from each other, and agitated by the gentle heat of a human body, will scarce expect that any body could, in a moderate dose, be a good sudorifick, that is so fixt as to be able to persist divers hours in a good fire.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 194. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5.

Take of vipers reduced to fine powder one ounce, diaphoretic antimony half an ounce.

Id. Ib. vol. v. p. 387. Receipt 86.

And though I seldom take (for I often give more) above two or three grains at a time, yet in that small dose it usually proves diaphoretical to me the next morning.

Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 136. The Usefulness of Natural Philosophy, part ii. ess. 5.

DIAPHORETIC medicines are distinguished from Sudorifics, inasmuch as the former act by insensible perspiration only. The stimulating Diaphoretics are heat alone, or assisted by aromatic herbs, spices, wine, cider, beer, fermented spirits, or volatile alkali; cold water taken internally, or affused during the paroxysm of a fever; acid drinks, as whey, &c.; Mercurials, arsenic, Serpentaria, (snake root,) Contrayerva, (birthwort,) Mezereon, (spurge laurel,) guiacum, gentle exercise, frictions, plasters of burgundy pitch, Euphorbium or cummin seed, and blisters. The relaxing Diaphoretics, which are far more powerful in their operation, are opium, antimonials, ipecacuanha, &c. Diaphoretics of each class are employed respectively during the intervals of intermitting or continued fevers, in rheumatism, hæmorrhages, measles, catarrh, dysentery, nervous and spasmodic disorders. In all these complaints they are highly useful at various stages; but as their effects are debilitating, if they are immoderately employed, they must be applied with particular caution.

DIAPHRAGM, Gr. διάφραγμα, from διαφράσσ-ειν, διὰ, φράσσ-ειν, sepire; It., Sp. and Lat. diaphragma; "Fr. diaphragme; the midriffe; a long and round muscle, whereby the vital parts are separated from the natural, and the heart and lights from the stomach and nether bowels." Cotgrave.

Respiration, or that motion of the diaphragma, and other muscles which causes it, (there being no sufficient mechanical accompt given of it,) may well be concluded to be always a vital motion, though it be not always animal.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 161.

He cut away the ribs, diaphragm, and pericardium of a dog; also the top of the wind-pipe, that he might tie it on to the nose of a pair of bellows; and by blowing into the lungs, he restored the dog to life.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. vii. note 1.

The air which in respiration these receive into their lungs, may serve to render their bodies equiponderant to the water; and the constriction or dilation of it, by the help of the diaphragm and muscles of respiration, may probably assist them to ascend or descend in the water, by a light impulse thereof with their fins.

Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 27.

The liver is fastened in the body by two ligaments; the first, which is large and strong, comes from the diaphragm, and penetrates the substance of the liver.

Paley. Natural Theology, ch. xi.

DIA-PHRAGM. — DIAR-RHOEA.

The DIAPHRAGM has been called by various different names. By Hippocrates and other Greek medical writers φρένες, a sense in which Homer also appears to have employed that word. By Pliny, præcordia. We find it also termed diazoma, disseptum, hypozoma, septum transversum, cinetus, succingens membrana, and discrimen thoracis et ventris. The name likewise has been applied by some of the ancients to the division between the mouth and the œsophagus, Diaphragma in œsophago; by Galen and Rufus Ephesius to the cartilaginous partition between the nostrils; and by the moderns to the septum scroti. All the different modes of respiration, as laughing, crying, sighing, hiccuping, &c. result from action of the Diaphragm.

DIAPRIA, in Zoology, a genus of Hymenopterous insects, belonging to the family Ichnumonidæ, established by Latreille, and placed by him in the tribe Oxyura of the Animal kingdom.

Generic character. Antennæ inserted near the forehead, curved, of fourteen joints in the male, and of twelve in the female; jaws three or four-toothed; maxillary palpi long, filiform, formed of five joints; labial palpi formed of three joints, the last largest; wings destitute of wing-bones.

The genus Diapria of Latreille perfectly corresponds with the genus Psilus of Jurine, described in his Classification of Hymenoptera, p. 317.

These insects are peculiar on account of their large wings, which are entirely destitute of any nerves, and consequently do not offer any radial or cubital cells; the body is narrow; the head nearly spherical and vertical; with two antennæ which are longer than the body, and filiform, or only slightly thickened at the end; the thorax is cut in front, polished above, and furnished with a prominent escutcheon; the legs are generally very short, with very thick club-like thighs; the abdomen is pedicelled and more or less conical; and the female is furnished with a tubular oviduct placed at the end of the point of the belly. The Diapriæ walk slowly, and are found on plants, walls, and in the windows of rooms.

Several species have been described, among which are the following, which are the most interesting:

1. D. Boscii, Audien; the Psilus Boscii, of Jurine. This species was first described by Jurine, who discovered it in the month of June on some umbelliferous flowers; it is small, black, and smooth; the first ring of the abdomen is lengthened into a solid horn, formed of a jointless piece, rounded at the end, and recurved at the base, so as to be prolonged in front beyond the head; it does not touch the body of the insect; it is enclosed in a groove which it exactly fits; it is formed in the upper part of the thorax and head. Jurine paid very great attention to the habits and manners of this insect, but could not discover the use of this spine, for the immobility of the body scarcely permits it to be used as an organ of defence.

2. D. verticillata, Latreille; the Psilus elegans, of Jurine, who has given a very beautiful figure of this species in his Work above quoted. It is very remarkable for its antennæ being formed of a necklace of grains, each surrounded by a fringe of hairs.

According to Jurine the females of several species of this genus are apterous, and perhaps they may even be abortive.

DIARRHOEA, Fr. diarrhée; It. and Sp. diarrhea; Lat. diarrhœa; Gr. διάῤῥοια, from διαῤῥεῖν, from διὰ, and ῥέ-ειν, fluere, to flow.

Diarrhœas, and though more seldom, even dysenterical ones, are happily and easily cured, as I have sometimes known by the bare use of so slight a remedy as milk, wherein whilst it is gently boiling, an equal quantity of fair water is little by little put, till at last there remains but as much liquor as the milk alone amounted to at first.

Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 113. The Advantages of the Use of Simple Medicines, sec. 3.

He answered, Your hopes are groundless. An habitual diarrhœa of more than a year's standing would be a very bad disease at any age: at my age it is a mortal one.

Letter from Adam Smith to William Strachan, Esq. in Hume's History of England, vol. i.

DIARY, Fr. diaire. Est libellus, in quo acta unuscujusque diei describuntur. Minshew. Lat. diarium. A record, or an account of daily occurrences.

Herewith I present your lordship with a compleat diary of your own late legation, which hath cost me some toil and labour.

Howell. Letter 19. book i. sec. 6.

I presume I need not tell your lordship that the chief use of this travelling baroscope is, that he that uses it in a remote part, keeping a diary of the heights of the mercury, by comparing these heights with those at which the mercury stood at the same times in the barometer that was not removed, the agreement or difference of the weight of the atmosphere in distant parts may be observed.

Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 222. New Experiments touching the Spring of Air.

The earl seems to have had in his service another painter, one Harrison, now only known to us by a chronologic diary, in which he records particulars relating to old Parr, whom Lord Arundel had a curiosity to see.

Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. ii. p. 129.

DIASTOLE, so written in Fr., It., Sp., and Lat.; Gr. διαστολὴ, from διαστέλλειν, to separate, to disjoin. The dilatation of the heart.

Now as we have no voluntary imperium at all, upon the systole and diastole of the heart, so are we not conscious to ourselves of any energy of our own soul that causes them.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 161.

That the motion of all muscles consists in constriction, is not to be doubted also. By which means the systole is easily accounted. But, forasmuch, as the heart hath no antagonist muscle, the diastole hath puzzled the greatest wits.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book iv. ch. vii. note 1.

As for example, that of gravity or the tendency of bodies downward, the motion of the diaphragm in respiration, the systole and diastole of the heart, which is nothing but a muscular constriction and relaxation, and therefore not mechanical, but vital.

Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 48.

DIASTOPORA, in Zoology, a genus of Corals of the order Reticulata, belonging to the division of Corals which are entirely stony, and furnished with little cells, not furnished with plates.

Generic character. Body formed of flat plates, polymorphous; branches fistulous, covered on one face with tubular cells, which are isolated and distinct one from another, and rather prominent. This genus is intermediate between the genus Pherusa, Elzerina, and Eschara.

Only one species of this genus is at present known, which was described by the late Professor Lamaroux in the French edition of Ellis's and Solander's Corals, lxxiii. 1, 34, under the name of Diastopora foliacea.

This species was found in the Tertiary formation, near Caen in Normandy.

DIASTYLIS, in Zoology, a genus of Crustacea, established by Mr. Say, in the Journal of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia.

DIAR-RHOEA. — DIA-STYLIS.

DIA-STYLIS. DIAZONA.

Generic character. Feet bifid; antennæ destitute of accessory scales; tail with a single bifid style on each side of the first segment; second segment ending by a simple style.

The name of this genus is derived from its caudal appendices. Mr. Say describes one species, and considers that Cancer Scorpoides, and perhaps Cancer Esca, of Gmelin, belong to this genus. It is allied to Mysis and Nebalia.

D. arenarius, Say, l. c. Inhabiting the coast of Georgia and Florida, Mr. Say considers as very much allied to Cancer Scorpoides of Montague.

DIATOMA, in Botany, a genus of the class Dodecandria, order Monogynia. Generic character: calyx berry-formed, eight-cleft; corolla, six or seven petals, notched; berry round, one-seeded.

One species, D. brachiata, a large tree, native of the woods of Cochin-China. Loureiro.

DIATOMA, in Natural History, a genus of the family Fragillariæ, belonging to the order Arthroidea, which is intermediate between the animal and vegetable kingdom.

Generic character. Filaments simple, very compressed, at length separating at the joints, and only remaining attached to one another at their opposite angles, so as to present a zig-zag figure.

Bory St. Vincent, in his Manuscript, established this genus under the name of Archimedea on account of its geometrical form, in memory of Archimedes; but De Candolle, in his Flora of France, published it under the above name, which has been very properly adopted by M. Bory.

The Diatomæ are very small, and form a kind of slimy, velvet coat on the surface of Marine or Fresh Water Plants. When they are dry the turfs are silvery, green, and brilliant.

Six or seven species have been described, four of which are natives of England. They are described in Gray's Natural Arrangement of British Plants, p. 293, and among them are the following:

1. D. flocculosa. Fresh-water; threads hyaline, forming brownish turfs; joints rather broader than long, transversely streaked, band pellucid. Conferva flocculosa, Roth. Cat. p. 192; English Botany, t. 1761.

2. D. marina. Marine, threads simple in turfs, yellowish; joints half as long again as broad, with ovate, transverse granules. Lyngbye, Hyd. Dan. t. 180. On Marine Plants.

DI'ATRIBE, DI'ATRIBIST. Lat. diatribe; Gr. διατριβὴ, from διατρίβειν, διὰ, and τρίβ-ειν, terere, terere tempus. The word appears to have been applied to a prolonged or renewed discussion or examination of any thing.

> But I that am not yet by all his diatribe so instructed, or improved, as to discern one real misadventure in those discourses, find it impossible for me to be edified by this his charity.
> Hammond. Works, vol. ii. part iv. fol. 136.

> And the same I desire may introduce my address to this diatribist, and the tasks by him set before me, the subjects which he hath chosen to consider with me being such, as well deserve some care from each of us, that we neither deceive others, nor ourselues in them.
> Id. Ib. fol. 134.

DIAZONA, in Zoology, a genus of Mollusca, belonging to the order Tunicata, established by Savigny in his Mémoires of Avertebrose Animals, belonging to the [illegible]thyæ.

Generic character. Body aggregate, sessile, gelatinous, forming a common system, orbicular; animals, very prominent, placed in many concentric circles, mouth cut into six regular and equal rays; anus like the mouth; thorax, or branchial cavity, oblong, cylindrical; branchial sac not plaited, ending by simple tentaculæ; abdomen inferior, longly pedicelled, smaller than the thorax; liver scarcely distinct; end of the pylorus not extended to the anus; ovary solitary, unique.

This genus is very nearly allied to Polyclinum, and indeed Cuvier united it to that genus; it only contains one species.

D. violacea, Savigny, t. 2, f. 3, and t. 12. Body wineglass-shaped, with a common bore; whitish, tinted with blue, with the ends of the tubercles pale purple. Found in the Mediterranean Sea near Port Ivica.

DIB, v. DI'BBLE. To dib or dibble is to dip, (q. v.) Dible, the diminutive, is a small tool with which plants are dipped into the ground; and thus planted.

> And this way of fishing we call daping, dabbing, or dibbing; wherein you are always to have your line flying before you—up or down the river, as the wind serves—and to angle as near as you can to the bank of the same side whereon you stand.
> Walton. Angler, part ii. ch. v.

> These, I think I told you before, we commonly dape, or dibble with.
> Id. Ib. part ii. ch. vii.

> Yet for all this there comes another strange gardener that never knew the soil, never handled a dibble or spade to set the least pot-herb that grew there, much less had endur'd an hour's sweat or chillness, and yet challenges as his right the binding or unbinding of every flower, the clipping of every bush, the weeding and worming of every bed, both in that and every other garden thereabout.
> Milton. Animadversions upon Remonstrants' Defence, &c.

In districts in which labour is cheap, and particularly in the Counties of Norfolk, Cambridge, and Suffolk, corn and other seed-crops are very generally set by the DIBBLE. A man carries a Dibble in each hand, and walking backward makes with them two rows of holes in each furrow, about four inches apart from each other. He is followed by two or three women or children, who drop the seed. About half an acre may be thus sown in a day. A bushel of seed is said to be saved in one acre by this process; but the additional expenses of sowing exceed this saving. It is also allowed that the crop thus produced is stronger and more productive. Bacon mentions, that in his time attempts had been made to plant wheat, but that it had been abandoned on account of the expense, notwithstanding its undoubted advantages. (Sylva Sylvar. cent. 5. sec. 442.)

DICÆLUS, in Zoology, a genus of Coleopterous insects, belonging to the family Carabidæ, established by Bonelli in his Entomological Observations.

Generic character. Jaws pointed, prominent, fourth joint of the palpi very much dilated at the extremity, triangular; thorax unequal, very large at the base, and nicked before and behind.

This genus is proper to North America. The insects are remarkable for their large size, and being rather pointed behind, like Carabus frigidus and Cisteloides of Fabricius.

The elytræ are soldered together, and there are no wings. The head is provided with two considerable impressions, which are very characteristic.

This genus has considerable resemblance to Livinus and Badista.

Bonelli describes four species, two of which were brought from Carolina by Bosc; viz. D. purpuratus and D. violaceus.

DICALIX, in Botany, a genus of the class Polygamia, order Dioecia. Generic character: hermaphrodite flower, calyx double; corolla wheel-shaped; filaments, nearly one hundred; style one, seed-vessel a drupe, situated between the two calyces.

One species, D. Cochin-Chinensis, a large tree, the wood of which is used for building, native of Cochin-China. Loureiro.

DICE, v.
DICE, n.
DI'CER, DI'CING,
DICE-BOX,
DICE-HOUSE,
DICE-PLAY,
DICE-PLAYER,
DI'CING-HOUSE,
DI'CING-MONEY.

Vossius says, Dadus et detius, tesseram notant, quæ Italis et Hispanis, Dado, unde dadus; Gallis de, vel det, unde detius." De Vitiis, l. ii. c. 5.

Junius says, perhaps from the Gr. δίκ-ειν, jacere, to throw or cast. Skinner prefers the Lat. datum, i. e. delivered or thrown from the hand. And Menage Dado, corrupted from datus.

And Danyell þe dees pleyere.
Piers Ploukman. Vision, p. 131.

Hit ben þe Deviles dicours, to drawe men to synne.
Id. Ib. p. 130.

Loke eke how to the King Demetrius
The King of Parthes, as the book sayth us,
Sent him a pair of dis of gold in scorne,
For he had used hasard therbeforne.
Chaucer. The Pardoneres Tale, v. 12557.

He yeueth his graces vndeserued,
And fro that man whiche hath him serued,
Full ofte he taketh away his fees,
As he that plaieth at the dice.
Gower. Conf. Am. book i. fol. 8.

Againe they dice as fast, the poorest rogues of all
Will set them down in open field, and there to gaming fall.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. George Turberuile, vol. i. fol. 388.

The Lacedemonians sent an ambassade to the citie of Corinthe, to haue with them aliance: but whan the ambassadours founde the princis and counsaylours playenge at dyse, they departed without exploytynge their message, sayenge, that they would not maculate the honour of theyr people with suche a reproche, to be saide, that they had made aliaunce with diars.
Sir Thomas Elyot. Governour, book i.

The sayd hoost of Flemynges aualyd y^e moût in a secret wyse as mẽ of warre myght, and drewe theym towarde the Frenshemen, which thenne were vnarmed, and in theyr disportes of dysynge and playinge at the chesse and other gamys.
Fabyan, Anno 1377.

There is such dicing-houses also, they say as had not beene wont to be, where young gentlemen dice away their thrift, and where dicing is, there are other follies also.
Latimer. Sermon 5. Before King Edward.

A carder, or dicer, a drunkard, or such like that prayeth, his prayer hath no effect, as long as hee is in purpose of sinne he cannot pray, and when he cannot pray he is unarmed, he hath not those weapons of which Saint Paul speaketh here.
Id. Ib. Sermon 3. fol. 202.

As for the rumour that run of his dice-playing he bashed no whit thereat; and he played simply without art and openly for his disport, even when he was well stricken in years.
Holland. Suetonius, fol. 70. Octavius Cæsar Augustus.

And if the consequent of this objection bee now admitted: then men might by the selfe same reason run to brothels, dice-houses, taverns, alehouses, &c.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part ii. act iv. sc. 1.

A niggard churl
Hoarding up dicing-monies for his son.
Randolph. The Muses Looking-glass, act i. sc. 4.

DICE.

Can. 25. Clergymen may not play publicly at ball or other playes, especially with lay men; they shall abstain from dice-playing, and all other games that depend on chance; neither may they bee cherishers, witnesses, or spectators of such as play.
Prynne. Histrio-Mastix, part i. act vii. sc. 3.

Which counsells I would our common dice-players and gamesters would seriously consider.
Id. Ib. part i. act vii. sc. 3.

Or if he believe it unlawful to play at cards or dice; or that it is forbidden by God's word to let out money at interest: why, in all these cases he may follow his opinion, though it be a false one, without sin.
Sharp. Works, vol. ii. p. 198. A Discourse of Conscience

The lieutennant and Mr. Underhil, who brought him to the Tower, sent for Thomas Robins, alias Morgan, commonly called little Morgan, brother unto great Morgan, of Salisbury-court, the great dicer. Strype. Memorials. Edward VI. Anno 1548.

And it shall be lawful for them within the city of London, and county of Middlesex, to search and examine, by all wayes and means, all manner of suspicious houses, as taverns, ale-houses, and such like, gaming and dicing-houses.
Id. Ib. Anno 1553.

My Lords, it would be a martyrdom to these retired sober women, to be compelled, with elbows bared to the shoulder, to sally forth to the pleasures of the midnight rout, to distribute the cards at loo, or, soaring to sublimer joys, to rattle the dice-box at the games of hazard. Horsley. Speeches, p. 337.

Great antiquity is claimed for the invention of DICE. Herodotus (i. 94) attributes it to the Lydians, in the reign of Atys, the son of Manes, (A. C. 1368.) This people, he says, being oppressed by a grievous famine, thought to relieve themselves, in some degree, by a variety of amusements. Dice were among the instruments of sport which they discovered for that purpose; and so eagerly, adds the Historian, did they addict themselves to these new games, that in pursuit of them they were content to pass every other day in fasting. The ancient Dice were of two kinds, κύβοι, the Latin tesseræ, lepusculi, jacula, quadrantalia, Dice proper; and ἀστραγαλοι, tali, huckle bones. The first had six sides, and in shape and make resembled the modern Dice; the second were not cubical, the ends lengthways were left unmarked, and the four other sides bore 1 and 6, 3 and 4, respectively, opposite to each other. The difference between tesseræ and tali is well described by Erasmus, in his Dialogue Ἀστραγαλίσμος.

An error into which Athenæus has fallen, while referring to the above noticed passage in Herodotus, is somewhat remarkable. He points out as a distinction between the fierce and turbulent spirit of the Iliad, contrasted with the tranquil and pacific tone of the Odyssey, that in the last-named Poem the characters indulge in a variety of amusements, and that amongst others ἀστραγαλίζουσιν; while in the Iliad the heroes, far from adopting any such idle pastimes, employ themselves solely in battle, (i. 15.) It so happens, however, that the only mention made by Homer of ἀστράγαλοι, as employed in gaming, occurs not in the Odyssey but in the Iliad. They are not used in the amusements of the Court of Phæacia, nor by the Suitors of Penelope; but the Spectre of Patroclus, when he appears to Achilles, reminds him of the circumstance through which he was first introduced to the protection of Peleus; namely, that he had been obliged to quit his home for having unintentionally

DICE. killed the son of Amphidamas, ἀμφ' ἀστραγάλοισι χολωθείς, (Il. Ψ. 88.)

It is plain that Athenæus (loc. cit.) considers the reign of Atys to be subsequent to the Trojan war; since he blames Herodotus for assigning the invention of Dice to the Lydians, when, in fact, (he says) they were employed, as Homer informs us, at an earlier period, during the great expedition of the Greeks, Ἡρόδοτος δὲ οὐ καλῶς εἴρηκεν ἐπὶ Ατύος διὰ λιμὸν εὑρεθῆναι τὰς παιδιάς· πρεσβεύει γὰρ τοῖς χρονοῖς τὰ ἡρωϊκά. Whence Athenæus borrowed his chronology it is not easy to say, but it differs widely from that which Larcher has endeavoured to establish in his apparatus to Herodotus. In this he places the reign of Atys 1368 years A. C., and the Trojan war only 1280; thereby exculpating the Father of History from the charge of inaccuracy. This question is discussed at length, and decided against Athenæus, on the authority of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, as well as of Herodotus, in Récherches sur les Rois de Lydie, par M. l'Abbé Sevin, Mém. de l'Ac. des Inscript. v. 231.

Hoffman (in justice to whom it must be admitted that in his laborious and most learned work he is not often found thus tripping,) says (ad voc. Alea) that Palamedes was the inventor of Dice, ut inter alios videre est apud Sophoclem in Tragœdiâ cognomin.

Unfortunately, of the Tragedy of Palamedes, by Sophocles, there remains to us nothing more than two detached words, preserved by Hesychius, ἀκέστρον and ῥόπα; neither of which has the remotest connection with Dice. But Hoffman was misled by Eustathius, who refers to the same Tragedy, and whose words, ἐν δράματι ὁμωνύμῳ, the Lexicographer has translated. The passage cited by Eustathius, ἐφεῦρε, (Palamedes,) πεσσοὺς κύβους τε, plainly belongs to a longer fragment from the Nauplius, not the Palamedes, of Sophocles, to be found in Achilles Tatius, Isag. ad Arati Phænom.; (Brunck, Fragm. Soph. Ναυπλίος, v. 6.) It is remarkable, that in these lines Palamedes is said to have invented his games, like the Lydians, in order to divert the popular attention from the pressure of famine. Pausanias is a better authority than Eustathius for the claim of Palamedes. He notices it in his Phocica, (Ed. Sylburgii, 347;) and in the Corinthiaca, (62,) he mentions a Temple of Fortune, in which Palamedes offered some Dice as his own invention. Strutt (Sports and Pastimes, 270) whimsically enough transforms Palamedes himself into an author, in order to secure his own invention, and cites Palamedes, de Aleâ. Polydore Vergil (xi. 13) leans to the story of Herodotus. Isidorus, (Orig. xviii. 59) adhering to the season of the Trojan war, prefers a Greek soldier to Palamedes, Alea, from whom he thinks the Latin name was derived: it would have been more natural if it had been the Greek name. John of Salisbury, in his Policraticon de nugis Curialium, mentions Alea also, (i. 5;) but, on the whole, he inclines to Attalus Asiaticus, (57.) Plato, in his Phædrus, attributes Dice to a far higher and nobler source than any of these—the Dæmon Theuth, the Mercury of the Egyptians, who lived about Naucratis, and communicated his invention to King Thamus.

We know less of Grecian than of Roman Dice. The last-named people played either with three tesseræ, or with four tali. (Cœl. Rhod. xx. 19.) The box in which they were shaken, very much resembled that of the moderns, and was called fritillus, pyrgus, turris, turricula, phimus, orca, alveolus, Ψηφοβόλος. The best throw (Venus, Basalicus, a Royal Pass) on the tesseræ was three sixes, (κῶος, senio midas,) on the tali, three different numbers; the worst (canis, vulturius, a dog chance) on the tesseræ, three aces, (χίος, κύων, κύβος, unio, monas;) on the tali, three similar numbers; hence the proverb, κῶος πρὸς χίον; and ἢ τρεῖς ἓξ ἢ τρεῖς κύβοι, which may be respectively translated, in the technical language of modern sporting, All Lombard-street to a China Orange, and Neck or nothing. When the talus fell upright on an unmarked side, it was called rectus. Every game of chance was called Aleæ. The Dice were either thrown by themselves, in which case he who threw highest was the winner; or else they were employed in various games played with counters (calculi) jointly with Dice, like modern Backgammon. DICE.

Some account of the games latrunculi, scriptores duodecim, &c. and indeed almost all the lore connected with Dice, may be found in different Chapters of Hyde's most learned and interesting Historia Nerdiludii. Hyde argues for a still higher antiquity, at least as far as Tali are concerned, than any other writer on the subject. There is no reason, he says, and we think him correct, why Adam himself should not have played with them. Salmasius also has exhausted his large stores of erudition on the subject, in some notes, or rather dissertations on the Proculus of Flavius Vopiscus, Hist. Aug. Script. ii. 735—761. See also Dempsteri Paralipomena ad Rosini Ant. Rom. v. 1; Godwyn's Rom. Hist. Anthol. xi. 3—13; and Ἀστραγαλισμοὶ of Erasmus, to which we have referred before.

Gaming has been observed to be a predominant passion among all barbarous nations. The statement of Tacitus, respecting the Germans, (24,) can therefore be no matter of surprise, that, even in moments of sobriety, after every thing else had been lost, they would stake their personal liberty on the hazard of the Dice. The same fact is related of the savage tribes of America, by Charleroix, Journ. Hist. d'un Voyage dans l'Amérique, Lett. 17; and by Lafitau, Mœurs des Sauvages Amériquains, xi. 340.

The Normans are said, by Hyde, (loc. cit.) to have introduced Dice-playing into England; and the practice during the middle ages appears to have been very prevalent throughout Europe. It did not extend itself, however, without much opposition; John of Salisbury, (op. cit.) in the XIIth century, characterised it as "the damnable art of Dice-playing." It is grievous to add, on the authority of a contemporary, Orderic Vitalis, that "Clergymen and Bishops were fond of it." It is to be hoped that they used the precaution of the imaginary Carolus of Erasmus, (ut sup.) Heus Puer, claude ostium et obde pessulum, ne quis subitus interveniat spectator, quo liceat ad satietatem usque ludere.

Hyde, in his Chapter An et quatenus Alea sit licita, has printed some Hebrew Songs against Dicing. During the time of the Crusades, as we learn from William of Newborough, (Chron. iii. 22,) the practice was formally prohibited, and a Decree of the Council of Worcester, in 1290, forbade it to the Ecclesiastics. Nor were there wanting, in later days, many who directed their artillery, with no small zeal, against this destructive sport, as may be seen in A manifest Detection of the most vile and detestable Vse of Dice Play, and other Practices lyke the same, a myrrour very necessary for all younge gentilmen and others sodenly enobled by worldly abūdance, to loke in; newly set forth for their behoufe, with the names of the false dice, in a Dialogue between R and M, by Gillbert Walker, 1552.—The Rocke of Regard, divided into foure parts by George Whetstone, 1576, Whereof the Fourth Part contains The Ortchard of Repentance, in which are discoursed the miserie that follow Dicing, the mischiefs of quareling, the fate of prodigalitie, and the souden overthrowe of foure notable cousners, with divers other morale, natural and tragical discourses, documents and admonitions.—A contention betweene three Brethren, that is to say, the Whoremonger, the Drunkard, and the Diceplayer, to approve which of them three is the worst, by reason that their deceased Father had given his succession from the worst of them Three, a Worke no less profitable than pleasurable to read, for as much as the vilenesse of these three vices is herein set out at large, by Thomas Salter, 1580. And A Glasse for Gamesters and mainely for such as delight in Cardes and Dice, wherein they may see not only the vanitie, but also vilenesse of those plaies plainely discovered and overthrowne by the Word of God, by Thomas Wilcox, 1591. The Legislature also, from time to time, has passed various enactments, with the hope of suppressing the mischiefs of such gambling. Edward III. 39, includes Dice among Ludi vani. By Henry VIII. 28, Dice were seized and burned; (Stow's Annals, 527;) Id. 33, affixes penalties to players, except at Christmas. Charles II. 16; Ann, 9; George I. 30; George II. 12, and 18; are all directed against the practice. Heavy stamp duties are imposed on Dice, and their importation is prohibited.

The materials of which Dice have been made at different times have varied much. At Herculaneum they have been found in ivory and terra cotta. According to Fosbroke, (Enc. of Ant. 604.) who, as usual, so clubs his authorities that it is impossible to examine them, in the middle ages they were made of the bones of enemies killed in battle. The wife of Arden of Feversham presented her paramour with a pair made of silver. (Holinshed; 5 Edward VI. 1551.) Caylus has given tali of brass, ivory, and agate; Lowthorp, a square, flat, iron talus. In the Archæologia, (x.) is engraved a polygonal Die of black basalt, found in Devonshire; and in the same Work, (viii.) is one of jasper, found at Sutton at Howe, near Dartford, in a house once belonging to the Knights Templars. In repairing the pavement of the Hall of the Middle Temple, somewhat more than fifty years since, nearly one hundred pair of small ivory Dice were found, scarcely more than two-thirds of the modern size. (Ibid.)

DICERAS, in Zoology, a genus of Bivalve Mollusca, belonging to the family Chamidæ.

Generic character. Shell inequivalve, adherent; umbones conical, very large, diverging irregularly, spirally twisted; cardinal edge very thick and broad, with a large conical tooth in the hinder edge, and a deep pit on the front part of the right valve; the left valve with a large thick ear-shaped tooth, received in the pit of the other valve, and a pit behind it for the reception of the tooth of the right valve; muscular impressions to the front mostly ear-shaped, and continued by a keel to the end of the umbo.

This singular shell is only known in the fossil state. It was first discovered by De Luc, who found it in the limestone mountains of the Alps, and communicated a description and figure of it to Saussure, who published it in his Travels in the Alps, (i. t. 2, f. 1—4.) Some analogous shells have since been discovered by M. Gillet Laumont in similar limestone at St. Mihill, near Lorraine. Defrance is inclined to consider the specimens which have been found at Mihill, as a distinct species from those which were found by Saussure, but in this opinion he is not followed by several other Conchologists.

The Dicerates have the form of the Isocardia, but they are irregular, and attached like the Chamæ. The umbo of the right valve is generally the largest, and the one most usually by which the shells adhere.

M. Deshayes has described two species:

1. D. Arietina, Lam. Histoire, ii. 91; De Luc, Voy. aux Alpes, 190; Favane. lxxx. 5. Found as above mentioned.

2. D. sinistra, Deshayes; which are usually attached by their left valve. Found in Calvados.

Rudolphi, in his excellent works on the Intestinal Worms, has given the name of Diceras to a genus of these animals, which Gulter had before named Ditrachura.

DICERATELLA, in Zoology, a genus of microscopic animals belonging to the family Trichodiæ.

Generic character. Body free, covered with small hairs, and armed with two tentaculæ in the form of little horns at the end of the body.

This genus is separated from the Cercairia and Leucophra of Muller; the genus is very likely artificial, and each of the two species which it contains may be the types of a new genus; but M. Bory, who has lately paid much attention to these kinds of animals, and who established this genus, is not at present inclined to do, till more is known of the several habits of the class of animals to which they belong.

1. D. triangularis, Bory; Leucophra cornuta, Muller, Infus. 157; Ency. Méthod. xii. 36. This species is found in the beginning of winter in the ditches and lakes. The individuals vary considerably in their shape and size; at first sight they may be confounded with Vorticella polymorpha, like it they change their form under the microscope; but the Molluscules, of which they are formed are always disposed in a bead-like form. When these animals are rotted, the globules of which they are formed separate, and are very like, not quite the same as the green matter of Priestley.

1. D. ovata, Bory; Cerearia ovata, Muller, Infus. p. 128; Ency. Méthod. ii. 17. This species is rare, covered with short hairs, which radiate round the circumference. Brownish; does not change its form so frequently as the former.

DICEROS, in Botany, a genus of the class Didynamia, order Angiospermia. Generic character: calyx five-parted; corolla rather unequally four-cleft, one segment larger; anthers connected, two-parted, spreading; capsule two-celled, two-valved.

Two species, natives of the East Indies. Persoon.

DICHLOSTOMA, in Zoology, a genus of Radiata, nearly allied to the Medusæ. It was established by Rafinesque for some animals found on the coast of Sicily.

Generic character. Body gelatinous, flat; mouth inferior, placed at one end, and furnished with two appendages.

This genus contains only one species, which requires to be more fully examined before it can be accurately classed.

1. D. elliptica, Raf.

DICHONDRE. DICHONDRE, in Botany, a genus of the class Pentandria, order Digynia, natural order Convolvulaceæ. Generic character: calyx five-parted, segments spoon-shaped; corolla shortly bell-shaped, five-parted; stigma peltate; capsule compressed, two-celled, cells one-seeded; seed globular.

DICHROMENA.

One species, D. Carolinensis, a creeping plant, native of North and South America. Nuttall.

DICHOTOMARIA, in Zoology, a genus of Corals, established by Lamarck in the third division of the Polypiers Vaginiformes.

Generic character. Coral plant-like, stem tubular, slightly jointed, forked, covered with a calcareous crust; polype-bearing cell, not distinct. Lamarck describes twelve species, the following is the type:

D. fragilis, Lam. Hist. ii. 145; Tubularia fragilis, Gmelin.

This genus has been divided by Lamaroux into two, under the name of Galaxoura and Liagora; he places the first with his Corallinæ, and the second with the Tubularies, both of which genera are usually adopted.

DICHO'TOMIZE, DICHO'TOMY. } Gr. διχοτομεῖν, to cut into parts, (δίχα, and τέμν-ειν, to cut.)

Now according to these two different notions of nature, the four forementioned forms of Atheism may be again dichotomized after this manner; into such as derive all things from a mere fortuitous and temerarious nature devoid of all order and methodicalness; and such as deduce the original of things from a certain orderly, regular, and artificial, though senseless nature in matter. Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 139.

Certainly a triviall invention, and an infinite prejudice to sciences; for these dichotomists when they would wrest all things to the laws of their method, and whatsoever doth not aptly fall within those dichotomies they would either omitt or bow contrarie to their naturall inclination; they bring it so to passe, that the kernels and graines of sciences leape out, and they claspe and inclose onely the drie and empty huskes. Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, book vi. ch. ii. sec. 1.

Our Saviour said to Pilate, "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell thee?" And all things reported are reducible to this dichotomie: 1. The fountain of invention; 2. the channell of relation. Fuller. Worthies, vol. i. ch. xxiii.

Dichotomy now is rarely used, unless by Astronomers to signify that phase of the Moon wherein she shows half her disk. The apparent Dichotomy is exhibited for a whole hour.

DICHROA, in Botany, a genus of the class Dodecandria, order Tetragynia. Generic character: calyx four-toothed; corolla, petals five, lanceolate, berry calyculate, four-celled, many-seeded.

One species, D. febrifuga, a medicinal plant, native of the mountains of China. Loureiro.

DICHROMA, in Botany, a genus of the class Triandria, order Monogynia, natural order Cyperoideæ. Generic character: spike capitate, involucrate, scales on all sides imbricated into sessile crowded spikelets, the lower scales empty; corolla none; style setaceous, two-cleft; seed without setæ, somewhat lenticular, rugose, terminated by the triangular persistent base of style.

A genus allied to Scirpus, containing six species, natives of North America. Nuttall.

DICHROMENA, in Botany, a genus of the class Triandria, order Monogynia, natural order Cyperoideæ. Generic character: spike ovate; glumes imbricated; corolla none; stigmas two; style bristly; seed naked, rugged. DICHROMA. DICHROMENA.

Three species, natives of the West Indies and North America.

DICKER, Minshew thinks from δεκάς, a quantity of ten of any commodity. Archdeacon Nares refers to Fragm. Antiq. p. 192.

DICKSONIA, in Botany, a genus of the class Cryptogamia, natural order Filices. Generic character: sori punctiform, marginal, roundish, and distinct; indusium double, one, superficial, opening outwards; the other marginal, opening inwards.

A genus of Tropical Ferns of about sixteen species. D. integra, native of St. Helena, and D. arborea, native of the South Sea Islands, are arborescent.

DICRANUM, in Botany, a genus of the class Cryptogamia, natural order Musci. Generic character: capsule oblong; fringe of sixteen flat cloven teeth, a little reflexed.

A numerous genus of Mosses; forty-one species are natives of England. Eng. Bot.

DICROCERUS, in Zoology, a genus of Annelides, established by Rafinesque in his Prédris des Decouvertes semiologiques, pl. 3, arranged in his class Helmintosia.

Generic character. Body filiform; eyes two; antenna two, placed on the head; sides destitute of bristles.

Only one species has been described.

D. rubescens, Raf. Reddish, head blunt, tail acute, rings larger than broad. Found on the shores of Sicily.

From this very short description it is almost imposible to recognise the animal, but it is most likely nearly allied to Nereides.

DICTAMNE, the herb Dittany, and so pronounced in the Example below. Pennyroyal.

And whilst I wander like the wounded deere,
That seekes for dictamne to recure his scarre.
And come to the whom I hold onely deere,
Thou dost (fierce faire) at my disaster scarre.
Stirling. Aurora. Song 5.

Dictamnus, in Botany, is a genus of the class Decandria, order Monogynia, natural order Rutaceæ. Generic character: calyx five-leaved; petals five; spreading filaments sprinkled with glandular spots; capsules five, coalescing.

One species, D. Fraxinella, of which there are two varieties, the white and red, frequently cultivated in gardens; the calyx and flowers are covered with glands containing a resinous matter; in the evening of a fine day in summer, if a lighted candle is brought near the plant an explosion with flame is produced. See Nicholson's Journal, vol. xxix. p. 66.

Goats and Stags were thought by the ancients to be much indebted to the Dictamnus, the taste of which enabled them to shed and shake out any weapon with which they had been wounded; just as Æneas, by a similar application from his mother, was instantaneously relieved from the troublesome arrow which had so obstinately resisted the chirurgical power, the Apollinean drugs, and the tenacious forceps of the disappointed and wondering Iapis, (Æn. xii. 391,) Aristotle, (Hist. An. ix. 8,) Theophrastus, (ix. 16,) Cicero, (de Nat. Deor. ii.) and Virgil, (loc. cit.) mention this of Goats. Pliny (viii. 41, and xxv. 58) of Stags. Apuleius (lxxii. 3) of both. Besides this, the Dictamnus has other medical virtues of great power, which are recorded by Pliny, (xxvi. 90.) Woe be to that incautious husband who brings it into his consort's bedchamber while he is in expectation of an heir, until the full months have expired! He who is troubled with corns, or has run a thorn into his toe, if he believes in Dioscorides (iii. 37) or Priscian (i. 13,) will hasten to macerate the leaves or the roots of Dictamnus, and apply them to the soles of his feet.

DICTAMNUS. — DICTATE.

DI'CTATE, v.
DI'CTATE, n.
DICTA'TION,
DICTA'TOR,
DICTATO'RIAL,
DICTA'TORSHIP,
DICTA'TORY,
DICTA'TURE,
DICTA'TRIX,
DI'CTAMEN.

Fr. dicter; Sp. dictar; It. dettare; Lat. dictare, from dicere, to say or speak. Dictator, a dictando, quia crebro diceret, ediceret*que*, quæ utilia essent reipublicæ. Vossius.

To say, speak, tell, proclaim, declare, what shall be done; where, when, and how; what another shall write. To speak or write with authority.

In the kalenders of Januarie, whan the senate deuided the offices, beyng pourueyed of a dictatour, and of two consules yerely incontinente in the thirde place they prouided for foure most excellent barons to defend the saide foure frontiers.

Golden Boke, ch. i.

No, you will dictate wholesome grounds, and sow
Seeds in his mind, as pure as that is now;
Breath in your thoughts, your soul, make him the true
Resemblance of your worth, speak and live you.

Cartwright. To Doctor Duppa.

I hope God hath given me ability to be master of my own passion, and endowed me with that reason, that will dictate unto me what is for my own good and benefit.

State Trials. Trial of Lieut. Col. John Lilburne.

For he proclamed himself Dictator, which office had not been for sixscore years before in use, and made the senate discharge him of all that was past, giving him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy cities, and to build up new as he listed, to take away kingdoms, and to give them where he thought good.

Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 403. Sylla.

In the third place also if you will believe that you have a dictatorian power over all times, and laws past, and present, and so may justify all that you act against them: yet why do you not act against them without such detestable cursings, odious rallings, and unsavoury derisions, as your mouth is perpetually defiled with.

State Trials. Trial of Lieut. Col. John Lilburne.

Your beauty 'twas at first did awe me,
And into bondage, woeful bondage draw me;
It was your cheek, your eye, your lip,
Which rais'd you first to the dictatorship.

Cotton. To the Countess of Chesterfield.

What heresies and prodigious opinions have been set on foot, and maintained to the death, under the pretence of the dictates, and warrant of God's spirit!

Bp. Hall. Rem. p. 148.

Rather, as I hope, for that our English, the language of men ever famous, and foremost in the atchievements of liberty, will not easily find servile letters enow to spell such a dictatory presumption English'd.

Milton. Speech for the Liberty of unlicensed Printing.

Nay the very same antors, who have usurpt a kind of dictature in sciences, and with such confidence past censure upon matters in doubt, have yet (the heat once over) in the lucide intervalles, from these peremptory fits of asseveration, changed their note.

Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, Preface ix.

That is to say, you are to trust to your own particular discourses, as to particular discourses, and no farther; but to the resolves of the church as to the dictamens of a higher understanding, by the light of which you are to judge and censure of the rest.

Lord Falkland, in Hammond's Works, vol. ii. part i. fol. 600.

Though Phalaris's brazen bull were there,
And he would dictate what he'd have you swear,
Be not so profligate, but rather choose
To guard your honour, and your life to lose,
Rather than let your virtue be betray'd!
Virtue the noblest cause for which you're made.

Stepney. Imitations of Juvenal.

DICTATE. — DICTATOR.

Then those who follow'd Reason's dictates right,
Liv'd up, and lifted high their natural light;
With Socrates may see their Maker's face,
While thousand rubric martyrs want a place.

Dryden. Religio Laici. An Epistle.

Did they appeal to Saint Peter as to the supreme dictatour and judge of controversies? not so; but they sent to the apostle and elders at Jerusalem, to enquire about the question.

Barrow. Works, vol. i. part. ii. fol. 45. Of the Pope's Supremacy.

While he was rubbed and wiped, he (the Elder Pliny) was employed either in hearing some book read to him, or dictating.

Melmoth. Pliny to Macer.

The Gentiles, though in their searches after wisdom and knowledge they had fallen into many errors, yet had discovered many excellent truths, and if a judicious collection had been made of the useful doctrines which some or other of them in various times and places had taught, a system of morality might have been drawn up, which would bear no small resemblance to the dictates of the Gospel.

Jortin. Works, vol. i. p. 66. Disc. concerning the Christian Religion.

Long Honour's paths with self-applause pursue,
And keep the founders of your line in view!
Who, like the great dictator, left their plough,
And taught in arms the stubborn Dane to bow.

Boyse. Retirement.

Sometimes, when there is great public danger, as in the case of rebellion within the kingdom, the Habeas Corpus act may be suspended by act of parliament, and the king empowered to imprison suspected persons for a time, without bringing them to any trial: which, as far as it goes, is a sort of dictatorial power.

Beattie. Moral Science, part iii. ch. ii. sec. 4.

But scarcely any man is so steadily serious as not to complain, that the severity of dictatorial instruction has been too seldom relieved, and that he is driven by the sternness of the Rambler's philosophy to more cheerful and airy companions.

Johnson. The Rambler, No. 208.

A still stronger proof of his placing more confidence in his good fortune, than in his atchievements, was his laying down the dictatorship.

Langhorne. Plutarch. Sylla.

Haply it may be said, that any charity is, at any time, the favourite of so capricious a dictatrix of human conduct.

Knox. Works, vol. vi. p. 413. The Support of the Magdalen Hospital recommended.

Strong as was the antipathy of the Romans to the Kingly government, it is remarkable, that in exigencies which required unity of counsel, decision of purpose, and promptitude of execution, they frequently had recourse to a Magistracy more absolute than any legitimate or responsible Monarchy whatever, which they called Dictatura, and the person who exercised it DICTATOR. This title, besides the etymology given above from Vossius, is derived by Varro (de Ling. Lat. lib. iv. xiv.) à dicendo, because he was appointed (dictus) by the Consul. In the war between the Romans and Albans, Metius Fufetius, commander of the latter, is called by Livy (lib. i. 23) Dictator; his office was annual and supreme; and from the Albans, according to Licinius the Annalist, quoted by Dionysius, (Antiq. Rom. lib. v. 74,) the Romans borrowed both the title and the dignity. Dionysius himself, however, inclines to believe that the office originally came from Greece, and corresponded with that of the αἰσυμνῆται, an elective Monarchy, limited only in respect of the period of its exercise. At what time the Roman Dictatorship was first created, or who was the first Dictator, is uncertain; but this very doubt, which Livy has recorded, (lib. ii. 18,) makes it probable that, before twelve years had elapsed from the abolition of the Regal government, a lawless and uncivilized race discovered the impracticability of maintaining society without at least the occasional existence of a supreme head. However this be, the latest date assignable to the Magistracy of Titus Lartius only reaches this period, while Livy's account places it three years earlier. Dangerous as the existence of such a power appears in a Constitution essentially free, and jealously as the subjects of such a Constitution might be supposed to regard it, we find that in the Roman State Dictators were frequently created, sometimes for the most frivolous and superstitious purposes; and that during a period of four centuries the office was uniformly discharged with the most scrupulous integrity. It proved, however, at length the ruin of the Commonwealth, in the persons of Sylla and Julius Cæsar. After the death of the latter, it was abolished by a law of Antony: and Augustus, when intreated to accept it, prudently declined. The abolition, however, came too late; the title of Dictator perished, but its despotism had settled on the nation for ever.

DICTATOR.

The objects for which Dictators were usually created were the following. 1. The administration of a difficult war. 2. To hold the Comitia in certain cases. (See COMITIA.) 3. To appoint religious days for the expiation of prodigies, as was the case when P. Valerius Publicola was elected Dictator, U. C. 410. 4. To preside at the public Games. 5. To hold trials. 6. To drive a nail into the wall of the Capitol, a proceeding which was considered eminently useful in the time of pestilence, or any great national calamity. Although these were the most usual occasions on which a Dictator was considered necessary, we find that, during the second Punic War, when the Senate had been thinned by repeated reverses, Quintus Fabius Buteo was nominated Dictator for the purpose of choosing new Senators; and it is remarkable, that at this time Marcus Junius was also actually Dictator, and commanding an army. But the troubles of that period introduced many irregularities; for after the terrible carnage of Thrasimene, the people created Fabius Maximus Prodictator, in the absence of the Consul, whose office it was to appoint to this Magistracy. This prerogative, however, was once exercised by a military Tribune, in the appointment of Mamercus Æmilius; although not until the Augurs had been consulted on the propriety of violating the general rule. On one occasion, a curious discussion took place on the subject. When the preparations at Carthage to assist Hannibal appeared to be assuming a formidable aspect, the Senate were unwilling that the Consul should remain at Rome to hold the ensuing Comitia, and for that purpose desired him to name a Dictator. The Consul named Marcus Valerius Messala, who was in Sicily. The Senate contended that no Dictator could be appointed out of the Roman territory, and desired him to consult the Commons on the subject, and confirm their decision. This he positively refused to do, since he considered that it would be a surrender of his prerogative. The Tribune Lucretius therefore appealed to the Commons, who created Quintus Fulvius Dictator. The Consul, however, immediately departed for Sicily; so that it became necessary for his colleague to ratify the choice of the Commons.

DICTATOR.

The Dictator was usually chosen after midnight, the auspices being first solemnly taken; but Julius Cæsar and Sylla were created Dictators at the Comitia.

The dictatorial power underwent various circumscriptions, as advancing civilisation and security permitted. At first it was the most arbitrary tyranny conceivable. The Dictator is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus "the supreme disposer of peace, war, and all things beside."* There was no appeal from his decisions, nor was he responsible for his administration. On his appointment all the other Magistrates abdicated their authority except the Tribune of the Commons. Such being the case we can scarcely wonder when we find the dictatorial office regarded as something more than human. (Liv. lib. viii. 34.) Twenty-four Lictores, with the axes and rods, attended the Dictator even within the walls of the city; whereas the Consuls were only allowed twelve: and his state and insignia were precisely those of the Kings, whose very names had become unutterable in Rome. Fabius, than whom never existed a more moderate or patriotic character, when Dictator would not suffer the Consul Servilius to approach him until he had dismissed his Lictors. The principal security which the people at first reserved for the faithful exercise of this enormous power, was the limit of its duration, which could never exceed six months. But such was the public spirit which universally animated the early Romans, that the Dictator usually abdicated his Office as soon as the purposes of his creation were accomplished. The reservation of the public money in the hands of the Senate and People was another salutary restriction. The Dictator was not allowed to go out of Italy; and a show of his dependence on the People was maintained by the necessity imposed on him of asking their permission to mount a horse.

The most powerful check, however, on the dictatorial authority, as on every other counterpoise to the democracy, was the creation of Tribunes of the Commons. According to Polybius, (Hist. lib. iii. 87,) these Magistrates retained their power even during the existence of the Dictatorship. It does not, however, appear that there lay any appeal to them. The Dictator was manifestly excepted from the law of Publicola, which never contemplated the existence of any such power. The laws which were passed by the Consuls Horatius and Valerius, after the abuse of the Decemviral authority, and by M. Valerius, subsequently, are expressly termed by Livy (lib. iii. 60, and lib. x. 14,) renewals of the former statute, and doubtless were intended, in the spirit of that statute never to apply to a case which was essentially an exception and an anomaly. An appeal, however, of this sort was once made.—An officer, called the Magister Equitum, Master of the Horse, always attended on the Dictator. He was created by the Dictator himself, by the Senate, or by the People. Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus enjoyed this office under Lucius Papirius Cursor; and during that period attacked the Samnites and conquered them, in violation of the order of the Dictator. Papirius, with great reason, demanded the vindication of his injured authority; but the soldiers, to whom Fabius had addressed a most inflammatory oration, contrived to secure his escape to Rome. The Dictator, however, followed him; and his father, as a last resource, appealed to the Commons. But Papirius would not allow the appeal for a moment; and though he consented to pardon Fabius, it was in compliance with the request, and not in obedience to the authority of the People. But although the Dictator was thus far independent of the Tribunes, we find that after he had resigned his office, he might lawfully be called to account; as was actually the case with Manlius Imperiosus. These restrictions, however, added to all the jealousy and captiousness of the Tribunes, still left the Dictatorship by far the greatest virtual, as well as nominal authority in the State; and it is the observation of Livy, that, up to his time, wherever it came in collision with that of the Tribunes, it always came off superior, (vi. 38.)

* Πολέμου τε καὶ εἰρήνης καὶ παντὸς ἄλλου πράγματος αὐτοκράτωρ. Dionys. Halic. Antiq. Rom. lib. v. cap. 73.

Before the year of the city 353, the Dictator was chosen from the Patrician Order only, and of these from such only as had been Consuls. The first Plebeian who enjoyed this dignity was Caius Martius Rutilus.

The Dictatorship of Sylla and Julius Cæsar are not to be quoted in illustration of the nature and limits of this office. These ambitious men committed gross violations of all law and equity, and assumed the title only to obtain a Constitutional colouring.

The title of Dictator was given also to the Chief Magistrate of Municipal towns in Italy. And the Roman Dictator is sometimes called Prætor Maximus, and Magister Populi.

A series of the Roman Dictators, fifty-seven in number, may be found in Hoffman, ad voc. Moreri in a like catalogue gives only fifty-four, and differs in a few names.

DICTION, Fr. diction; Lat. dictio, from dicere, dictum. See DICTATE, above.

The style of language in writing or speaking.

We are not wont to require the dictions of the New Testament, which have so much of the Old Testament Hebrew idiom in them, to be tryed by Attical heathen Greek writers: yet shall I not now need to refuse that tryal which is here offered.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. fol. 425. Of the Power of the Keyes.

Concise your diction; let your sense be clear,
Nor with a weight of words fatigue the ear.
Francis. Horace. Satire 10. book i.

Though he [Dryden] wrote hastily, and often incorrectly, and his style is not free from faults, yet there is a richness in his diction, a copiousness, ease, and variety in his expression, which have not been surpassed by any who have come after him.
Blair. Lecture 18. vol. i.

DICTIONARY, Lat. dictionarium; Fr. dictionnaire; It. dizionario; Sp. diccionario. In Dutch, woordenboek.

A book of words, containing (as distinguished from a mere vocabulary) their etymology, meaning, and usage.

O ridiculous birth! a mouse crept out of the mountain! Help grammarians! one of your number is in danger of perishing! The laws of God and of nature are safe; but Salmasius's Dictionary is undone.
Milton. A Defence of the People of England, in answer to Salmasius's Defence of the King.

I am not to blame for quoting the philosophical dictionary of that author, because the design of dictionaries is to show the use of words.
Clarke and Leibnitz, p. 107. Mr. Leibnitz's fourth Paper.

I am not here writing a dictionary, (which yet ought to be done, and of a very different kind indeed from any thing ever yet attempted any where,) but only laying a foundation for a new theory of language.
Tooke. Diversions of Purley, vol. i. p. 401.

A Bibliography of the chief writers about DICTIONARIES is given by Peignot, in his Répertoire Bibliographique Universel, 1810, (ad v. Dictionnaire) and also the names and dates of the principal Dictionaries in most languages; and Marsden, in 1796, published A Catalogue of Dictionaries, Vocabularies, Alphabets, and Grammars.

DIDA'CTICK, DIADA'CTICAL, DIDA'SCALIC. } Gr. διδακτικὸς, that can or may teach or learn; able to teach or learn; from διδάσκ-ειν, to teach. Instructive, directive, sc. of manners or conduct.

I have already discoursed of the integrity of life, and what great necessity there is, and how deep obligations lie upon you, not only to be innocent and void of offence, but also to be holy; not only pure, but shining; not only to be blameless, but to be didactic in your lives; that, as by your sermons you preach in season, so by your lives you may preach out of season; that is, at all seasons, and to all men, that they, seeing your good works, may glorifie God on your behalf, and on their own.
Taylor. Sermon 10. part iii.

We shall not need here to describe out of their didactical writings, what kind of prayers, and what causes of confidence they teach towards the blessed Virgin Mary and All Saints.
Id. Polemical Discourse, fol. 329. A Dissuasive from Popery, part i. sec. 9.

For the apostle proves the necessity of God's revealing these things by his Spirit, v. 10, 11, 12, and then adds that their speaking was not after the didactick way of human wisdom, but of the Holy Spirit, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.
Stillingfleet. Sermon 12. vol. iii.

In all which he displays the glorious state of that kingdom, not in the ordinary way of argumentation and formal reasoning which had no place in an epistle writ as this is, all as it were in a rapture, and in a stile far above the plain didactical way.
Locke. Paraphrase on Ephesians, Synopsis.

Nor shall my rules the artist's hand confine,
Whom practice gives to strike the free design;
Or banish fancy from her fairy plains,
Or fetter genius in didactic chains.
Mason. Fresnoy. Art of Painting.

This useful impression [on the mind] is commonly made in poetry by indirect methods; as by fable, by narration, by representation of characters; but didactick poetry openly professes its intention of conveying knowledge and instruction.
Blair. Lecture 40.

DIDACTRON, see DIDACTICK. The Example explains the word.

A thousand minæ, accordingly, is said by Plutarch in another place, to have been his didactron, or usual price for teaching.
[Smith. Wealth of Nations, book i. ch. x.

DIDAPPER. Skinner says, q. d. Dive-dapper. It is probably merely a reduplication of dip, q. d. dip-dipper. See DAB-CHICK. The little Grebe, Colymbus minor.

Upon this promise did he raise his chin,
Like a di-dapper peering through a wave,
Who being look'd on, ducks as quickly in.
Shakspeare. Venus and Adonis.

LUZ. The misery of man may fitly be compar'd to a di-dapper, who when she is under water, past our sight, and indeed can seem no more to us, rises again; shakes but herself, and is the same she was, so is it with transitory man, this day.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Woman Hater, act iv. sc. 3.

Thou must eat little or no goat's flesh, nor red deer; nor even foal's flesh by any means; and carefully abstain,—that is, as much as thou canst, from peacocks, cranes, coots, didappers and water hens.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, ch. xxxiv.

DIDEL-PHYS.

DIDELPHYS, from the Greek δὶς, twice, and δελφὺς, a womb, Lin.; Opossum, Pen. In Zoology, a genus of animals belonging to the family Pedimana, order Marsupialia, class Mammalia.

Generic character. Ten incisive teeth above, and eight below; seven molar on each side, of which the three first are flattened laterally and pointed; and the four last are multicuspid, the upper triangular, and the lower oblong; mouth very wide; muzzle sharp; ears large and naked; tail prehensile and scaly; five toes on each foot, distinct; the hind thumb long and much separated from the others; abdominal pouch,—its margin only distinct sometimes.

In this genus, according to the arrangement of Linnæus, were included all the Marsupial Animals known in his time, but which subsequent inquiry have very much increased; and their characters being better known, Zoologists have divided them into those of Didelphys, Chironectes, Dasyurus, and Phalangistæ. The Didelphides differ from the Chironectes, in not having the feet webbed; from the Dasyuri, in having the tail prehensile and naked, and more teeth; and from the Phalangistæ, in having all the toes distinct from each other, and unconnected by skin.

Some of the genus possess an abdominal pouch, in which their young are carried; but others have only a fold of skin on each side of the bottom of the abdomen, forming as it were the rudiment of a pouch, and are said to carry their young upon their back: this circumstance has led to their division into two subgenera, and indeed some naturalists have divided them into distinct genera. The number of teeth in this genus is remarkable, as being the greatest found among the Mammalia; their tail is very long and prehensile, so that they are able to swing themselves from tree to tree like the Monkeys.

The Opossums are fetid, nocturnal animals, which move but slowly, and are great enemies to poultry and birds, the eggs of which, as well as the birds, they destroy; they live also upon fruit and nuts, and are omnivorous feeders. All are natives of America.

The mode in which the young animal is conveyed into the abdominal pouch of the parent is not at all understood, as they have not been known to breed in confinement. This bag is proper to the female, which, after the birth of the young, and their introduction into the pouch, closes it so firmly, that it cannot be opened without the greatest difficulty; this power depends upon certain muscles attached to the bones which support the pouch laterally. The Kangaroo, which is a similar animal, has the same power. See MACROPUS.

In the Chalk-pits in the neighbourhood of Paris, the skeleton of a small fossil Didelphys has been found among the remains of the Palæotherium and the Anoplotherium. It was almost perfect, but with the jaws separated. The marsupial bones were distinct, and the remains of the long hind toe proved that it belonged to this genus; at the same time that the molar teeth presented the same characters belonging to this and the Dasyuri. In size it resembled that of the Marine Opossum, but there was a difference in the relative proportions of the bones. The skeleton is preserved in the Museum of the King's Garden at Paris.

α With pouches.

DIDEL-PHYS.

D. Virginiana, Gmel.; le Sarigue à oreilles bicolores, Cuv.; Virginian Opossum, Pen. About the size of a Cat, but of a thicker form; the fur of a dusky white colour, composed of woolly hair, like felt; ears thin, naked, and black, edged with white; head nearly entirely white; tail about thirteen inches long, covered with dusky hair at its root, but the remainder naked and covered with a scaly skin resembling the tail of a Snake, and prehensile; legs short; feet armed with claws, which are sharp, except the innermost, which is rounded like those of the Monkeys; belly whitish, and in the female thirteen teats, of which twelve are disposed in a circle, and one in the centre. It lives in the woods and fields, but at night sallies out in search of its prey, which consists of poultry and their eggs; but it also feeds upon fruits and roots. Its gait is very slow; but, like the Monkeys, it is very ready in getting from the branch of one tree to another, by means of its prehensile tail. The young ones when first littered are said not to weigh more than a grain, and become firmly attached to the teat, upon which they grow; and when they have acquired the size of a Mouse, which is about the fiftieth day, they leave the pouch, but quickly return to it on the slightest alarm; and they do not entirely leave it till they have acquired the size of a Rat. They go with young about twenty-six days. Native of America.

D. Marsupialis, D. Canerivora, Lin.; le Crabier ou Grand Sarigue de Cayenne, Buff.; Cayenne Opossum, Shaw. In size resembling the preceding, but the snout is longer, the mouth wider, and the skin of a yellowish brown colour, mixed with brown hairs, and a brown badge on the forehead; the sides and belly whitish, and the feet brown. It inhabits the marshes on the sea coast, living principally upon Crabs. It is common at Cayenne and Surinam, and in some parts of the East Indies, where it is known as the Aroe Rabbit, and is made use of as food, being considered delicate eating. When taken young it is easily tamed and taught to live on any kind of food.

D. Opossum, Lin.; le Quatre-œil ou Moyen Sarigue de Cayenne, Buff.; Molucca Opossum, Pen. This species, which is not so large, is considered by Dr. Shaw as a variety of the preceding; but it has been described as distinct by Daubenton. It is of a chestnut or yellow colour above, and white tinged with red beneath; over each eye is a yellowish white spot, which has given rise to the French name Quatre-œil; the ears, which are large, round, and thin, have their roots surrounded with whitish hairs; that part of the tail which is hairy is of a brown colour, and the scaly part brown and white; legs and feet white. This species is one of those which were earliest known, and is a native of the hot countries of South America.

β With a longitudinal fold of skin on each side of the belly.

D. Nudicauduta, Geoff.; Naked-tailed Opossum. About the size of the Molucca Opossum, and nearly resembling it in colour. The tail is longer than the body, not at all covered with hair, but slightly spotted with brown. Native of Cayenne.

D. Crassicaudata, Desm.; large-tailed Opossum. Of a yellow cinnamon colour above, brighter above the eyes; the face and feet darker; the tail, which is about the length of the body, is so large for a third of its length from the root, that it appears to form part of the body, and the other two-thirds furnished with black hairs arising between the scales, which are also black, till an inch and a half from the top, where they are white. Native of Paraguay.

DIDEL-PHYS. — DEM-IUM.

D. Cayopollin, Lin.; le Cayopollin, Buff.; Mexican Opossum, Pen. Is about nine inches in length, and the tail longer; the ears are large, long, naked, and transparent; the snout thick, and the whiskers long; colour, above, tawny ash, and beneath, yellowish white; face whitish, with a dark line down the middle, and a black or brown border to the eyes; legs dusky, and claws white; tail covered with hair an inch from the base, and spotted with brown and white. Native of the Mexican Mountains, where it lives among the trees.

D. Lanigera, Desm.; Woolly Opossum. Two individuals of this species only have been observed; the fur is woolly and long, except on the face, where it is very short, the colour, above, resembling that of Spanish snuff, and beneath whitish; the tail of a triangular shape, much longer than the body, and covered with hair, except on the upper surface of its last third which is white. Native of Paraguay.

D. Murina, Lin.; la Marmose, Buff.; Murine Opossum, Pen. This animal is of a small and slender form, with a long and sharp snout, and wide mouth; ears large and rounded; coat of a greyish yellow, above, and pale yellow almost white, beneath; eyes surrounded with a brown edge; tail naked and scaly throughout its whole length. Native of South America, where it is known as the Wood Rat.

D. Tricolor, Geoff.; le Touan, Buff.; Touan. The Touan is a small species of Opossum, the coat of which is of a brownish black on the back, of a bright red on the sides, and white, beneath; tail very short and covered at the base. Native of Cayenne, where it inhabits the woods.

D. Brachyura, Gmel.; Short-tailed Opossum, Pen. Colour of the skin reddish on the back, but becoming lighter on the flanks, and white beneath; the tail not more than half the length of the body. Country unknown.

D. Pusilla, Desm.; Dwarf Opossum. About the size of a Mouse; the ears very straight and rounded; whiskers long; tail whitish, naked, scaly throughout, and very slender; the fur very soft and smooth, like that of the Mouse, of a dark grey colour, above, and white, beneath. Native of Paraguay.

See Linnæi Systema Naturæ, à Gmelin; Buffon, Histoire Naturelle; Cuvier, Règne Animal; Desmarest, Mammalogie; Pennant's History of Quadrupeds.

DIDELTA, in Botany, a genus of the class Syngenesia, order Frustranea, natural order Compositæ. Generic character: calyx double, the exterior part three-leaved, the interior, many-leaved; receptacle bristly; down chaffy, many-leaved.

Two species, D. carnosa, and D. spinosa, natives of the south of Africa. Persoon.

DIDEMNUM, in Zoology, a genus of Polypiers, established by Savigny, allied to Alcyonium.

Generic character. Mass spongy, opaque, milk-white; surface furnished with nipples placed in a quincunx, each teatlike process containing a small polype, with a mouth surrounded by six tentaculæ, and with the body contracted near the middle.

Savigny figures two species of this genus, found on the coast of Egypt, they have likewise lately been found on the coast of Spain.

DIDEM-NUM. — DIE.

DIDRACHM, Gr. δίδραχμον, from δὶς, twice, and δραχμὴ. A double drachm, equal to two Roman denarii or fifteen pence English. See DRACHM.

They went to Peter whom they sawe in maner next about hym, saying: Doeth youre maister (quoth they) pay the didramme or didrachma for trybute, as others doe?

Udall. Matthew, ch. xvii.

The Septuagint reads τὸ ἥμισυ διδράχμου, the half of the didrachm, or half shekel, which is all one with a whole didrachm Attick.

Hammond. Works, vol. iii. fol. 89. Annotation on St. Matthew, ch. xvii.

DIDU'CTION, DIDU'CTIVELY. Lat. diducere, ctum; (dis, and ducere,) to draw apart.

A drawing apart; withdrawing one part from another. Diductively is used by Brown, as deductively.

Now, what is very strange, there is scarce a popular error passant in our dayes, which is not either directly expressed, or diductively contained in this work [Pliny, Natural History] which being in the hands of most men, hath proved a powerful occasion of their propagation.

Sir Thomas Brown, book i. ch. viii.

He ought to shew what kind of strings they are, which, though strongly fastened to the inside of the receiver and superficies of the bladder, must draw as forcibly one as another, in comparison of those that within the bladder draw so as to hinder the diduction of its sides.

Boyle.

DIDYMANDRA, in Botany, a genus of the class Monoecia, order Monodelphia. Generic character: catkin imbricated; hermaphrodite and female flower, calyx and corolla four-parted; filament one, the apex bearing two anthers; germen superior; styles three, very short; berry three-celled, three-seeded.

One species, D. purpurea, a tree, native of Peru. Persoon.

DIDYMELES, in Botany, a genus of the class Dioecia, order Monandria. Generic character: male flowers, two, joined at the base; calyx scaly; corolla none; anthers sessile: female flower, as the male; style none; stigma two-lobed; drupe one-seeded.

One species, D. Madagascariensis, a tall tree, native of Madagascar. Persoon.

DIE, see DICE, above.

Thus through foistinge and coggynge theire die, and other false playe, these new perillous teachers deceive many poore souls, and robbe them of the sure pure simplicitie of their faithe.

Jewel. A Replie to M. Hardinge, fol. 171.

At the last, as men that being a marvellous height from the ground do headlong throw themselves down, closing up their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of danger, crying out these words onely unto them that were by in the Greek tongue, ἀνερρίφθω κύβος: in English, let the die be cast (meaning hereby to put all in hazard and according to our proverb, to set all on six or seven) he pass'd over with his army.

Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 549. Pompeius.

Though the dies falling in such a manner be accidental to him that casts it, yet none will suppose that there is no cause why it falls as it does.

Edwards, (Jon.) On the Freedom of Will, part ii. sec. 4.

DIE, DI'ER, DIE-HOUSE. Sometimes written Dye. "A. S. deag-an, tingere, intingere, inficere, inbuere, colorare. To dy or colour." Somner.

DIE. To tinge, to stain, to steep or dip in any thing, that will tinge or stain; to colour; to give a hue, tinge or colouring to. In Chaucer it is applied to the scent.

The swote smell sprong so wide
That it died all the place about.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 124.

A webbe, a deyer, and a tapiser,
Were alle yclothed in o livere,
Of a solempne and grete fraternite.
Id. The Prologue, v. 364.

Graine that you die scarlet withall is worth the batman ready money, 200. shaughs, reconing the shaugh for 6 pence Russe.
Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. Arthur Edwards, vol. i. fol. 361.

There is a wood called Logwood or Palo Campichio, it is cheape and yeildeth a glorious blew, but our workmen can not make it sure, this wood you must take with you, and see whether the silke diers or wooll diers in Turkey can do it.
Id. Ib. M. R. Hakluyt, vol. ii. part i. fol. 165.

To note their garments and ornaments of houses: and to see their die-houses and the materials & samples that they vse about the same. Id. Ib. vol. i. fol. 442.

And this was of such force, that for the space of five hundred years and more, Lycurgus chief law and ordinances remained in full perfection, as a deep wodded die, which went to the bottom, and pierced into the tender wool.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 65. Lycurgus and Numa.

In like maner in Norffolke there was assembled an huge number of those vnrulie countrie people which vnder the guiding of a dier of cloth, commonlie called John Littester, that had dwelt in Norwich, attempted and did all such vngratious feats, as they had heard that other did in other parts of the realme.
Holinshed. Richard II. Anno 1381.

We also learned in the dye-houses, that cloth being dyed blue with woad, is afterwards by the yellow decoction of woud-wax or wood-wax, dyed into a green colour.
Boyle. Experimental History of Colours, part iii. vol. i. p. 740.

DIE, v. See DEAD, ante. Also written, Dye, q. v.

Þo Hengist ysey Þe Cristene men hym siwe so faste
And Þat he moste nede turne azeyn oÞer deye att laste,
He bigan to ordeyne ys folk. R. Gloucester, p. 139.

Þei receÿued him fulle faire, & were of him blythe.
With him alle, Þei said, Þei wild lÿue and deie.
R. Brunne, p. 45.

God sent to Saul, by Samuel Þe prophete.
Þat Agar of Amalek. and al hus lÿge puple
Sholde deÿe delfulliche. for dedes of here eldren.
Piers Plouhman. Vision, p. 59.

He wente to him & preiede him, that he schulde come doun, and heele his sonne: for he began to dye.
Wiclif. John, ch. iv.

For naked as a worme was she
And if the weather stormy were
For cold she should haue died there.
Chaucer. The Romant of the Rose, fol. 118.

So raisde they eke faire Ledaes warlike twines,
And interchanged life vnto them lent,
That when th' one dies, th' other then beginnes
To shew in heauen his brightnes orient.
Spenser. The Ruines of Time.

And all with ruthfull rage incenst, shee blabbes forth many tales
And diyngeripe with nayles her purple robes in ragges shee hales.
Phaer. Æneidos, book xii.

And the Lorde God commaunded Adam sayinge: Of al trees of the garden se thou eate: but of y^e^ tree of knowledge of good and bad se that thou eate not: for eue^ē^ y^e^ same day thou eatest of it thou shalt dye y^e^ deth. Bible. Anno 1551. Genesis, ch. ii.

To my light scenes I once inscrib'd your name,
And impotently strove to borrow fame;
Soon will that die which adds thy name to mine,
Let me, then, live join'd to a work of thine.
To the Author of the Tragedy of Cato. Richard Steele.

If then there is a divine assistance promised and vouchsafed to every sincere Christian, in proportion to his trials and temptations, he has none but himself to blame, if he prefers a bad influence to a good one, and lets the adversary of his soul be harkened to more than him that created it, and died to redeem it.
Pearce. Sermon 18, vol. ii. DIE. — DIEPPE.

There taught us how to live; and (oh, too high
The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.
Tickell. On the Death of Addison.

DIEGO RUYS, or RODRIGUEZ, an Island in the Indian Ocean, situated about a hundred leagues east of the Mauritius. It is a mountainous district, about twenty-six miles long and twelve broad, possessing a mild and salubrious climate. In some places the surface is covered with rocks, but in others the soil is excellent, and well adapted for the growth of fruit-trees, and most kinds of vegetables; those which are principally cultivated are rice, peas, and tobacco. The chief productions of the Island are land turtles, which are bred in abundance, and very largely exported to the Mauritius. Sea turtle are also plentiful. The sea cow is occasionally seen, and several kinds of good fish are caught near the coasts, especially in the shallow parts within the reefs; but those found in deep water on the outside of the barriers are considered poisonous. Diego Ruys is situated in 20° south latitude and 64° east longitude.

DIEPHOLZ, a County of Germany in the late Circle of Westphalia, and now included in the Kingdom of Hanover. It is encompassed by Munster, Osnabruck, Minden, and Hoya; and with an adjoining part of the country, forms a district containing a surface of about 260 square miles, and between fifteen and sixteen thousand inhabitants. The soil consists for the most part of sandy heaths, and marshy meadows; the former are frequently covered with briars and small brushwood; but timber is very scarce, and turf is chiefly used for fuel. The most fertile tract of country is near the banks of the Lake Dummer, which affords some tracts of good pasturage. In this part the inhabitants rear cattle, some of which are sent to Holland and the countries on the banks of the Rhine. They also grow hemp and flax, and manufacture it into yarn and linen. Diepholz is the chief Town of this County, and is situated near the above mentioned lake. It is but a small place, thirty miles from Bremen, with nearly 1500 inhabitants, and some small linen and woollen manufactures.

DIEPPE, a Sea-port of France situated between two rocky mountains on the shore of the English Channel. It lies at the mouth of the river Bethune, or Arques, in Upper Normandy, and the present Department of the Lower Seine, and is one of the principal stations for packets in the route between London and Paris. The way by Dieppe is the most direct, but the distance from Brighton (66 miles) is about three times as great as that from Dover to Calais, or Boulogne, and the passage generally occupies from ten to twenty hours. The town is tolerably well built, especially the high street, which is about a mile long. The principal buildings are the parish Church, and an old Castle situated on the west of the Town. There are also several small squares, and the ramparts form a pleasant promenade. The number of inhabitants is about 20,000, who carry on several manufactures. The harbour, which is formed by the mouth of the river, is situated at the east end of the Town, and is of a semicircular form, with three fathoms at high water, and capable of containing about 200 small vessels. It has been rendered more commodious by two moles built of brick, which facilitate the loading and unloading of the vessels. The surrounding country is very productive, and forms part of the noted Pays de Caux. Dieppe was bombarded by the English, and a great part of it reduced to ashes in 1694 and 1794. It is thirty-four miles north of Rouen, and 100 north-west of Paris; in latitude 49° 56′ north and longitude 1° 5′ east.

DIEPPE. — DIET.

DIERVILLA, in Botany, a genus of the class Pentandria, order Monogynia, natural order Caprifoliæ. Generic character: calyx oblong, five-cleft, bracteate at the base; corolla twice as long as the calyx, funnel-shaped, five-cleft, spreading; stigma capitate; capsule oblong, naked, acute, four-celled, many-seeded; seeds minute, one species. D. Tourneforti, a shrub, native of North America. Nuttall.

DIESIA, in Zoology, a genus of Heteromerous, Coleopterous insects, established by Fischer in his Entomographia Russica, (i. p. 166.)

Generic character. Antennæ elongate, of eleven distinct joints, the last joint conical or fusiform, more or less lengthened; upper lip triangular, cut off at the base, dilated and nicked towards the tip; jaws very short, triangular, strong, ending in a small smooth brilliant point; maxilla short, curved into the form of a scythe; palpi unequal, filiform, the front pair much larger and longer than the hinder ones; mentum rounded in front, with a triangular nick; the body is triangular; the head large, inclined; eyes crescent-shaped; the prothorax ring-shaped, slightly cut out in the middle; elytræ rather broader than the thorax, triangular, edges inflexed; the legs are long, hairy, the front pair of legs are subtriangular, and distinctly toothed.

This new genus is very nearly allied to Akis and Platyopes, by the edge of the elytræ being inflexed; and it also has considerable affinity to the Pimelia, but it differs from them all by the form of the joints of the antennæ, and in the front legs being toothed.

Fischer describes two species:

D. sexdentata, Fischer, Entomog. Russ. xiv. 8. Found in the Deserts of Kirghises, in Russia.

D. quadridentata, Fischer, Entomog. Russ. xiv. 7. Found with the preceding.

DI'ET, v. DI'ET, n. DI'ETER, DIETE'TICAL, DI'ETING, DI'ET-BREAD, DI'ET-DRINK.

Fr. diete; It. and Sp. dieta; Lat. diæta; Gr. δίαιτα. Of uncertain Etymology. "A set rule and order of eating and drinking." Minshew.

To diet, is used, (lit. and met.) as equivalent to—To feed: more estrictedly to feed upon medicated meats, or upon neats prepared to secure or restore health. Diet-breads, and Diet-drinks, were breads and drinks so prepared.

I pray you, cosin, wisely that ye ride;
Governeth you also of your diete
Attemprely. Chaucer. The Shipmmanes Tale.

And than I drynke a bitter swete
With drie lippe, and eien wete.
Lo thus I temper my diete.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 129.

But if he wil not, they do but diet hym a season, to winne him and make him tell more, and deliuer hym to the lay power.
Tyndall. Workes, fol. 203. Exposition vpon the fifth Chapter of Matthew.

If noo feuer remayne, than vse moderate fricasies, and lyttell eatying, & that of meates hauynge good iuyce, increacynge by lyttell and lyttell to the naturall diete.
Sir Thomas Elyot. The Castel of Helth.

——— If you go less,
Or take a dyating mercy to protection,
The honour of a father I disclaim in you.
Beaumont and Fletcher. The Double Marriage, act ii. sc. 1.

With these threats, Cleopatra for fear yielded straight, as she would have yielded unto strokes: and afterwards suffered herself to be cured and dieted as they listed.
Sir Thomas North. Plutarch, fol. 783. Antonius.

I shall prescribe one receipt to all Christian tempers, which is to acquire the habit of piety and devotion, for this, in our spirituall life, is like a healthfull aire and a temperate diet in our naturall, the best preservative of a rectified faith, and the best disposition to recover from an unsound religion.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 3. sec. 2.

NOT. For that [sc. that the aforesayd game would be cleanly, and not fright the ladies] sir, the bear-ward hath put in securitie, by warranting my ladie and her women to dance the whole changes with them in safety; and for their abusing the place you shall not need to feare, for he hath given them a kinde of dyet-bread to bind them to their good behaviour.
Ben Jonson Masque of Augures.

Bottle-ale is a drink of Sathan's, a diet-drink of Sathan's, diuised to puff vs vp, and make vs swell in this latter age of vanity. Id. Bartholomew Fayre, act iii. sc. 6.

ARUI. He cut our rootes in characters,
And sawc'st our brothes, as Juno had bin sicke,
And he her dieter.
Shakspeare. Cymbeline, fol. 387.

The third, dieteticall and prophylacticall receipts of wholesome caution: which I meane (with a determinate præterition of the rest) to spend my hour upon; Save yourselves from these untoward generation.
Hall. Works, vol. ii. fol. 367. Sermon, To the Lords.

Yet can I set my Gallio's dieting,
A pestle of a lark, or plover's wing;
And warn him not to cast his wonton eyne
On grosser bacon.
Hall, book iv. Satire 4.

From the beginning of God's taking them unto his care and patronage, they were fed and maintain'd at the immediate cost and charges of heaven; they were dieted with miracles, with new inventions and acts of providence, the course of nature itself still veiling to their necessities.
South. Sermon, vol. v. fol. 347.

She fell into a great flux, and salivated a full half year, without any intermission, which could not be stopped with all the drying diet-drinks, purges, bleedings, baths, or any thing which the doctors at London could invent.
Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 466. R. Lower, letter to Mr. Boyle.

——— Twelve orient morns
Have seen him there extended, yet his flesh
Nor putrid taint invades, nor inbred worm,
That diets on the brave in battle fall'n.
Cowper. Homer. Iliad, book xxiv.

Their failure as remedies may be reasonably attributed to the alterations, which the human frame is found to undergo in the revolution of ages by a general change of dietetic regimen.
Knox. Works, vol. i. p. 198. Essays, No. 38.

DIET. See Diette, in Menage; Diæta, in Du Cange; Deut, in Wachter; Thiuda in Junius, Gloss. Goth. Menage thinks it an application of Diet (above) to a public assembly; because the Germans were anciently accustomed to treat of public affairs in the midst of their festivals. Duchat and Skinner think from Dies, a day; the German Reichs tog, dies imperii translated into Dieta; the day (emphatically) fixed according to the former for pleas or other public business. In DIET. English legal proceedings, the parties (in certain cases) pray a Day (sc. for deciding their suit.) Skinner says, because, perhaps, the whole time of session was judicially considered as one Day. Lye refers to the Gothic Thiuda gens, in Junius, Gloss. Goth., where thiuda, thied, or Diet, dieta, are assigned to the A. S. theod-an, getheod-an, jungere se alicui, associari. To join or unite, to associate or meet together.

The King of Rome hath sent Gusman, one of the cheefe abowte him, to th' Emperor to exhort him to appoint a dyot in some place of Germanie, for the quietness of the same, which messenger, as yet, hath had no audience.
Lodge. Illustrations of British History, vol. i. p. 170.

Each proselyte would vote his doctor best,
With absolute exclusion to the rest:
Thus would your Polish diet disagree,
And end, as it began, in anarchy.
Dryden. The Hind and the Panther.

Viz. the Pope, Emperour, King of Spain, Duke of Bavaria, &c. and of so great consequence joyntlie, and severally to them all, and must of necessity require divers assemblies, commissions, perchance dietts, &c.
Cabbala. The Lord Brook to the Duke.

The general DIETS under the old Constitution of the German Empire met at Ratisbon. They consisted of the Emperor in person, or by his Representative; the nine Electors as the first College; the Ecclesiastical and Secular Princes as the second; and the Representatives of the Imperial Cities, forming two Benches, that of Suabia and that of the Rhine, as the third. These Diets were usually summoned by the Emperor, or in his absence by the King of the Romans; sometimes however the Electors have called them without his consent. They made laws, raised taxes, and decided every question relative to the common interests of the Germanic Body. Originally they met once a year at least, and every freeman had a right to be present, till by degrees the preponderance of the Aristocracy reduced them to the form which we have described above. According to the punctilious forms of German ceremonial, the Emperor sat on a raised throne, having on his right, in the same line with himself, the Electors of Mayence, Bavaria, and Brandenburgh; on his left, in the same line, the Electors of Cologne, Saxony, Palatine, and Hanover; opposite to him was seated the Elector of Treves. The benches of the Ecclesiastical Princes were to his right, those of the Secular Princes to his left, and cross benches between them were placed for the Deputies of the Imperial Cities. The Emperor first offered his proposition in the full Diet. The three Colleges then deliberated apart from each other, and afterwards having assembled together, they communicated the result to the Emperor. If he approved the communication it was promulgated as a Recess of the Emperor, i. e. that which is received as one of the Imperial ordinances. Arumæus, de Comitiis Rom. German. Imperii, vii. 20; Pfeffel, Abregé, 622. Diet is also used for the general Assembly which commonly met at Frankfort on the Maine, for an election of an Emperor or King of the Romans. There were also Diets of each separate Circle. Moreri (ad v.) has given a brief account of the most remarkable Imperial Diets during the XVIth century.

The general Diets of Poland were usually held at Warsaw, and third time at Grodno in Lithuania. The laws of the Kingdom enjoined that they should be convened by the King every two years, and that their sitting should be limited to fifteen days; but they were in fact assembled much oftener, and have lasted six weeks. The Diets in which the Kings were chosen, were held on horseback, and called Paspolites. The Diets of the particular Provinces preceded the General Diet six weeks, and their Resolutions were transmitted to it by their Deputies.

The Diets of the Protestant Cantons in Swisserland were convoked by Zurich and held at Arau; those of the Catholic Cantons were called by Lucern in the town of the same name. The General Diets of both Catholics and Protestants were summoned by Zurich at Bauer, and met twice a year at the end of June and the beginning of December.

DIFFAME, see DEFAME.

DIFFARREATION, Lat. Diffarreatio, a method of divorce among the Romans, the converse of CONFARREATION, (q. v.) As the latter was the most solemn mode of contracting marriages, so this was the most circumstantial manner of dissolving them. It was applied only to such marriages as had been solemnized by Confarreation. It consisted in a sacrifice, wherein, as in Confarreation, a meal cake was employed; but with what ceremonials can only be conjectured. It was, most probably, performed by the Pontifices. It is supposed, that the ceremony was used in the divorce of the Flamen of Jupiter and his wife, to which Plutarch alludes in his 50th Roman Question, when the Priests performed "many stern, strange, and terrible rites."

Festus, ad vocem; Du Cange, Glossar.; Selden, Uxor Hebraica; Forcellini ad vocem.

DI'FFER, v.
DI'FFERENCE, v.
DI'FFERENCE, s.
DI'FFERENT,
DI'FFERENTIALLY,
DI'FFERENTLY,
DI'FFERINGLY.

Fr. differer; It. differire; Sp. diferenciar; Lat. differre, to bear apart; (dis, and ferre.) Vossius says, Differre is properly dissipare, dividere; to dissipate, to divide; and, metaphorically, as things dissimilar are said (distare) to stand apart; so are they said (differre) to differ.

To bear apart, to separate or divide; to be or cause to be separate or apart, or asunder in place; to dissever or distinguish; to be or cause to be separate, distinct, dissimilar or unlike in appearances; to have dissimilar or unlike properties or qualities; to have, keep or maintain, dissimilar or contradictory ideas, notions or opinions. And thus, to dispute, to controvert, to debate, to contend.

By this reason then, there commen many maner of knowynge, to diuerse and to diffryng substaunces.
Chaucer. The first Booke of Boecius, fol. 240.

There is one maner glory of the sunne, and another glorie of the moone, & another glory of the starres, for one starre differeth frō another in glorie.
Bible, Anno 1551. 1 Corinthians, ch. xv.

All folke than (qd she) good and eke badde, enforcen hem without difference of entencion to comen to good.
Chaucer. The fourth Booke of Boecius, fol. 230.

In makinge of comparison
There maie no difference bee
Betwix a dronken man and mee.
Gower. Conf. Am. book vi. fol. 129.

But the Lorde shewyng what difference there was betwene the Jewishe righteousnesse, and the righteousneasse of the ghospel: betwene a good Jewe, and a good Christian manne, sayde: If thou will be perfeict, goe and sell all that thou hast, and geue the money to y^e^ poor. Udall. Matthew, ch. xix.

DIFFER. Magellane was not altogether deceived, in naming of them giants, for they generally differ from the common sort of men, both in stature, bignesse, and strength of body, as also in the hideousness of their voice: but yet they are nothing so monstrous, or giant-like as they were reported.

Sir Francis Drake Revived, fol. 28.

As the difference of tone makes a difference between every man's voice, of the same country, yea family: so a different dialect and pronunciation, differs persons of divers countries; yea persons of one and the same country, speaking the same language.

Derham. Physico-Theology, book v. ch. ix. (1) note.

Nay, and in this, thou show'st to value more
One poet, then of other folke ten score.
O pietie! so to weigh the poor's estates!
O bountie! so to difference the rates.

Jonson. Underwoods. An Epigram to King Charles.

And if it be true both in divinity and law, that consent alone though copulation never follow, makes a marriage, how can they dissolve it for want of that which made it not, and not dissolve it for that not continuing which made it, and should preserve it in love and reason, and difference it from a brute conjugality?

Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

So that in these three respects even the communicable attributes of God, are themselves incommunicable; and so they are his name, whereby he is known and differenced from all other beings whatsoever. Hopkins. Sermons, fol. 242.

Though now great difference be of mortals made,
"All shall meet equals, but must first be dead."

Stirling. Domesday. The fifth Hour.

——— How now, Sir Knight!
What meaneth this which heere I see before?
How fortuneth this foule vncomely plight
So different from that, which earst ye seem'd in sight?

Spenser. Faerie Queene, book vi. can. 7.

When biting serpents are mentioned in the Scripture they are not differentially set down from such as mischief by stings.

Sir Thomas Brown, book vi. ch. xxviii.

First as to that which belongs to the sight, you must conceive that which is called a white or a black colour not to be any thing, absolutely existing either without your eyes, or within your eyes; but black and white and every other colour, is caused by different motions made upon the eye from objects differently modified.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, fol. 10.

Faint light through dusky clouds sad Cynthia gaue;
But different-colour'd from the foamy waue
The trunke appear'd. May. Lucan, book viii. p. 284.

Alone his streame pure Titaresus keepes,
Though in a different-named flood he creepes.

Id. Id. book vi. p. 162

To say, that they left by tradition every place of Scripture interpreted, would be an evidently false assertion: for how could the fathers then have written upon it such differently-expounding comments.

Lord Falkland's Replie, in Hammond's Works, vol. ii. part i. fol. 1650.

Especially the understanding, the supreme faculty of the soul, which chiefly differenceth us from brute beasts, and makes us capable of virtue and vice, of rewards and punishments, shall be busied and employed in contemplating the works of God, and observing the divine art and wisdom, manifested in the structure and composition of them.

Ray. On the Creation, part i. p. 199.

Intellectual differences shall shortly cease, and then moral differences shall take place; one moment shall equal the learned and the unlearned, the knowing and ignorant person, shall at last stand upon equal ground, but the good and bad men shall be differenced for ever.

Bates. Works, vol. iii. p. 211. On the Fear of God, ch. ix.

The troops we squander'd first, again appear
From sev'ral quarters, and enclose the rear.
They first observe, and to the rest betray
Our diff'rent speech; our borrow'd arms survey.

Dryden. Virgil. Æneid, book ii.

Now it is the most becoming the divine goodness not to deal so differently, that the soul should be everlastingly happy, and the body lost in forgetfulness; the one glorified in heaven, the other remain in the dust. DIFFER. — DIFFICULT.

Bates. Works, vol. iv. p. 209. Dr. Thomas Manton's Funeral Sermon.

Salt petre being but a kind of sal-terræ, generated in very differingly qualified parcels of earth, may probably receive divers qualities from the particular soil, wherein it grows.

Boyle. Of the Usefulness of Experiments, vol. i. p. 327.

Therefore weight is made by the differencial, not the absolute pressure of earth.

Search. Light of Nature, vol. ii. part ii. ch. xxii.

This may be easily done by considering that Christianity when it is thus differently spoken of, is represented to us in two very different views of it. Pearce. Sermon 18. vol. ii.

DIFFI'CILE, DIFFICI'LNESS, DIFFI'CILITATE. } It. and Fr. difficile; Sp. dificil; Lat. difficilis, difficile; difficult; hard to be done. See DIFFICULT, below.

The said Alcibiades became so industrious that were it good or yuel that he enterprised, nothing almost escaped that he acheued nat, were the thing neuer so difficyle (or as who sayth) impenitrable.

Sir Thomas Elyot. The Governour, book i. ch. xxiii.

Truly it was a woorthy sentence of suche a prince. What thing is it, be it neuer so difficile, begunne by a vertuous man, but there is hope to have a good end thereof?

Golden Boke, ch. xlv.

That, that should give motion to an unweildy bulk, which itself hath neither bulk or motion; is of as difficil an apprehension, as any mystery in nature.

Glanville. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. iii.

The lighter sort of malignitie, turneth but to a crosnesse, or frowardnesse or aptnesse to oppose or difficilnesse or the like, but the deeper sort to envie and meere mischief.

Bacon. Essay 13. Of Goodness, &c.

The inordinateness of our love difficilitateth this duty [charity.]

Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 15. sec. 4.

Beside, 'tis known he could speak Greek
As naturally as pigs squeak;
That Latin was no more difficile,
Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle.

Butler. Hudibras, part i. can. 1.

DI'FFICULT, DI'FFICULTY, DI'FFICULTNESS. } Lat. difficilis, that can or may not be done, sc. easily; dis, and facilis, that can or may be done.) That can or may not be done, sc. easily, without labour, without skill, without learning, without trouble; and thus, troublesome, laborious, hard, uneasy.

Fr. difficulte; It. difficultà; Sp. difficuldad. Cotgrave explains the French verb, difficulter. "To difficultate or difficilitate; to make difficult or uneasie; to make it a hard matter, to make bones of."

Dame, (quod he,) God yeve you right good lif,
Ye have here touched, all so mote I the,
In scole matere a ful gret difficultee.

Chaucer. The Freres Prologue, v. 6854.

The world knoweth that the desires of princes hath bene so feruent to obtain their purpose, that they haue aduentured and prooued things to man's coniecture impossible, the which they haue made possible, and also things difficult haue made facile.

Hakluyt. Voyage, &c. M. Robert Thorne, vol. i. fol. 212.

Kynge Henry not myndynge to lye still in Normandy, nor to leaue his interprice vnperformed, sent the Duke of Clarence to the sea coaste whiche with greate difficulty gatte the toune of Bayeux. Hall. Henry V. The sixth Yere.

To doe great things, when generous minds devise,
Paine pleasure gives, things difficult entice.

Stirling. Jonathan.

The difficultnes of this present worke, considering mine owne want of experience, not onlv in matters of war, but also in diuers other things whereof this history entreateth, did dissuade & in manner discourage me frō enterprising the trāslatiō thereof.

A. Goulding. Caius Julius Cæsar. Preface, * ii.

DIFFICULT. — DIFFIDE

Nor how by mastering difficulties so,
In times unusual, and by passage hard,
He bravely came to disappoint his foe,
And many times surpris'd him unprepar'd.
Daniel. A Funeral Poem.

Prayer is one of the greatest and hardest works that a man has to do in this world; and was ever any thing difficult or glorious atchieved by a sudden cast of a thought? a flying stricture of the imagination. South. Sermons, vol. ii. p. 97.

If I should give myself scope to pursue each particular through all the difficulties that might attend it, it would fill a much larger discourse than the measure of the present exercise will allow.
Id. Sermon 8. vol. ix.

If we can practise the duty of forgiving an enemy, we shew that our hearts have made no mean proficiency in the love both of God and man. We shew our love of God by complying with one of the most difficult precepts of religion for his sake.
Gilpin. Sermon 41. vol. ii.

Let us see, then, whether by attending to the practice of mathematicians and natural philosophers, as contrasted with the practice of those who have treated of the human mind, we can make any discovery preparatory to the solution of this difficulty.
Beattie. On Truth, part ii. ch. i. sec. 1.

DIFFI'DE, v.
DI'FFIDENCE,
DI'FFIDENCY,
DI'FFIDENT,
DI'FFIDENTLY.

Fr. diffident; It. and Sp. diffidente; Lat. diffidens, present participle of diffidere; (dis, and fidere, to trust;) of uncertain origin. See CONFIDE.

To distrust or be distrustful, to disbelieve, to discredit, to doubt; to be uncertain, to have or place no trust or faith or credit.

But in diffidence and distrust they were like Nichodemus which sayd: how may a man be borne againe when he is olde? And peradventure y^e^ farther of frō endeuour toward belieuing.
Sir Thomas More. Workes, fol. 1061. The Answer to the Poysoned Booke, &c.

For should not graue and learned Experience,
That looks with th' eyes of all the world beside,
And with all ages holds intelligence,
Go safer than deceit without a guide?
Which in the by-paths of her diffidence,
Crossing the ways of right still runs more wide.
Daniel. Musophilus.

Daughter of God and man, immortal Eve,
For such thou art, from sin and blame entire:
Not diffident of thee do I dissuade
Thy absence from my sight, but to avoid
Th' attempt itself, intended by our foe.
Milton. Paradise Lost, book ix. l. 293.

On the morrow my Lord of Canterbury perused this declaration: and as he found it to be uncertainly and diffidently set down for some other circumstances, so he discovered there one thing much to be observed.
State Trials. Case of the Countess of Essex, in a Cause of Divorce.

The use that our Saviour makes of this lively description of Providence, is to teach us to rely at all times upon the care and protection of God, without unreasonable anxiety, diffidence, and distrust. Clarke. Sermon 17. vol. ii.

FID. Because he thought it, who is a man of that sense, nice discerning, and diffidency, that I should think it hard to deceive him. Wycherly. The Plain-dealer, act iv. sc. 1.

But I remember, too, that you disapproved of the manner in which the civil war was conducted; and that, far from being satisfied either with the strength or nature of Pompey's forces, you were always extremely diffident of their success; in which I need not add, I entirely agreed with you.
Melmoth. Cicero, to Marcus Marcellus, book ix. let. 4.

There were some essays made, faintly, diffidently, and occasionally at first, like those of men, who, emerging out of darkness, were dazzled as well as enlightened.
Bolingbroke. Works, vol. vi. p. 155. On Human Reason, ess. 2 sec. 12.

DIFFLUENCY, Lat. diffluere, to flow apart. See CONFLOW.

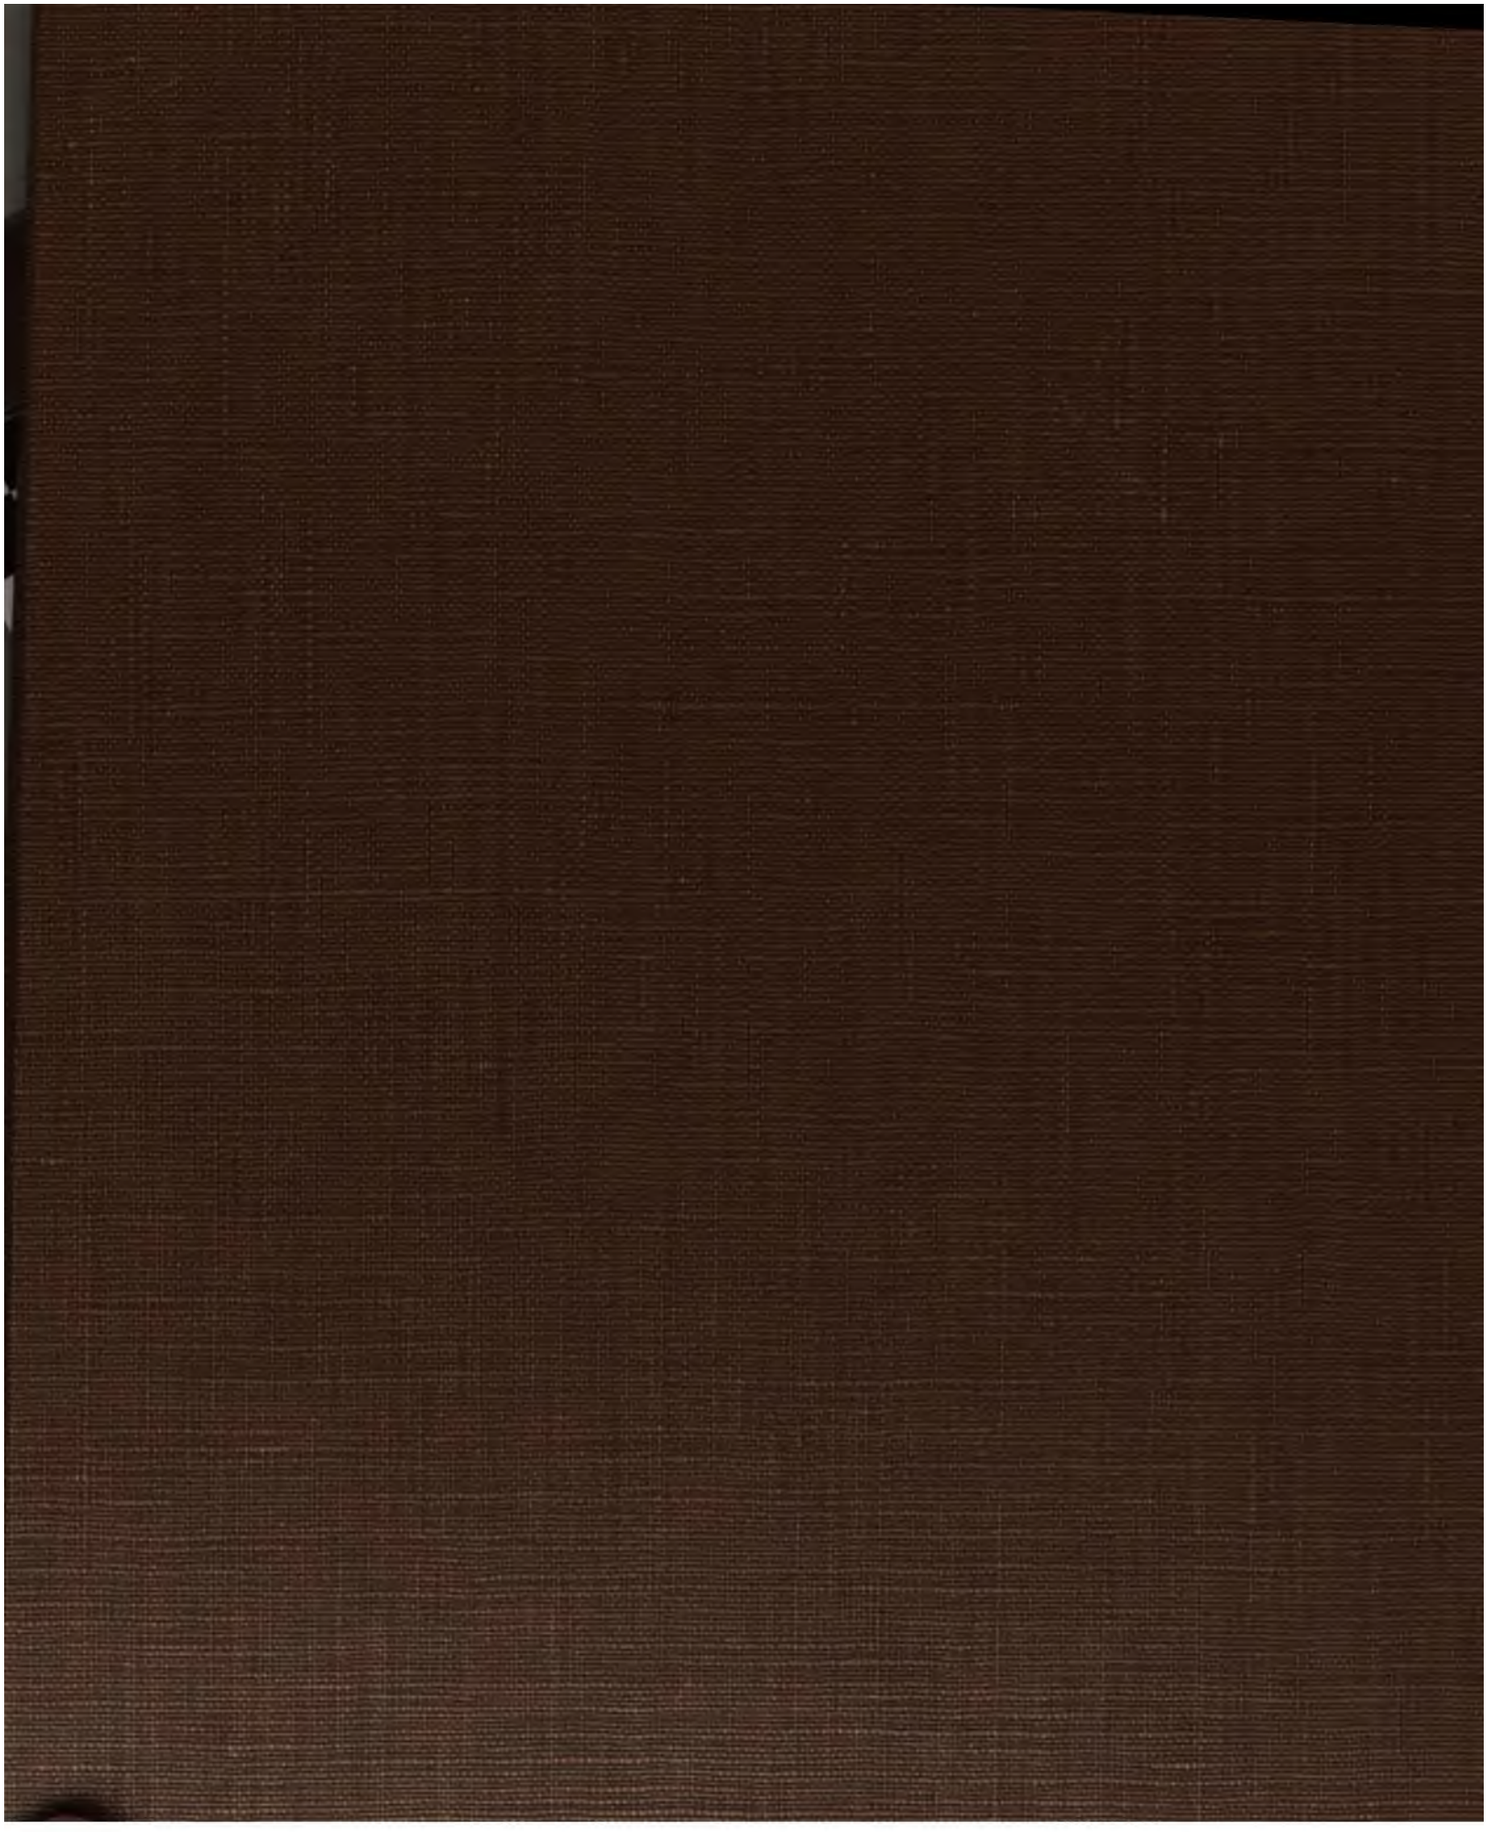
A flowing apart; fluidity.

But ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air; whereby it requireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffluency, and omitteth not its essence, but condition of fluidity. Sir Thomas Brown, book ii. ch. i.

DIFFLUGIA, in Zoology, a genus of microscopic animals, referred with doubt to the Annelides. First described by Leon Leclerc, and observed in the water in the neighbourhood of Laval.

The body is very small, contractile, gelatinous, provided with irregular and retractile tentaculæ; living in an ovoid tube, formed of agglutinated grains of sand, and truncated at the extremity for the passage of the tentaculæ.

It is exceedingly difficult to assign the true situation of this animal, on account of its being so very imperfectly known; but it is certainly not an infusorial animal in the strict sense of the word as at present applied.

END OF VOLUME XVII.


LONDON:—PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, STAMFORD STREET.